To a 16-year-old girl from Burlington, N. J., it means that she can plan confidently to go on to college, something it would have been "almost impossible for my father to even dream of" when he was a teen-ager. She listed the benefits provided under her father's union contract and commented: "We wouldn't have any of these things if it weren't for men like Samuel Gompers, George Meany, David McDonald and Philip Murray."

A 14-year-old boy from Paterson, N. J., cited the "secure future" provided by the union-won pension plan and added: "The shorter hours and longer vacations the union fights for will mean more jobs for more people" as well as giving steel workers "more time with their families."

Another 14-year-old, a girl whose foster father is an active member of the Steelworkers, contrasted the comfortable living conditions made possible by union wages with the poverty she had known as a small child. Even during the long 1959 strike, she notes, the benefits provided by the union met the family's needs.

The essays were judged by Rutgers University and the winners were escorted to Washington by John Proto, USWA legislative representative for New Jersey.

They took in the usual tourist sights of the nation's capital, but also met with congressmen and senators at the Capitol and top union officials at AFL-CIO headquarters.

Before leaving, the group visited the grave of John F. Kennedy at Arlington Cemetery.

4 Writers Honored By Hillman Awards

New York—A novelist, a Pulitzer Prize-winning historian, an editorial writer and a member of a pioneer folk-signing group who later became a successful playwright are recipients of this year's $500 awards from the Sidney Hillman Foundation.

The awards, given annually since 1950, were presented by Jacob S. Potofsky, president of the Clothing Workers and of the foundation before a luncheon audience of more than 350 persons at the Hotel Commodore.

The foundation was established by the union to honor the memory of its first president who died in 1946. Potofsky, who succeeded Hillman as president of the union, declared the foundation's purpose was to "perpetuate Hillman's philosophy and broad-ranging interests and concerns."

The awards, presented for notable achievement in the mass communication field, are for works published or performed during 1963. They went to:

- Richard Hofstadter, for his book, Anti-Intellectualism in American Life, published by Random House-Knopf.
- Arnold Hano, for his article, The Burned Out Americans, in Saga magazine, an expose of migrant agricultural workers' conditions in Central Valley, Calif.
- Horace G. Davis, for his editorials on racial integration in the Gainesville, Fla., Daily Sun.
- Millard Lampell, for his script, "No Hiding Place," a dramatic treatment of housing "block-busting" on the East Side/West Side program, produced by Talent Associates for CBS-TV.

Prof. Daniel Bell of Columbia University, who accepted the award on behalf of Prof. Hofstadter of that institution, was the principal speaker at the luncheon. William L. Shirer spoke on behalf of the judges, who also included Howard K. Smith, radio and TV commentator, and Alan Barth, editorial writer for the Washington Post.

AFL-CIO Hits Bid by Six States For Radiation Safety Exemptions

The AFL-CIO has urged the Labor Dept. to turn down a request by six states for blanket exemption from radiation safety standards and inspection under the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act.

Two months ago, the Labor Dept. adopted its first set of radiation safety standards governing plants which manufacture goods for the government. The safety code closely follows recommendations made by the AFL-CIO.

Arkansas, California, Kentucky, Mississippi, New York and Texas have agreements with the Atomic Energy Commission covering regulation of certain fissionable materials and contend that this makes Labor Dept. inspection procedures unnecessary.

George Taylor, economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, opposed the states' request at a Labor Dept. hearing, declaring that the "vital issue" is the "health and well-being of the workers."

He cited statistics showing "a serious inconsistency between the health and safety inspections of federal Walsh-Healey inspectors and health and safety inspections by state authorities."

Last year, Taylor said, 85 percent of establishments visited by federal inspectors were found to have one or more health or safety violations. Only 35 percent of establishments inspected by states were marked down for violations.

Joining in the opposition to the exemption request by the six states were Exec. Sec. John D. Connors of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health; Paul Hutchings, research director of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.; and Edward Legan, representative of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Larger Force Asked

The labor testimony stressed that the desirable course would be for the Labor Dept. to enlarge its Walsh-Healey inspection force to enable it to carry out the necessity inspections in all states.

If this can't immediately be done, the AFL-CIO said, exemptions from federal inspection should be given to a state "only after careful and continuing scrutiny" shows the state has an acceptable inspection procedure of its own.

Taylor pointed out that the Labor Dept. in recent years ceded Walsh-Healey safety inspection authority to 24 states, but for various reasons including inadequate state inspections has since terminated 18 of the agreements.

"It is apparent," he said, "that the overall experience of the Labor Dept. in farming out Walsh-Healey health and safety regulatory authority to the states has been unsuccessful. It has resulted in lack of uniformity of standards and regulation. It has also resulted in failure to protect adequately the health and safety of workers against conventional non-radiation hazards on federal supply contracts."

Mediation Service Strengthens Staff

Two veteran federal mediators have been shifted to Washington, D. C., to serve as "trouble shooters" in major labor disputes, Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service Dir. William E. Simkin announced.

The mediators, Gilbert J. Seldin of Cleveland and Ralph Patterson of San Francisco, will work out of the Washington office under the direction of Walter A. Maggiolo, director of the agency's Office of Mediation Activity.

Amendment Stage Nears:

Leaders Bar Changes 'Weakening' Rights

The Senate moved close to the amendment stage in its long debate on the House-passed civil rights bill, with floor managers for the bill pledging key House leaders that no amendment would be accepted that "altered the purposes" or "weakened the enforcibility" of the measure.

An amendment by Sen. Herman E. Talmadge (D-Ga.), to guarantee jury trials for persons cited for contempt of court under the bill's provisions, became the Senate's pending business. Southern leaders of the filibuster against the bill indicated, however, that they might lay the amendment aside to allow a vote on one or more of the amendments drafted by GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) to the fair employment practice provisions of the bill.

Southerners were able to modify the 1957 "right-to-vote" civil rights law to guarantee jury trials under some conditions to persons accused of criminal contempt of court. The pending House-passed bill provides for jury trials in contempt cases arising from violations of the voting rights and public accommodations sections alone.

The 1957 law provides jury trial in all contempt cases if the judge sentences a convicted person to more than a $300 fine or more than 45 days in jail.

The Dirksen amendments, which have been redrafted by the GOP floor leader into a series of new verisons, are directed to the fair employment practice provisions of the House bill. Republican liberals are indicating Dirksen's proposals are still unacceptable.

As the Southerners broke their own 1960 record for filibusters against a rights bill—the Senate moving into its thirty-eighth day of debate—Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), floor manager for the bill with Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.) for the Republicans, sought to invoke the Senate rule prohibiting more than two speeches by any senator on the same measure.

The Southern filibuster forces filed a protest and Talmadge flung the debate wide open again by offering his amendment and getting it made the pending business. The two-speeches rule allows senators this latitude on each proposed amendment in turn.

On the jury-trial issue, Sen. John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.) accused opponents of deceptive tactics in claiming a constitutional right to a jury trial for persons cited for criminal contempt.

The Supreme Court in a recent 5-to-4 decision ruled that former Gov. Ross Barnett of Mississippi was not entitled under the constitution to a jury trial on contempt charges before the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for his actions involving admission of James Meredith, a Negro, to the University of Mississippi.

The court majority suggested that a constitutional issue might arise if Barnett was given a severe sentence.

Strong Labor Turnout Urged Against Wallace

Indiana and Maryland labor have vigorously denounced Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace's candidacy in presidential primaries in their states.

Indiana AFL-CIO Pres. Dallas W. Sells called on the state's 400,000 union members to "vote in strength . . . against the governor of Alabama and for human decency" in the Indiana primary May 5.

Sells declared at a news conference in Indianapolis that Wallace was conducting a campaign of distortion and confusion, playing upon every prejudice known to mankind. He refuted, point by point, the Alabama segregationist's charges against the pending civil rights bill.

Retiring Gov. Matthew Welsh is running as a favorite son against Wallace, with the expectation that the votes of the state's delegation to the Democratic National convention will go to Pres. Johnson.

At Baltimore, the Maryland-D.C. AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education gave a ringing endorsement to Maryland Sen. Daniel B. Brewster, who will be standing in for Johnson against Wallace in the state's May 19 Democratic primary.

Wallace was attacked by the COPE organization for racism and anti-unionism and for campaigning "behind a smoke screen" of states rights. The COPE resolution hailed Brewster for offering voters of the state "the great opportunity to reject demagogues whose only chance to rise above the horizon is to appeal to the baser instincts of people. . . ."

Sells, noting that Wallace has been claiming labor support in Indiana, declared that "nothing could be further from the truth. . . . No labor leader in Indiana is for this kind of demagoguery. Indiana labor stands united in opposition to the governor of Alabama."

In response to questions from television, wire service and newspapers reporters, Sells said the State AFL-CIO position would be "actively presented" among all organizations affiliated with the federation.

West Coast Ship Union Opens Clinic

San Francisco—A medical examination center to serve the unlicensed personnel of about 120 American flag ships based in West Coast ports has been opened here under the joint sponsorship of the Seafarers' Pacific Coast District and the Pacific Maritime Association.

Members of the Sailors Union of the Pacific, Marine Firemen and Marine Cooks & Stewards are covered by a common set of physical standards agreed to under union contract.

The examination center will protect crew members from shipping out with unsafe or unknown physical ailments, and protect the operators from hiring the physically unfit. Diagnosed defects will be referred to physicians or hospitals for treatment.

The clinic occupies 6,000 square feet of ground floor space.

pilot program to nationwide use, enabling needy families to purchase a variety of wholesome foods direct from retail stores at a discount through food stamps.

"It's a good piece of legislation," the President said. "It's soundly conceived . . . and, perhaps, as soon as the civil rights bill is out of the way, we can pass the food stamp bill."

Federal Pay Raise: "The bill is one of the most important pieces of legislation to continued good government," Johnson said. On his desk, he told the nation, are "resignations from some of the very best men in government who . . . cannot stay any longer at present salary."

While noting that the House earlier turned down a pay bill in a dispute over raising congressional salaries, Johnson expressed the hope that Congress can "make some adjustments to meet the objections . . . and pass the pay bill."

Medicare: "Extremely important" was the President's description of the social security hospital care for the aged bill, now being discussed in closed door sessions of the House Ways & Means Committee.

"I believe that we're close to having enough votes to report that bill from committee," Johnson said, "if we can make adjustments and modifications."

When health insurance under social security is enacted, the President declared, it will be "a great day for the people of our country." He added:

"Nearly every home has some father or mother . . . or some member of their family that finds need for medical care insurance. And too many of them don't have it and never will have it under the present system we have."

Poverty Bill: The entire Cabinet, the President said, is "united" in support of the poverty bill. "It would do a lot to help us with our juvenile delinquency problems. . . . It will make it possible for us to train and educate people . . . now being turned back by the draft. . . . We think the bill is soundly conceived and very important."

African Labor Parley Scores State Control

Addis Ababa—Union leaders from 23 African countries and dependencies, meeting here in the fourth congress of the African Regional Labor Organization, elected their first full-time general secretary.

The post went to Mamadou E. Jallow, a 36-year-old Gambian who was a student in the first class to graduate from the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions labor college in Kampala, Uganda, in 1958-59. The African Regional Organization (AFRO) is affiliated with the ICFTU.

ICFTU representatives and spokesmen from free labor international trade secretariats attended the five-day congress here.

Unity Stressed

The delegates, gathered from 19 African affiliates of the ICFTU and observers from six African unions not affiliated, issued major declarations on continental labor unity and on the objectives and problems of African unions.

"State-controlled trade unions," a statement reiterated, "are not and cannot be genuine and free agents for the free expression of the legitimate aspirations of the workers."

A committee report approved by the congress emphasized the need for a labor college for French-speaking West Africa and called for "greatly expanded budgets" to meet the needs of literacy training and trade union education for union members and leaders.

Apartheid Hit

The congress renewed its attack on the apartheid segregationist policies of South Africa and declared its support of liberation movements in that country and in Angola and Portuguese Guinea. All African governments, it declared, should support the organization of African unity and "make positive plans" against any possible action by the white-dominated minority government of Southern Rhodesia to set itself up as independent.

The conference also approved resolutions rejecting neo-colonialism and declaring support of freedom of international affiliation for African unions.

Other officers elected by the congress included: H. Luande of Uganda as chairman succeeding A. H. P. Adebola of Nigeria, and L. Borha of Nigeria and A. Mwamba of Congo-Leopoldville as vice presidents. Named to the AFRO executive board, in addition to the officers, were D. Nkolokosa of Nyasaland, J. B. Rasolondralbe of Madagascar and N. Ognamy of Congo-Brazzaville.

Support Asked For Improved Labor Press

East Lansing, Mich.—More financial support for the labor press is necessary to make it really effective, Editor Gordon Cole of the Machinist told a training institute here at Michigan State University's Kellogg Center.

Speaking on "Politics and the Labor Press," Cole said labor will "continue to be on the short end until we develop an effective labor press. Our job is to try to keep our members better informed with more facts and voting records."

Editor Ted Ogar of the Michigan AFL-CIO News credited the state's labor papers with a key role in helping to kill proposals by Republicans to cripple state unemployment and workmen's compensation laws.

Forty editors and writers heard reports on automation and unemployment, and on vocational education. Workshop sessions were held in writing, editing and make-up, the mimeographed paper, and dealing with the public. The sessions were jointly sponsored by MSU's labor program service, the Michigan AFL-CIO and its Press Council.

Meany Bids Business Join In Programs to Aid Nation

Challenges C of C To End Nay-Saying

By Eugene A. Kelly

Organized business has been challenged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to cease its "automatic opposition" to labor's programs and to cooperate in helping make the nation's economic system work for the benefit of all Americans.

At the same time Meany, member of a discussion panel at the 52d annual meeting of the United States Chamber of Commerce, reiterated his firm opposition to the idea of wage-price "guidelines" or of government intervention in the collective bargaining process to "assert the public interest."

"I do not believe in the regulation of wages or prices," Meany said to strong applause by 1,500 Chamber members. "Where does the process stop? The final step is that you regulate industry as a whole, and I'm opposed to it."

It was Meany's first appearance at a national CofC meeting. He gave his opinion on the panel subject, the Changing Scene in Management-Labor Relations, and answered questions of the panel moderator, Dean Nathan A. Baily of American University's School of Business Administration.

Other panel members were past CofC Pres. Richard Wagner, vice chairman of the Champlin Oil & Refining Co.; and Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. Presiding at the luncheon meeting was M. A. Wright, executive vice president of Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey) and chairman of the Chamber's labor relations committee

The federation president told his business audience that he is "disturbed" over the health of the private sector of the economy.

He noted that while the labor force rose by 8.9 million persons

LBJ Spurs Union Press On Poverty

Pres. Johnson called on the nation's labor editors to "enlist" in his war-on-poverty program at the first presidential news conference ever held specifically for the labor press.

The President's strong plea for support of the poverty program was coupled with his pledge to continue the all-out fight for a civil rights bill, health care for the aged, a food stamp plan for the needy and a pay boost for federal employes.

The press conference in the East Room of the White House climaxed a day-long briefing session of over 150 labor editors by cabinet members and Administration leaders on the major issues facing the nation at home and abroad.

The conference was followed with a reception in the White House Oval Room where the President and Mrs. Johnson as well as Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Mrs. Wirtz greeted the editors.

The conference, sponsored by

Senate Nears 1st Test Vote On Rights Bill

The Senate moved toward a first test vote on a leadership-sponsored amendment to the House-passed civil rights bill as the southern filibuster against the measure neared a record-breaking 50th day.

The leadership-sponsored amendment, agreed on as a substitute for a proposal filed by Sen. Herman E. Talmadge (D-Ga.), would provide jury trials of persons cited for criminal contempt of court in resisting judicial orders if the sentence imposed, upon conviction, was more than a $300 fine or 30 days in jail or both.

The leadership amendment is considered a technical change in the House bill rather than a change in substance. The bill as passed by the House provided a jury trial in certain circumstances in criminal

Johnson Presses New Bill:

Fast Action Urged In Appalachia Aid

Pres. Johnson called on Congress for prompt enactment of a federal-state program for the economic development of Appalachia, the 10-state area ranging along the mountain ranges from Pennsylvania to Georgia and Alabama which he described as worthy of special attention because of "visible lag."

Modeling the Administration draft bill on the recommendations of a special Appalachian Regional Commission named a year ago by the late Pres. Kennedy, Johnson urged Congress to act on his proposals with "urgency."

In the Appalachian area of more than 165,000 square miles, more than 15 million Americans have been "passed by" in the country's general economic progress, the President's message said. There is too little realization of the human potential and an ineffective use of basically rich physical resources.

"I have seen the despair in the faces" of Appalachia's people, he told Congress in a reference to his recent visits to Inez, Ky., and Pittsburgh. "There is a shortage not only of promise but of hope," he added.

The Administration bill, calling for authorization of $228 million in federal funds for investment in special Appalachian projects in the fiscal year beginnig July 1, was promptly introduced in the Senate by Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W. Va.), with bipartisan support pledged in floor speeches by Senators John Sherman Cooper and Thruston Morton (R-Ky.).

In the House, the bill was sponsored by Rep, Charles A. Buckley (D-N. Y.), chairman of the Public Works Committee which will handle the measure, with various members from the Appalachian region filing identical bills.

The President in his message and draft bill followed closely the lines and emphasis of the state-federal regional study commission named by Kennedy.

Total highway construction recommended was slightly raised by the last-minute decision of Gov. James A. Rhodes (R-O.) to add his

Private Insurance Boon Seen in King-Anderson

Most health insurance policies sold to persons over 65 are "woefully inadequate" and priced beyond the means of millions of retired workers, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank told a Senate subcommittee investigating "cost, coverage and benefits" of health insurance for the aged.

Cruikshank told the subcommittee, headed by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.) that the best thing that could happen to the private insurance industry and Blue Cross-Blue Shield groups would be enactment of the King-Anderson bill to provide basic hospital and nursing home benefits through the social security system.

With this "high cost" coverage provided through social security, he said, commercial and non-profit insurance firms could offer a wide range of supplementary coverage of other medical expenses.

"It is the only practical approach to the knotty problem of health care for the aged," Cruikshank said. "With a basic social security plan, private plans can

Canadian Labor Adopts Internal Disputes Plan

By Gervase N. Love

Montreal, Que.—Machinery for the settlement of jurisdictional disputes was written into the constitution of the Canadian Labor Congress at its fifth convention here in the expectation that it would solve a problem that has plagued the organization since its beginning.

The plan closely follows the internal disputes setup that AFL-CIO unions have been living under, with a reduction in friction, since its adoption at the federation's 1961 convention. Much of the language duplicates that in the AFL-CIO constitution, including the creation of a panel of impartial umpires and their role in settling jurisdictional disagreements.

An additional clause provides that cases involving merger or reorganization of plants or companies "under circumstances which eliminate the separate entities of previous bargaining units" will be referred directly to an impartial umpire, who is empowered to modify the section dealing with established work relationships.

The chairman of the convention Constitution Committee, Canadian Dir. William Mahoney of the Steelworkers, a CLC vice president, in presenting the plan said it was being offered under a

FIRST UNION LABEL in an Ernst tie is sewed by California's "first lady," Mrs. Bernice Brown, at contract signing ceremony in office of Ernst Ties of San Francisco, West's largest neckwear firm. Meet With Mediators:

Rail Parties Start Drafting Contract

Negotiators for five railroad brotherhoods and 200 U.S. rail managements have started to draft contract language incorporating the terms of a new agreement on working conditions for nearly 200,000 on-train railroaders.

The exchange began at a Washington meeting when brotherhood officials gave a "package" of contract proposals to mediators named by Pres. Johnson to help settle the five-year dispute over work rules and some pay rates.

The proposals were based on the language of a basic agreement, reached on the verge of an Apr. 24 strike deadline, at the urging of the President and with the aid of mediators he appointed—Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Assistant Sec. James J. Reynolds, Chairman Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., of the National Mediation Board, and two private arbitrators, Prof. George W. Taylor and Theodore W. Kheel.

The mediators turned the union draft over to management representatives and scheduled another meeting May 4. When the language is agreed to, each contract will be subject to ratification by the union involved—the Conductors & Brakemen, Firemen & Enginemen, Locomotive Engineers, Railroad Trainmen and the Switchmen.

On another front, the Supreme Court rejected petitions by four of the unions to review an arbitration board ruling that rail managements may reduce the size of train crews under specified procedures. The court also refused to review an appellate court decision rejecting a union challenge to the constitutionality of the law permitting arbitration of the crew-size issue.

A railroad spokesman said about 3,000 firemen, with less than two years' service or with irregular work records, would be laid off May 7 under the ruling with separation pay of up to six months' wages.

Vice Pres. Jesse Shattuck of the Firemen & Enginemen said there are 35 points of difference between labor and management over intepretation of the arbitration award and the seven-man arbitration board will meet May 7 to rule on the arguments.

The basic agreement between the operating unions and the railroads has these provisions:

- The 100-mile basic unit of pay in road service (150 miles for passenger train service employes) will remain unchanged. The parties also agreed that, until Jan. 1, 1968, any future wage increases won by the unions will be applied only to the basic unit of miles.
- To correct inequities, yard conductors will get a pay raise of about 12 cents an hour, with yard switchmen to get approximately 8 cents and commensurate increases—about 4 percent—for engineers and firemen in five-day-week yard service.
- Nearly all hourly paid employes will receive seven paid holidays. Pay for holidays worked will be at time and a half plus holiday pay. Switchmen, who previously received holiday pay in lieu of a 4-cent wage increase, will have the 4 cents added to wages.
- Road employes will be given suitable lodging or an allowance for layovers of four hours or more, plus a meal allowance of $1.50 for each layover.
- New rules will be worked out for the use of operating employes on self-propelled equipment; for the use of road crews on yard service; and for the use of road crews on interdivisional runs.

In other rail developments:

Mediation is continuing on the request of the Firemen & Enginemen for wage increases, health plan improvements and supplementary pensions for about 50,000 members nationwide.

The Engineers also have asked for contract improvements but the mediation process has not yet started.

A presidential emergency board will resume hearings May 4 on the request of six nonoperating unions for wage hikes and other improvements. The shopcraft unions are the Boilermakers, Firemen & Oilers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Railway Carmen and the Sheet Metal Workers, representing 160,000 workers.

Rubber Union Urges Boycott Of Lee Tires

Akron, O.—The Rubber Workers have instituted a "Don't Buy" campaign against the Lee National Co., of Conshohocken, Pa., makers of Lee tires, as the result of a long dispute with management that erupted into a strike last July 16.

URW Pres. George Burdon, Vice Pres. Peter Bommarito and Sec.-Treas Ike Gold in a joint statement pointed out that "no responsible union takes boycott action lightly," but declared there seemed no other way to reach Maurice Clairmont, who controls Lee and "who so callously puts money before the lives and welfare of human beings."

The firm, formerly the Lee Tire & Rubber Co., was founded in 1915 and enjoyed amicable relations with URW Local 227 from Mar. 2, 1942, until 1962, when Clairmont obtained control.

Since then, the URW charged, Clairmont arbitrarily cut off the pension program of retired white collar workers, and when the contract expired last July confronted the union with demands for a 20 percent wage cut, a complete restudy of all jobs and "complete emasculation of all fringe benefits." He has not modified his demands since, the union added.

"Labor relations in the rubber industry are, on the whole, conducted responsibly by both parties," the URW officers said. "There is the normal give and take on particular issues, but both union and company seek a solution to problems which is satisfactory to both sides.

"Once in a while, however, we come up against an employer who rejects this approach—who wants labor relations and the labor agreement his way or not at all. Such an individual is Clairmont."

Major Tie Firm Signs First Union Contract

San Francisco—Ernst Neckwear, Inc., largest tie manufacturer in the West and one of the top 10 in the country, has qualified for a union label by signing its first contract with the Clothing Workers.

The signing established other firsts: the agreement is the first with a major western neckwear firm and the first in California. And the state's first lady sewed the first union label on an Ernst tie.

The signing took place in the presence of California Gov. Edmund G. Brown and his wife Bernice. At the invitation of company Pres. Beall J. Ernst, Mrs. Brown neatly stitched the Clothing Workers' label on the tie Ernst wore to the contract ceremony.

Organization of the firm, a leading producer of "contemporary" ties, was hailed by Clothing Workers Vice President Leonard Levy as a major breakthrough. Negotiations started after a successful union pledge card check following a three-month organizing drive led by Northern California Joint Board Manager Sam Krips and Regional Union Label Director Anne Draper.

Union-Conscious

Ernst gained civil rights groups' approval and lost some southern retail outlets when it hired Negro models for advertising last year. But it was reminded by a Congress of Racial Equality spokesman that minority members are also union-conscious.

Chet Duncan, CORE western regional field secretary, wrote the company January 24 praising it for its action but expressing concern that the union label did not yet appear on Ernst products.

"I know the reputation of the Clothing Workers Union and the substantial support they have given organizations like ours in the fight for equal and full rights for all," Duncan wrote.

"The employment of Negroes, Spanish-Americans and all other minorities is to be applauded but, again, I am concerned with the democratic rights of all workers to organize into unions. To me the union label symbolizes such democracy on the job."

The first Ernst contract provides a 10-cent per hour across the board pay raise, seven paid holidays, two-week vacations, union health and welfare and pension benefits and use of the union label.

Sanctions Imposed On Air Line Pilots' Union

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has notified all affiliates that the Air Line Pilots Association has been found to be in non-compliance with the decisions of an impartial umpire under the AFL-CIO's internal disputes procedures and is therefore subject to sanctions under the federation's constitution.

The finding was reached by a subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council consisting of Meany and Vice Presidents Al J. Hayes and Joseph D. Keenan. Meany said it followed refusal of the ALPA "to withdraw from its action directed against the representation rights of the Flight Engineers' Intl. Union on Eastern Air Lines, Inc."

Impartial Umpire David L. Cole had found this action by the ALPA to be a violation of Art. XXI of the AFL-CIO Constitution. An appeal from Cole's decision was denied by the Executive Council subcommittee.

In his notification to affiliates, Meany said that the ALPA, effective Apr. 27, 1964, would be subject to the following provisions of Sec. 15 of Art. XXI of the AFL-CIO Constitution:

"1—The non-complying affiliate shall not be entitled to file any complaint or appear in a complaining capacity in any proceeding under this article until such non-compliance is remedied or excused as provided in Sec. 16.

"2—The federation shall, upon request, supply every appropriate assistance and aid to any organization resisting the action determined to be in violation of this article.

"3—The federation shall appropriately publicize the fact that the affiliate is not in compliance with the Constitution.

"4—No affiliate shall support or render assistance to the action determined to be in violation of this article."

The ALPA is the third AFL-CIO affiliate currently in non-compliance with an impartial umpire's decision. The other unions remaining in non-compliance are the National Maritime Union and the Journeymen Stonecutters Association.

Taylor Named Aide to Johnson

Hobart Taylor, Jr., executive vice chairman of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity since his appointment by the late Pres. Kennedy in September 1962, has been named associate general counsel to Pres. Johnson.

The President, while still vice president, was chairman of the committee and worked closely with Taylor, who was its special counsel before becoming executive vice chairman. In his new post Taylor will continue his close connection with the committee.

N. Y. Project Set to Train 1,000 Youths

Albany, N. Y.—Federal approval has been received for a special training project for 1,000 youths in Monroe County more comprehensive and flexible than other New York State projects under the Manpower Development & Training Act.

Courses to be taught will include basic academic subjects such as reading, writing, language skills and arithmetic without which school dropouts often can not qualify for vocational training.

Intensive individual interviewing and counseling also will be provided, and the actual vocational training will be given in some 20 "shortage" occupations in six fields—technical and professional, clerical and public contact, service, metal machining, automotive service and industrial crafts.

The project has the support and cooperation of the State Div. of Employment, State Dept. of Education, Monroe County and its Youth Board, the city of Rochester and its Board of Education and Adult Education Dept. The Rochester AFL-CIO is supporting it.

Connors Appointed to Surgeon General's Panel

John D. Connors, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, has been appointed to the Advisory Committee to the Surgeon General on Occupational Health.

U.S. Surgeon Gen. Luther L. Terry, in announcing the appointment, said Connors' term will run through Apr. 30, 1969. The 12 members of the advisory committee represent—in addition to organized labor—the medical, nursing and engineering professions.

Company Objections Denied:

NLRB Orders Count Of Kingsport Ballots

The National Labor Relations Board has ordered its Atlanta regional director to open and count the 2,128 ballots cast Mar. 10 at the strike-bound Kingsport Press plant in Kingsport, Tenn.

In a unanimous 5-0 decision affirming the action of a three-man panel of board members who issued the precedent-setting order for an election, the board denied management's requests for reconsideration and affirmed the makeup of the four units previously found appropriate for the election.

The units consisted of Bookbinders, Machinists, Stereotypers and Pressmen, who were allowed by the board to vote on the last day of the one-year period after the strike started.

The ballots were impounded, uncounted, to give the unions and management time to file briefs or arguments about the election in a procedure which the board called a "departure" from the usual but within the intent of Congress.

In permitting the election before the close of the first year of the strike, the board blazed a new trail by holding the election first and considering protest briefs later. It did this, it said, in keeping with labor law language providing that "employes engaged in an economic strike who are not entitled to reinstatement shall be eligible to vote" under such regulations as the NLRB may find consistent "in any election conducted within 12 months after the commencement of the strike."

Unless the election asked by the unions was held before Mar. 11, replaced strikers would have been ineligible to vote, the board ruled, adding "therefore, in order to implement to the extent possible the congressional intent to enfranchise replaced strikers during the first 12 months of an economic strike, we have decided to direct an election . . . without awaiting any briefs."

The election was held after management of the Kingsport Press plant, largest U.S. manufacturer of hardcover books, lost two attempts to halt the vote—one when the NLRB refused to postpone the election and again when the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia denied a company request for a temporary court order to enjoin the election. The firm's petition for a permanent order still is pending.

The strikers, who have been picketing the plant since Mar. 11, 1963, for better wages and working conditions, cast their ballots in the company garage, apart from the strikebreakers who have been walking through union lines. The latter voted inside the plant in a company training room.

The board rejected the employer's contention that its workers did not get sufficient advance notice of the balloting. Notices were posted Mar. 7, the NLRB noted and the number of those who voted three days later was as follows:

Of the 1,149 nonstrikers on the voting lists, 1,108 or 95.5 percent cast ballots; of the 1,261 strikers eligible to vote, 1,020 or 80.8 percent cast ballots.

PROSPECTS FOR PASSAGE of major bills are outlined at COPE conference in Chicago by Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.), shown addressing record turnout of delegates from Illinois, Indiana, Minnesota and Wisconsin. Strong interest in political action was evidenced at conference, last of 16 regional gatherings called by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education. All featured "town hall" type of meeting at which audience quizzes speakers.

AFL-CIO Pledges Aid, Support For Study of Food Industry

Full cooperation in a proposed government study of the food industry has been pledged by the AFL-CIO and leaders of two affiliated unions.

Labor is fully in support of a bill which would carry out Pres. Johnson's recommendation for the creation of a National Commission on Food Marketing, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told Chairman Warren Magnuson (D-Wash.) of the Senate Commerce Committee.

The study is greatly needed by the industry and the consuming public, particularly in view of a recent sharp drop in the prices paid to producers for beef—a phenomenon, Biemiller said, not accompanied by corresponding drops in retail prices paid by consumers.

"There is evidence," he wrote Magnuson, "of a mounting concentration of economic power on the part of the great retail food chains" followed by "allegations from some quarters that labor costs are principally responsible."

Union economists, Biemiller declared, "believe these charges to be completely unfounded" and labor will welcome an investigation of the economic factors at work and the development of sound remedial proposals.

Pres. Ralph Helstein of the Packinghouse Workers testified before Magnuson's committee that jobs in meat packing have dropped by 46,000 from 1956 to 1963 because of trends which have moved the bases of strength in the industry from the producer and processor toward the distributor.

Industry changes, he declared, have been made "harsher and more pervasive as a direct result of the growing power of the giant retail supermarket chains."

The UPWA head said that the meat packing firms complain, when negotiating contracts with the union, that their margins on fresh meat are "intolerable" but packers and processors, he noted, have "apparently been successful in protecting their margins" at the expense of both purchasers and food processors.

This they have done, he said, by "cost-cutting" in a number of ways, including wage-cutting and job-reduction.

Vice Pres. Leon B. Schachter of the Meat Cutters said labor costs in preparing meat for America's tables have dropped nearly 10 percent in the last five years—from 3.54 cents a pound in 1958 to 3.17 cents in 1963. At the same time production is 10 percent above that of 1956 while jobs for production workers have fallen 20 percent—from 188,000 workers to 150,000, he declared.

Retail labor costs for all foods sold have dropped about 2 percent in five years despite wage increases won by organized workers, he said. Schachter said a study of the food industry would "clear the air" of charges and might "provide guidelines" for more equitable economic relations among "all segments" of the industry.

Unique Pact Settles D. C. Symphony Strike

The Washington, D. C., Musicians and the National Symphony Orchestra Association have settled a five-week strike with an agreement to refer disputes over personnel to a 15-member players' committee.

The agreement, hailed as unique among symphony orchestras, also calls for maintenance of the status quo on all jobs for the 1964-1965 season, Sec. J. Martin Emerson of AFM Local 161 said.

In future disputes over dismissals, demotions, retirement or contract non-renewals, an aggrieved player may appeal to a committee composed of seven first-chair players — heads of sections — and eight rank-and-file musicians. When 10 or more committeemen agree on a course of action, that decision will be binding, it was agreed.

The symphony players had returned to work last fall after a dispute over salaries and length of season. Not long after their return the management dismissed the first trombonist and the third trumpeter, both active union supporters.

When the local claimed the firings were reprisals for union activity, the dismissals were appealed under the grievance section of the new contract. But then management dismissed a probationary member of the trombone section, demoted a member who headed the Musician's Committee last season, and took disciplinary action against 11 others.

The union said the strike was called—with 64 of the 79 members favoring a walkout—when "all remonstrances to the association proved ineffectual."

New York Salutes Union Presidents

New York—The New York City AFL-CIO has opened a series of programs planned to honor the presidents of international unions whose headquarters are in the city or who are residents identified with union and community activities.

The project opened with David Sullivan Week, designed to hail the president of the Building Service Employes. Sullivan is a longtime resident of Queens and former president of BSEIU Local 32B, which with 42,000 members is one of the largest local unions in the U.S.

For the second week the honor fell to Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers, whose union will celebrate its 50th anniversary at a convention here May 9-15. More than a score of union presidents live or work in the city.

Factory Jobs Drop In 8 Canadian Cities

Hamilton, Ont. — Manufacturing jobs dropped by more than 52,000 between 1957 and 1961 in eight major Canadian cities—Toronto, Hamilton and Ottawa, Ont.; Montreal and Quebec, Que.; Winnipeg, Man.; and Vancouver and Victoria, B.C.—according to a study by the Hamilton Industrial Commission.

Doubletime Seen Creating Jobs in Steel

Steelworkers Pres. David J. McDonald told Congress he is "convinced" that raising statutory overtime pay to doubletime would "create job opportunities in the steel industry."

In a statement submitted to a House Labor subcommittee, McDonald noted that last year, "when there was a sharp upsurge of production" in the steel industry, "there was also a sharp upsurge of overtime hours worked, and almost no increase in employment."

He said the Steelworkers have tried to open up job opportunities "to the degree we can, through collective bargaining."

McDonald cited the extended vacation plans in steel, aluminum and the can industries and "the encouragement we have given older employes to retire by enlarging the benefits available to them on retirement."

The USWA, he said, has also sought to provide in union agreements "for joint discussions at the plant level to seek to temper the amount of overtime worked while employes are laid off."

The USWA president added, however:

"While these provisions make a dent in unemployment, they cannot solve the problem by themselves. The reduction of overtime hours by legislation on an across-the-board basis is a further necessary and important approach."

Wage-Hour Exemptions Hit in Food Processing

Extension of full federal wage and hour-law coverage to 548,000 food processing workers was urged by Pres. Ralph Helstein of the Packinghouse Workers in testimony before a House Labor subcommittee.

Helstein said his union strongly supports a bill which would eliminate a current exemption from minimum wage and maximum hour coverage for workers employed in processing agricultural commodities within the "area of production" and asks elimination of a section of the Fair Labor Standards Act which permits the working of unlimited amounts of overtime for a 14-week period.

Helstein also urged the elimination of another FLSA section in which premium pay is required only after 56 hours in one week or 12 hours in one day. The lack of statutory protection undoubtedly is responsible, he said, at least in part for the fact that these workers are among the lowest paid in the nation.

"We find it paradoxical," Helstein said, "that the Administration can propose payment of doubletime for overtime in certain industries while at the same time supporting the retention of a period during which employers would be exempted from having to pay premium pay to thousands of the most underprivileged workers in the country."

This policy is "doubly confounding," he declared, "in view of the Administration's announced attack on the problem of poverty."

Helstein argued for the changes on the ground that many food processing industries, such as meat packing, operate without overtime exemptions; employment in canning and other industries has been stabilized; and exemptions give an unfair advantage to new employers.

Liberal Party Scores Saskatchewan Victory

Regina, Sask.—The voters of Saskatchewan turned the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (CCF) party out of office for the first time in 20 years and gave the revived Liberals an apparent victory in a cliff-hanging provincial election.

The Liberals won 33 seats in the new legislature, the CCF 25 seats and the Progressive Conservatives one seat. However, in nine of the election districts—four of them won by the Liberals—the vote was so close the results could be changed when the 25,000 absentee ballots are counted on May 13.

The CCF outpolled the winner in the popular vote, getting 257,028 or 40.5 percent of the 633,798 votes cast compared to 253,979 or 40.1 percent for the Liberals and 119,110 or 18.8 percent for the Conservatives.

Ross Thatcher, former CCF stalwart who bolted to the Liberals and led the party to victory, expressed confidence that the final count would leave the results unchanged.

The New Democratic Party, which was formed by organized labor and the CCF, still uses the CCF name in Saskatchewan elections.

In Montreal, Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress, said that "naturally we are disappointed" with the results.

"However," he added, "we do not interpret this result as indicating any change in the political or social philosophy of the people of Saskatchewan. Rather we interpret it as being due to that peculiar and irrational quirk in human nature which feels a change of government is desirable after a lengthy term of office. We are confident that the NDP in Saskatchewan will make a comeback."

At the dissolution of the last legislature the CCF held 34 seats and the Liberals 21 seats. One of the four new seats added, in a Regina district, was won by Sec.-Treas. Walter Smishek of the Saskatchewan Federation of Labor.

Analysts were unable to pinpoint any single factor as causing the downfall of the CCF after two decades of giving the voters some of the most advanced social legislation in North America. The outgoing government stood on its record. The Liberals and Conservatives accused it of policies that have led to industrial stagnation, and promised to cut taxes.

The CCF's controversial government-sponsored medical care insurance was not a major issue, as all parties supported it and the Liberals denied CCF suggestions that they would water it down.

Deck Officers Schedule Vote On Leadership

Miami Beach — The Masters, Mates & Pilots took a series of actions here at the 56th biennial convention to improve the union's organizing and bargaining position and sent to referendum an election contest for three top offices.

A 90-day secret mail ballot will start May 26, it was decided, with Pres. Charles M. Crooks and 10 other candidates for his post on the ballot. Sec.-Treas. John M. Bishop will have four opponents. There are eight candidates for vice president.

A resolution calling for the appointment of a new "independent" administrator of the welfare, pension and vacation trust fund was approved by the delegates. It will be referred to a coming meeting of the union-management board of trustees. The convention heard a report that trust fund administrative costs are too high.

William H. Penrose, staff analyst for the National Academy of Sciences' maritime cargo transportation conference, told the convention that an analysis of shipboard manpower and mechanization systems will get under way in July on 30 American-flag merchant ships.

The project is the result of a pilot study last summer aboard the cargo ship President Adams. MMP and six other unions cooperated in the survey.

Lawrence Schwartz, another Academy staff analyst, reported that nearly 40 percent of the union's 11,000 members took part in a recent mail survey of the seagoing work force. Preliminary results indicated, he said, that various forms of attrition within the ranks of licensed deck officers indicate a manpower shortage some time in the future.

Labor and AEC Agree on Safety

The AFL-CIO and the Atomic Energy Commission have reached agreement on radiation health and safety standards which will be included in the commission manual spelling out conditions of work for employes for AEC contractor operators.

The agreement was worked out after the AFL-CIO had protested the AEC's failure to extend to employes of all contractor operations the same safety and health standards set up for AEC contractor operations under the Walsh-Healey Act, effective Feb. 1.

Follows AFL-CIO Pattern:

Internal Disputes Machinery Approved by CLC Convention

resolution adopted at the 1962 convention in Vancouver. The Executive Council regards it, he said, as a way to settle jurisdictional disputes "without dismembering this labor movement." Several former affiliates have been ousted as a result of raiding charges.

Delegates who spoke from the floor all expressed agreement with the purpose of the plan, but some, especially those from building trades unions, were not sure it would do the job it is intended to do. On the final vote all but a handful gave their approval.

An anticipated fight over renewal of the CLC's support of the New Democratic Party failed to develop. Instead the delegates passed resolutions urging all affiliates to support the NDP and called for "more effective liaison" between the CLC and the party. The CLC gave its first endorsement to the NDP at a convention in Montreal four years ago.

In other political resolutions the convention urged all locals and local central bodies to work in municipal elections for "those social and political objectives which are supported by the labor movement," and demanded reapportionment of Parliament to give urban and suburban dwellers adequate representation.

The delegates voted to cooperate with the three-man board of trustees, named by the federal government to administer the five Canadian waterfront unions, who by agreement with Seafarers Pres. Paul Hall have settled on a course leading to new elections and restoration of autonomy.

Improvements in Canada's economy since the last CLC convention two years ago were welcomed in a statement on economic policy that also warned against the government's "apparent conviction that the basic economic problems are vanishing." The improvement, the statement said, should be seized upon as an opportunity to plan for "a sustained pace of high growth and full employment."

It offered a three-point program for growth—expansion of the public sector of the economy with emphasis on higher investment in social capital; a cut in income taxes, especially at the lower levels, to boost purchasing power, and a broadened social security program.

T. C. Douglas, leader of the New Democratic Party and its chief spokesman in Parliament, proposed to meet the problems posed by automation with a "massive assault on poverty" such as the Johnson Administration has started in the United States.

His program included improved social security measures, higher wages—especially minimum wages—higher incomes for farmers and fishermen, income tax cuts in the lower and middle income brackets, and a "massive" investment in new schools, hospitals, education, low-cost housing, municipal services and other forms of social capital.

Pres. Arne Geijer of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions reviewed ICFTU activities and urged the mature nations to invest more capital in the emerging countries so as to speed their economic and social development . Only a free labor movement unshackled by government can contribute to such development, he declared.

Robert Main, one of two fraternal delegates representing the British Trades Union Congress, described the status of organized labor in Great Britain's changing economy.

In other actions the convention:

- Demanded a workweek with a maximum of no more than 40 hours, higher minimum wages and doubletime for all overtime.
- Voted to press organization, especially in the white collar field.
- Welcomed "hopeful signs that the nightmare fear" of nuclear war has lifted, called for a total ban on all nuclear tests and for a "non-nuclear club of nations" which would not make, use or store such weapons, urged Canada to join the Organization of American States, and laid down policy on a wide range of additional international matters.
- Called for nationwide coordination of technical and vocational training and asked the federal government to institute a system of aid to education at all levels including university scholarships, for qualified students.

The convention unanimously reelected Pres. Claude Jodoin, Executive Vice Presidents William Dodge and Joe Morris, Sec.-Treas. Donald MacDonald and the four vice presidents—Mahoney, Canadian Dir. George Burt of the Auto Workers, Canadian Vice Pres. Frank Hall of the Railway Clerks and Vice Pres. William Jenovese of the Bricklayers.

The delegates voted to raise Jodoin's salary from $16,000 to $20,000 annually; the executive vice presidents from $13,000 to $16,000, and MacDonald from $14,000 to $17,500.

Revised All-Canada Pension Plan Proposed by Pearson Government

Ottawa, Ont.—A revised All-Canada Pension Plan geared to maximum benefits of $104.17 monthly after 10 years of contributions was made public by Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson following conferences with provincial premiers.

Participation would be compulsory for all workers at age 18 or over except for those earning $600 or less a year and for the self-employed earning $1,000 or less.

Financing would come from a tax of 1.8 percent on earnings between $600 and $5,000 a year paid by both the worker and his employer. The self-employed would pay both shares.

The new pension plan would leave unchanged the $75 per month old-age benefit to which each Canadian is entitled upon reaching the age of 70. However, it would amend the old-age benefit law to permit a person to take his payment at any time between the ages of 65 and 70 at a reduced rate, graduating upward from $51 at age 65.

When it can become effective was conjectural because of procedural difficulties. Legislative experts have not decided whether to amend the bill now before Parliament—which offers lower benefits—or to withdraw it and introduce a new measure.

In addition, a constitutional amendment is required to legalize benefits for widows irrespective of age, orphans and disabled contributors. This must be passed by both the House of Commons and the Senate, with approval of the provincial governments, and then given routine adoption by the British Parliament.

The required constitutional steps were expected to take at least two months, delaying introduction of a revised pension bill in Parliament until June 1 at the earliest. It was regarded as unlikely the government would be able to meet its original target of Jan. 1, for effectiveness of the plan, but July 1, 1965, was viewed as the latest date.

In Montreal Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress said delegates to the CLC convention over which he was presiding were bound to greet the revision with "satisfaction." The CLC will undertake a detailed study of the proposal, he said, and "will probably have some suggestions to make as to improvements."

"The future of this plan seems more assured than it was only a few years ago," he said. "This is good news for the workers of Canada and their families, and for other Canadians as well."

First benefits under the plan would be paid one year after its effective date and would be one-tenth of the full rate. Retirees in each ensuing year will receive an additional one-tenth until the full rate is reached after 10 years.

Benefits will be increased in line with any rise of up to 2 percent a year in the cost of living, and the starting ceiling of $5,000 on taxable earnings may be raised after a decade or more of operation in line with increases in average nationwide earnings.

A worker retiring at age 65 and entitled to the maximum pension of $104.17 could elect to take an old-age security benefit of $51 at the same time and have total payments of $155.17 until he dies. If he chooses to wait until 70 before taking the old-age benefit of $75, he would receive a total of $179.17.

As under the Social Security Act in the United States benefits are subject to reduction based on earnings if a pensioner continue to work after 65.

Benefit rates for survivors and orphans are still to be determined.

2 States Require Ship Identification

The governors of two states within a few days of each other signed into law legislation requiring that the country of registry be identified in all promotion of passenger services on any ship.

Gov. J. Millard Tawes of Maryland signed the bill in Annapolis at ceremonies at which the National Maritime Union, a backer of the legislation, was represented by Leo Strassman, Baltimore port agent, and Joseph Paul Curran, seaman and son of NMU Pres. Joseph N. Curran.

At Boston, Gov. Endicott Peabody signed the law, with NMU National Rep. Robert Nesbitt and John T. Hunt, Boston port agent, present. Only Illinois has a similar law, but bills are pending in the legislatures of New Jersey and Georgia.

Signal for Organizing:

Lakes Engineers Win 'Portable' Pensions

St. Louis—An agreement providing "portable" pensions of up to $300 a month for 1,000 engineers on 275 Great Lakes freighters has been reached by the Marine Engineers and 13 firms operating ore carriers.

An announcement to that effect led delegates to the MEBA convention here to approve an expanded organizing plan for the lakes and deep sea ports.

The delegates called also for improved benefits for maritime workers in government employ, and changed the union constitution to hold MEBA conventions every two years, instead of annually. The next convention will be held in 1966, it was agreed.

The new pension plan, hailed by MEBA Dist. 2 Pres. Raymond T. McKay as a major step toward security for licensed marine engineers, matches the gains MEBA recently won for its members on deepsea vessels, according to a union announcement.

The plan provides that engineers with 20 years of deepsea or freshwater service may retire at any age with a guaranteed pension of $300 a month. Under former pension plans the earliest retirement age with full benefits was 65, the union said.

Other advantages of the new system are that covered employes may carry pension credits from one fleet to another, or one vessel to another, in qualifying for full retirement or for early, reduced-benefit or disability retirement.

McKay said some retirement systems force engineers to retire at a certain age, but the Dist. 2 plan sets no arbitrary age limit. The new system also breaks established policy in some fleets requiring licensed officers to earn all their accrued pension credits with one employer.

The new plan, integrated with the MEBA deepsea pension plan, permits members to combine credits earned on the lakes or in salt water service.

Option Offered

As a means of more complete protection, the union and managements provided that engineers currently employed on ships operated by the major steel firms have the option of remaining under existing company plans and retiring at the specified age, or retiring after 20 years of service under the new MEBA plan, whichever is more advantageous.

The agreement also includes a beneficiary protection program specifying that, if an engineer dies suddenly with enough credits to retire but before applying for retirement benefits, his wife or other beneficiary may collect his pension benefits for a five-year period.

Under this provision, a beneficiary could collect $300 a month for a total of $18,000, the union stated.

McKay and Vice Pres. Mel Pelfrey, who led the union's lakes negotiating team, have proposed additional contract language guaranteeing that all licensed officers on company seniority lists be employed before steel management transports ore to the United States in foreign vessels.

This proposal will be put before a joint labor-management committee for consideration in the near future, McKay said.

Counseling Programs Hailed in Poverty War

Niagara Falls, N. Y.—In programs such as union counseling organized labor can help the poor and the troubled meet the social problems left in the wake of a changing world, according to AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the Community Services Committee.

"Many of our social problems originate because of change," he told the graduation dinner of the first annual union counseling course given here under the auspices of the United Givers Fund.

"Costs go up, but a pension remains the same and there is not enough money to meet hospital bills. The plant closes, and families must become mobile in search for a new job. Decaying slums become ghettos for the poor, who can't change their lives. Automation throws men out of jobs as fast as it turns out electric can-openers. Only change is constant."

Beirne, who is president of the Communications Workers, pinpointed some of the ways the AFL-CIO Community Services is helping the community meet the problems of poverty.

"Through consumer counseling courses we teach workers to get more for their dollar," he said. "Through rehabilitation programs, many workers are able to return to the job, and through the union counseling course, such as you have just completed, we are able to help many persons solve their problems and keep their jobs.

Referral Function Stressed

"The union counseling program is basically and fundamentally a referral type of function. The union counselor, it should be stressed, is not a social worker. It is his job to appraise the problems of union members and refer them to community facilities which are available. You new union counselors can be effective only if you make sure that your fellow union members know that your services are available."

Beirne also spelled out some of the ways the AFL-CIO is helping in the fight on poverty.

Legislative Aims

"We are fighting on the legislative front," he said. "We are for medical care for the aged, which would help many who are poor meet rising medical costs . . . for the extension of the minimum wage to millions not now covered and for an increase in the minimum to $2 an hour . . . [for] doubletime 'penalty' pay to induce employers to hire new workers . . . [for] "the 35-hour week, which would create some 2 or 2.5 million jobs."

Beirne said organized labor supports existing social agencies "rather than set up our own" because it feels this "is the best way to do the job—by cooperating with the rest of the community in supporting agencies for the entire community."

"A union member is first and foremost a member of the community," he observed, "and has a responsibility to the community to make it a better place to live and work and raise children."

Wurf Tops Zander by 21 Votes To Win AFSCME Presidency

By David L. Perlman

Denver—Delegates to the State, County & Municipal Employes convention here voted in a new slate of officers headed by Jerry Wurf, 45-year-old director of the union's New York City District Council.

Wurf narrowly edged out Arnold Zander, a founder of the union and its president since its first convention in 1936. The vote was 1,450 to 1,429 for Zander.

Twelve of the 13 candidates on the Wurf slate were victorious, including incumbent Sec.-Treas. Gordon Chapman. Chapman defeated William J. McEntee of Philadelphia, 1,566 to 1,302.

The presidential contest was a rematch of the AFSCME's 1962 convention, when Zander defeated Wurf by a 300-vote margin.

Chapman, a member of the same Madison, Wis., local as Zander, was first elected AFSCME secretary-treasurer in 1937. In 1961, he resigned to accept a State Dept. post, but at the union's 1962 convention he ran successfully for his former office. Early this year he formally aligned himself with the Wurf caucus, called the Committee on Union Responsibility.

Four incumbent vice presidents were re-elected: John Caldwell, Missoula, Mont.; James A. Broyer, Boston; N. B. Crippen, Tacoma, Wash.; Rena Ainsworth, Portland, Ore.

Six new vice presidents backing Wurf were elected, headed by the Rev. Albert Blatz of St. Peter, Minn.

Father Blatz, a state hospital chaplain, is believed to be the first priest ever elected an officer of an international union. He has previously served as president of his local and of the Minnesota State Council of AFSCME.

The other new vice presidents are Lilian Roberts of Chicago, who may be the first Negro woman elected to international union office; Ruby Wicker, Sacramento, Calif.; Harry Gray, New York; William Richard, Cincinnati, and Don McCullar, Houston.

The only winner on the administration slate was incumbent Vice Pres. Steve Clark, Madison, Wis.

For two and one-half days, as the convention moved through its routine opening stages, the political battle dominated the sessions. Partisans of each caucus bedecked with campaign buttons moved from delegation to delegation seeking out uncommitted delegates.

The Honest Ballot Association supervised the election, with delegates lining up before a network of voting booths to cast their ballots.

The convention had opened with a "state of the union" report from Zander which viewed the AFSCME as entering a "period of remarkable growth and progress." Zander said the expansion of city and state employment would continue and predicted that by 1980 one out of five workers will be in the public service.

The union has added many thousands of members in recent years, he said, adding that "much greater growth in membership" would have been possible with a higher per capita tax, which the union's leadership has sought unsuccessfully since 1958.

Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning described the field of public employment as "the future hope" of the labor movement. He also urged the delegates to take an active part in labor's political activities, warning that "the most aggressive union can be emasculated overnight by one act of a hostile congress."

He brought to the 1,131 delegates—the largest convention in the AFSCME history—a message from Pres. Johnson which praised the union's activity in the international free trade union movement and for pioneering in the United States in new cooperative housing ventures.

Speakers during the first three days included Sen. Frank E. Moss (D-Utah), who predicted that civil rights legislation will be enacted, and Nicholas Zonarich, organization director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., who urged the delegates to press harder for genuine collective bargaining in the public service, terming it "the most essential element in the labor movement."

On the convention agenda, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, were proposals to amend the constitution to provide for a higher per capita tax, additional votes for large locals, and regional elections of most vice presidents, plus a series of resolutions setting the union's legislative and collective bargaining program for the next two years.

2 Union Conventions To Hear Johnson

Two unions have announced that Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson has agreed to speak at their conventions.

The Clothing Workers said he will address the opening session of their 50th anniversary convention May 9 in the Singer Bowl at the New York World's Fair. Other sessions May 11-15 will be at the New York Hilton Hotel.

The Communications Workers said the President will speak June 17 at the CWA convention in Cleveland. The convention is scheduled for June 15-19.

Booklet Hails Union Course On Retirement

The Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare has published a "case study" of a retirement planning program sponsored by a local of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Roosevelt University as an example which other groups may wish to copy.

In a foreword to the booklet, Dir. Donald R. Kent of HEW's Office of the Aging says the eight-session course sponsored by IBEW Local 1859 in cooperation with Roosevelt University's Labor Division in Chicago "seems to be a pioneering project in the trade union movement."

Each of the eight weekly two-hour session was held in the union headquarters after working hours for a class of 15 couples in their late 50's or 60's.

The program was developed jointly by the union and university staff and has been given regularly since the fall of 1960. The local represents workers at Western Electric's Hawthorne plant in Cicero, Ill.

The booklet, entitled Planning for Retirement, Case Study 16, published by the Office of Aging of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, can be purchased for 15 cents from the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C.

Focus on Appalachia

PRES. JOHNSON'S dramatic tour of poverty-stricken Appalachia and his message requesting congressional action on specific programs to aid the area have refocused public attention on the dilemma of desperate need amidst affluence.

The President has carried his appeal to "enlist" in the war on poverty to every group he has spoken to in recent days, visibly reflecting and reacting to his first-hand look at the depths of despair in the mountain country.

He was especially eloquent to the labor editors at a news conference set up in the White House. There was a hard determination and evidence that he meant to get something done, and quickly.

The labor editors responded to the President's simple direct appeal, for they know the story well. They know that labor is no newcomer to the struggle to eradicate poverty, the struggle that is today's "war on poverty."

In 1960 AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany appeared before the Democratic Party and Republican Party platform committees meeting prior to the national convention and said in part:

"Twenty-three years ago it was fairly said that one-third of our nation was 'ill-fed, ill-clothed and ill-housed.' Today the one-third has shrunk to one-fifth; but that is still one-fifth too many.

"This is not just a humanitarian appeal. Even if we could ignore the tragic human costs of inadequate family income, frustration and lost self-respect that unemployment and under-employment bring—and they cannot be ignored—this mammoth waste of manpower is costing the nation billions of dollars in goods and services that we could be creating and using, but are not. The welfare of that one-fifth of the nation is a practical concern for us all.

"Let us remember that we have not abolished poverty in this country. We still have over 7 million families and single individuals whose total income is less than $2,000 a year; and almost 3 million whose income is less than $1,000. Those are shameful figures for America in 1960.

"I agree that it is proper to look at our country as a whole; to keep in mind the well-fed, well-clothed and well-housed majority, as well as the others. Certainly I am not one of those who brushes aside our achievements and looks only at our shortcomings.

"But I repeat—as well as we have done, we must do better. Above all, we can never accept poverty as an established condition in America."

IN THE YEARS since 1960 the AFL-CIO has urged Congress to enact programs that labor believes will go a long way toward wiping out the disgrace of poverty amidst plenty. It has welcomed Johnson's "war on poverty" program and supported his bill before a House committee as an important step forward.

The "war on poverty" has been labor's war back over the past 100 years; it was labor's war when in 1960 the nation was congratulating itself on the new affluence; it is labor's war today.

'We've Got to Help Them'

At White House Session:

President Terms Labor Press 'Conscience of Our Society'

The following is excerpted from Pres. Johnson's remarks to the Secretary of Labor's Conference for Labor Editors. The President addressed the ILPA members in the East Room of the White House.

IT GIVES ME a great deal of pleasure to welcome you, the members of the Intl. Labor Press Association. All of you here are in your own right, you are the voice of millions of workers, men and women whom we are here to serve, and men and women who serve the ownership of this house you are meeting in this evening, men and women whose welfare is your principal concern. I came over here to talk to you about it because the welfare of those men and women is also my principal concern.

We have the highest employment in our history as we meet here today. The vast majority of Americans are doing very well. In the midst of such prosperity it is too easy for people to lose sight of the problems which have not been solved, the difficulties which have not been mastered, and I assume that is one of the reasons for your coming here, and one of the reasons for your wanting to meet with the leaders of government.

Well, what about these serious problems? They do exist—the problems of unemployment, the underutilization of plant equipment, discrimination against minorities, discrimination against aged and the handicapped, against women, of inadequate medical care, of the inability of our educational system to equip all of our citizens to their fullest capacity.

But these are the problems which America faces. They are problems which can only be solved by an informed citizenship. This requirement calls all of us to give them attention. This recurrent sounding of the call to battle is one of the most valuable contributions that can be made by the labor press in the United States.

You are a part of the conscience of our society. You are always goading. You are never satisfied with the job that is partially done. You are always working and calling for the further advancement of working people, and you speak from a point of view. You speak on behalf of values.

I think you generally speak out of deep commitment to justice at the working place, to self-government in economic life, to an improvement in our society through a continuing improvement in the lot and opportunity of individual working persons and their families.

So your strength and your great influence flow from the belief of American labor that a just society can best be built within the framework of democratic institutions and through the free processes of a free country.

From this long tradition has grown the modern labor movement and its voice and the labor movement's voice—your voice, the labor press.

I think all Americans are grateful for that voice. It has spoken so often and so eloquently on behalf of programs to make a greater and a better society, to improve the welfare of all Americans. It has spoken for free labor, free from the influence of those who would corrupt this great mainstream of American life, free from those who would turn the hopes of working men into an instrument of attack. You have helped to fight many battles on many fronts.

I CAME OVER HERE today to put a proposition up to you. I want to ask you to do something for your country and for your kiddies and for your President. I want to ask you to enlist now in the army—some of you are above the draft age and I can't force you to do it, but I want to ask you to volunteer to join the army in our war against poverty.

Franklin Roosevelt talked about the one-third that were ill-clad, ill-fed and ill-housed. After working 30 years with your hope and your crusades and your radical editorials and all of those things, we have it down to one-fifth, but we still have 20 percent, one out of every five, that are in the poverty group.

Twenty years ago, 5 percent over a 10-year period, coming out from 1942 to 1952, and from 1952 to 1962 it was 3 percent, and now it is 1 percent that is coming out—1 percent a year. From 1937 to 1947 it was 5 percent, 1947 to 1953 it was 3 percent, 1953 to 1963 it is 1 percent.

So you are going to have to be crusaders that lead the parade and you are the ones who are going to have to get us at least a few Republican votes on our poverty bill that is pending up here. We don't want a Democratic bill; we don't want a Republican bill. We want an American bill, for all Americans who are in this lower group.

Let this be said: that the real war to end all wars must be the war to eliminate poverty. Let this be known as a generation of Americans who made it their personal duty to give every American an equal and fair chance.

Morgan Says:

Johnson Leads All GOP Rivals In Appeal to Florida's Voters

By Edward P. Morgan

MIAMI, FLA.—Florida provides an interesting vantage point from which to view the national political scene.

The socalled Sunshine State is not likely to play a pivotal part in the naming of either party's presidential nominee or in the outcome in November unless it involves a 1960-like photo finish. But Miami and other communities flourishing on both the Atlantic and Gulf coasts represent one of the country's newest industries, catalogued under the hyphenated label of recreation-and-retirement.

Morgan

Here a sociologist can study the folkways and the mores of the rapidly developing leisure class in the middle-income bracket and probe the behaviorism of senior citizens who have settled down under a transplanted palm tree alongside some real estate developer's carefully bulldozed lagoon. Parts of Florida retain the vestiges of the Old South, up-country areas along the Georgia line still populated with "red necks" as the fiercely unsophisticated rural folk are sometimes irreverently called. But paced by Miami's Dade County and the ramifications of the rocket and missile industries which Cape Kennedy represents, the state is broadening its viewpoint, relatively speaking.

Though he carried Dade County, John F. Kennedy lost Florida in 1960 but not by such a wide margin that he and his strategists were discouraged about 1964.

There seems to be a danger that Florida voters, in some communities at least, will be exhausted before they can get to the polls in November. The Greater Miami area, for example, has had half a dozen elections in various categories in the last three months and a statewide primary is coming up on May 5 in which three Republicans and six Democrats are jostling for the gubernatorial nomination of their respective parties.

By and large, however, this looks like a Democratic year in Florida and Lyndon B. Johnson overshadows today any potential GOP rival. Interestingly enough, one local candidate has put out bumper stickers proclaiming "I am a Kennedy-Johnson Democrat."

When reminded that Walter Lippmann had written not long ago that the President was not so much a "wheeler-dealer" as a "healer" among warring factions of our society, an attractive Miami housewife and businesswoman sweetly wanted to know who Lippmann was. She confessed she had never heard of him. The dean of American columnists is not likely to worry about his occasional lack of identity or the size of his image and though Pres. Johnson would, as a conscientious politician should, he need not in Florida—or so a quick glance would make it seem.

People appear to feel "comfortable" with him, and as he gains confidence himself he may well drive the Republicans to a higher degree of distraction than they are suffering now in their search not only for a candidate but for issues.

One shrewd observer, recently returned to Miami from Washington, got the distinct and educated impression in the capital that the President was preparing to run a campaign on as lofty a plane as possible. A masterful politician, the President may be preparing to stay, if he can, "above politics" and emphasize his oft-repeated phrase that he is "the President of all the people"—and the only one they now have.

PARADOXICALLY enough, such a judgment might be the wisest possible political move anyway if the country is as concerned about presidential succession as some pollsters have found it since Nov. 22. Political considerations, of course, cannot be entirely absent in any case.

One interesting speculation heard here is that if the Republicans should do the improbable (in politics nothing is impossible) and nominate their current absentee favorite, Henry Cabot Lodge, it would strengthen the logic of picking Adlai Stevenson for the Democrats' No. 2 spot.

The logic being that Stevenson not only has been considered presidential timber in his own right but he has faced down the Russians at the United Nations too and that will dilute Lodge's principal claim to fame—his career as Pres. Eisenhower's ambassador to the UN.

The unknown quantity, in Florida as elsewhere, is the issue of civil rights. If it explodes, as it threatens to, the damage to the Administration could be devastating though there is no assurance the Republicans would gain a commensurate advantage. If it does not explode Washington may have time to turn to an issue that is becoming livelier and livelier in Florida: with the scientists hinting that people may soon live an average of 20 years longer, what are they going to do between the ages of 70 and 90?

Washington Reports:

Grass-Roots Support Stressed As Key to Rights Bill Passage

PASSAGE OF THE civil rights bill in the Senate depends to a great extent upon the support of the "people back in the communities of the nation," Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.) asserted on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on more than 700 stations.

Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.), floor leader with Humphrey of the bipartisan civil rights forces, declared on the same program that "this piece of legislation has been more misrepresented and more falsified by the people who are opposed to it than any other piece of legislation in my years here in the U.S. Senate."

The senator referred to full-page ads carried in newspapers "from California to New York . . . out of money appropriated by the Mississippi legislature to a so-called quasi-public corporation."

"Fortunately," said Humphrey, "the leaders of all the great religions of this country, many of our top business and professional and labor people have spoken up for this legislation."

Humphrey also said the people in the communities have the responsibility to try to work out problems of discrimination without having to resort to legislative or judicial processes.

The Minnesota senator said that "just as some of us have deplored the violence in demonstrations by Negro leaders and groups, I deplore also that there are citizens of the white race who refuse to take on their responsibilities as civic leaders to try to work the problems out. Instead they agitate, they irritate."

Both groups, he declared, are extremist.

KUCHEL SAID that the civil rights bill now before the Senate has been based on the experiences of states that already have similar legislation. He took, as one example, the public accommodations section, similar to a law that California has had on the books for 75 years.

He suggested that some of the titles in the bill before Congress do not go as far as they might. The registration and voting standards, in his opinion, he said, should apply to local and state elections as well as national.

Humphrey said it is essential that civil rights be enacted by Congress before the national conventions.

"I don't want to see this issue kicked around in political party conventions as a partisan issue," he said, "because it isn't partisan. It's a moral, a national issue."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE SECOND SESSION of the 88th Congress is heading toward its fifth month, with Pres. Johnson coaxing, prodding and appealing for action on major bills, and the total record and the date of final adjournment still to be determined.

Two substantive pieces of legislation have been completed this year—the tax reduction bill on which the late Pres. Kennedy laid the groundwork and which Mr. Johnson drove to passage, and the wheat-cotton bill.

While the Senate drones through its civil rights filibuster, the House is substantially on schedule in handling the 11 major appropriation bills on which action is supposed to be completed by June 30—the end of the fiscal year. Five of the appropriation measures, including the huge $46.7 billion Defense Dept. money bill, have been passed by the House. It is anybody's guess when the Senate will get around to money bills, although subcommittee hearings are being held.

The House has passed a food-stamp bill, to improve the diet of low-income families and make a sensible use of surplus farm products, and the Senate would normally be expected to approve it. The House has also passed, of course, the civil rights bill now on the Senate floor, and a bill on taxes on purchase of foreign securities, designed to help reduce the country's balance-of-payments deficit.

House committees have completed hearings and approved, or soon are expected to approve in some form, various Administration measures. The Education & Labor Committee after hearings is weighing action on Johnson's anti-poverty program.

THE PRESIDENT himself stripped down to five measures what he considers as priority legislation on which he has asked Congress to act before the political party conventions this summer.

The "priority" bills include civil rights, the food-stamp bill and the anti-poverty program. In addition, he asked for action on the long-pending social security hospital care bill, still stuck in the House Ways & Means Committee, and a federal pay-raise bill to which he attaches extreme importance.

Top officials—cabinet members, agency members, even subcabinet officials—work for the federal government at a direct and substantial sacrifice in personal income, and only those who have accumulated private resources can afford to stay very long.

A pay-raise bill was beaten in the House Mar. 12, because in an election year some members did not dare vote on a rollcall for $10,000 pay raises for themselves tied to raises for members of the executive and judicial branches. A modified bill for $7,500 raises will offer a second chance.

Candid observation suggests that action on all five of the "priority" bills is not likely before the Republican National Convention opens in San Francisco July 13, with platform committee hearings scheduled the preceding week. Until the Dixie filibuster on civil rights is broken, no one will know if Congress will recess for the GOP meeting and return for a few weeks before the Democratic National Convention opening Aug. 24, or whether an earlier adjournment is in prospect.

SUCCESSFUL PASSAGE of the civil rights bill by both houses, without substantial damage by the amendment and watering-down process hoped for by some opponents, would nevertheless put a creditable climax to the two-year record of the 88th Congress.

Despite the painful delays, the infinite amount of struggle, the reluctance of key committees to move, the Kennedy-Johnson prodding and pushing has produced some action.

The tax bill was a major achievement, although it did not include the basic reforms needed to restore equity by the plugging of loopholes favoring a specialized few. There was a breakthrough last year on federal assistance to education at the college and medical-school level, and on an expanded and modernized vocational training program.

A great deal remains to be done. If there are final failures, the people have their ancient recourse of using their votes next November to build a better Congress.

CIVIL RIGHTS MUST BECOME LAW before the national party conventions, Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.), left, declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.), right, and Humphrey are the bipartisan floor leaders for the bill.

How to Buy:

Come to the Fair—And Come At Prices Within Your Range

By Sidney Margolius

IF YOU'RE PLANNING to come to the New York World's Fair this summer, consider that group tours can cut the cost by one-third to one-half.

This is the experience of several labor unions and consumer co-ops around the country who already have planned group tours with the help of the American Travel Association. The ATA is a non-profit travel agency owned by a number of labor unions, co-ops and credit unions and farm organizations.

In the Washington, D. C., area, for example, the Greenbelt Consumer Services has organized a series of weekend trips for members at a cost of only $28 a person including round-trip transportation, hotel (two nights, sharing a double room) and admissions to the fair. In Detroit, a Ferndale co-op has organized nine-day and 12-day trips. A nine-day trip, which visits Gettysburg National Park and Washington as well as the New York Fair, costs members of the group $140.

As an example of savings through group tours, the $28 Greenbelt trip would cost about $40 on an individual basis, this writer figures.

Privately owned travel agencies also arrange group tours, but ATA generally is able to provide lowest prices since it is a nonprofit cooperative. It also is safer than some commerically sponsored tours which may reduce quality by including excessive free time and "optional side trips" at extra cost.

Groups that want assistance in arranging trips to the fair, or other domestic or foreign tours, can contact the American Travel Association, 630 Third Avenue, New York, N. Y., 10017, or 1012-14th Street, N.W., Washington, D. C., 20005.

Individual Trips: If you plan to visit the fair individually, note that a number of railroads and bus lines offer special round trip rates. Some offer a special combination rate from nearby locations, including rail fare and fair admission, so that the usual $2 admission costs $1.

Lodging: The Hotel & Motel Trades Council of New York advises that all hotels and motor inns in the New York City area are unionized. A Hotel & Motel Guide listing the 1964 rate schedule in New York and the surrounding areas is available free from the New York World's Fair Housing Bureau, 30 Rockefeller Plaza, New York 20, New York.

THE RATES LISTED in this guide, however, should be considered only approximate. The Housing Bureau admitted to us that some of the hotels have raised their rates for the fair, even though they had signed contracts to hold to their announced schedules.

Usually hotels outside of the New York midtown area are less expensive; those below 33rd Street and above 60th. While the most centrally located hotels often charge $14 and up for a couple in a double room with bath, such hotels as the St. George and Bossert in Brooklyn near Manhattan, or in uptown Manhattan or the Bronx, may have rooms for only $10 and up.

For motorists, New York City itself does not have the standard type of motels right in Manhattan, but has the more expensive type of motor inn (most charge $16 up for a couple). However, motels are available in Queens (where the fair itself is located), in Bronx, Nassau County (adjacent to Queens), and in nearby Westchester County, New Jersey and Connecticut.

Although the New York and surrounding hotels are not sold out at the fair, at this writing, it is safest to have reservations. You can make reservations through the Housing Bureau at 30 Rockefeller Plaza, or directly from the hotels.

You don't really need a car to see New York and the fair since public transportation is abundant and cheap (15 cents on the subways). The Long Island Railroad also offers special combinations of transportation and fair admission at reduced rates. Even if you do drive the family to New York, it may save to leave your car at your motel and use public transportation since parking at the fair is $1.50.

AFL-CIO CONTRIBUTION of $15,000 is presented to Red Cross officials at Anchorage, Alaska, for relief of Good Friday earthquake victims by Pres. Robert E. McFarland of Alaska State AFL-CIO. Safety Council Says:

Fatalities in Traffic Could Be Cut in Half

TRAFFIC FATALITIES, at record highs for more than two years with no signs of declining, could be cut in half if already known corrective measures were placed in effect in their entirety, the National Safety Council declared.

The cost would be upwards of half a billion dollars annually, but the savings resulting from the reduction of accidents would be six to eight times this amount yearly. Traffic accidents currently cost the nation nearly $8 billion annually.

Traffic deaths in 1963 totaled 44,300 and in the 12 months ended Feb. 29 has risen to 45,680.

If corrective measures revealed in an analysis of traffic programs of all 50 states and nearly 1,300 cities were applied 100 percent, fatalities would drop 22,000 to 23,000 annually, the council asserted.

The council's recommendations are contained in a 112-page report which will be sent to the governors and key legislators in all 50 states. In addition it will be sent to safety organizations throughout the country.

The biggest single item in the council's recommendations calls for the addition of 24,000 men to state and local police forces at an estimated annual cost of $217 million.

This would be an increase of about 20 percent from the approximately 118,000 police personnel currently assigned to traffic by the cities and states.

The council said that an additional $62 million needs to be spent annually on driver education in the public schools. New drivers, born since World War II, are increasing at a rate three times faster than that of older drivers.

Young drivers who have had formal driver education have substantially better driving records than those who have not.

Traffic engineering needs for the states include the addition of 1,130 men at an annual cost of $9 million while cities need 600 more persons assigned full time to traffic engineering at a cost of $3.5 million.

Moreover, man-days of maintenance in the states on traffic control devices, such as signs, signals and markings should be increased 239,212 at an annual cost of nearly $6 million. In 1962 there were 358,121 man-days spent on this work, not enough to maintain these devices so they will not lose their effectiveness.

Total expenditures to bring cities with 5,000 or more population up to 100 percent of the program would amount to approximately $260 million a year with state expenditures totaling only slightly less.

About $150 million more should be expended annually for improved driver licensing procedures, motor vehicle inspection, more accurate record keeping, and for improved traffic safety programs in counties and cities under 5,000 population which are difficult to evaluate precisely because of lack of satisfactory reporting procedures.

The council's recommendations are based on an annual traffic inventory which the council has administered since 1947.

Since it was put in effect the rate of traffic deaths declined steadily until 1962, Council Pres. Howard Pyle said. One of the principal reasons for this reversal is the fact that the chances of having an auto accident increase faster than the number of vehicles because the opportunity for two vehicle collisions increases even faster than an increase in mileage.

For example, Pyle said, there were four times as many vehicles in 1963 as in 1933. Four vehicles in 1933 had 12 chances for collision, whereas 16 vehicles in 1963 had 240 chances for a collision.

By 1975 it is estimated there will be six times as many vehicles as there were in 1933. Hence, 24 vehicles in 1975 would have 552 chances for collision.

From Soup to Nonsense:

No Matter How You Look at It, It's in Peril of Becoming a Bore

By Jane Goodsell

IF WE DON'T WATCH OUT, sex is going to go the way of chain letters, calypso music and mah jongg. In fact, I wouldn't be surprised if it's already passed its peak and is on its way out right now.

Oh, I know, I know. It seems to be at the very zenith of its popularity. Look at the movies. They begin where old-fashioned movies used to fade out—at the bedroom door. Just try (as I recently did) to find a movie suitable for a birthday party of eight-year-olds. Just try to find one that doesn't bill itself as "a trail-blazer of sexual frankness, revealing intimacies never before seen on the screen."

Look at the books on the best-seller lists. Whereas authors in less enlightened eras used to tiptoe out of the boudoir, sprinkling asterisks as they closed the door behind them, writers now furnish us with factual information as precisely detailed as a recipe.

Take magazines. No self-respecting periodical goes to press these days without at least one article analyzing, ogling or tsk-tsking some aspect of sex. And a number of un-self-respecting periodicals devote entire issues to the subject.

Look at advertising. Granted that sex has a raison d'etre in perfume and hosiery ads, but is it really pertinent in TV commercials for razor blades and electric dishwashers?

Remember the Hutsut Song? No matter where you went, you couldn't get away from it. That's the way it is these days with sex. And what worries me isn't that we're in danger of becoming a nation of sex fiends. Quite the contrary. I'm scared that we're going to lose interest in the whole business.

Don't forget what happened to the hula hoop. For quite a spell, it was the hottest item around.

THEN ONE DAY, for no explicable reason, millions of people simultaneously got fed up with the hula hoop. The hoop had had it. Quite without warning, it was out. Its appeal was gone.

Now, don't mistake me. I don't equate sex with the hula hoop. But I believe that other people do, and that's what upsets me. Sex is becoming a marketable commodity, a gimmick for selling cigarettes, deodorants and toothpaste. It has become a substitute for the weather as a conversational ice-breaker.

No matter how you look at it (and we've looked at it every which way from lip-smacking leers to statistical graphs) sex is in danger of becoming—of all things!—a bore. Actually, it's a tribute to the durability of sex that it's still perking along despite the way it's been kicked around.

But let's not push our luck too far. Bear in mind that today's yum-yum can all too easily turn into tomorrow's ho-hum. Sex is worth saving. We can't let it fizzle out like the Twist.

'Only Practical Approach':

King-Anderson Seen Spur to Private Plans

continue and even flourish. But they can never do the job alone."

Spokesmen for private insurance firms came under sharp questioning from the subcommittee, a unit of the Senate's Special Committee on Aging.

Coverage Held Adequate

Walter M. Foody, Jr., a vice president of Continental Casualty Co. said "a substantial majority" of the aged now have health insurance, and he claimed the extent of coverage "is increasing rapidly."

The industry has offered "adequate coverage" to the elderly, Foody insisted. But he declined, under questioning by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) to define "adequacy" or to estimate the percentage of elderly policyholders whose health insurance coverage is "adequate."

Later, Cruikshank told the subcommittee that statements that persons over 65 have adequate insurance available is as valid as saying that "everyone has a Cadillac available."

Foody acknowledged that his company had boosted its premiums on its "Golden 65" health insurance program about 30 percent recently, bringing the cost of the full package to $50 a month for an elderly couple, and added that he expects the cost of insurance to continue to rise.

Another industry spokesman, Vice Pres. Edward J. Kelly of the Bankers Life & Casualty Co., said his company currently insures more than 650,000 persons over 65 "under various hospital benefit plans" but he, also, refused to discuss "adequacy" of coverage. He acknowledged that some of his company's low-cost policies provide benefits as low as $4 a day for hospital bills.

The Social Security Administration reported to the subcommittee that its latest survey shows that about 51 percent of people 65 and older had some form of hospital insurance and another 1 percent had coverage for other types of medical expense, not including hospital care. At least 8.3 million aged persons were without any type of health insurance protection, the agency said.

While 61 percent of persons 65 and over in relatively good health had insurance, the percentage dropped to 53 percent of those reporting fair health and down to 37 percent for those in poor health.

Cruikshank told the subcommittee that collective bargaining, despite strenuous efforts by unions to provide protection for retired workers, has not and cannot solve the nation's health care for the aged problem.

"To attempt to meet the problem of financing health care in old age through collective bargaining is like using an eye dropper and a sieve to bail out a sinking battleship," he declared.

Most Companies Resist

Most companies continue to resist union demands for health insurance coverage of retired workers, Cruikshank said, and existing coverage is spotty and often inadequate. Even where plans exist, he said, many retired workers have not had sufficient service with their last employer to qualify for benefits. Layoffs and plant shutdowns compound the problems, he noted.

Labor, Cruikshank told the subcommittee, is "cognizant of the problem faced by all Americans, not just our own members, when they reach retirement age and face the fear of high and sudden medical bills that can wipe out their resources. We are concerned about the plight of all Americans, not just our members, when they are confronted with the hard choice between paying an aged parent's medical bills or helping their children get an education."

The "inadequate" health insurance being offered to the elderly may give insurance companies some hope of obtaining protection against legislation, he said, "but the aged can have little hope of obtaining meaningful protection against the high costs of needed health care."

Commenting on proposals to raise basic social security benefits as an alternative to providing hospital insurance coverage, Cruikshank stressed that a "cost-of-living" rise in social security benefits would merely bring recipients up to 1958 purchasing power and would not leave them extra buying power for expensive insurance policies.

HEALTH INSURANCE protection for persons over 65 is "woefully inadequate," AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Nelson Cruikshank declares at Senate hearings. At right is Lisbeth Bamberger, assistant director of the Dept. of Social Security.

Bookbinders Move Headquarters Office

The Bookbinders have moved their Washington, D. C., offices from the AFL-CIO Bldg. to 900 City Bldg., 1612 K Street, N.W., Washington 6. The telephone number remains NA. 8-7088, Pres. John Connolly and Sec.-Treas. Wesley A. Taylor said.

Johnson Repeats Pledge On Old-Age Health Care

Pres. Johnson has pledged "continued efforts" by the Administration to secure enactment of a social security program for hospital benefits to the aged.

In a letter to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, the President acknowledged the federation's concern with problems of the nation's senior citizens. Meany had written him urging that "the most meaningful observance" of the month of May as Senior Citizens Month would be passage of the social security hospital bill, and stated that labor's participation of the month would be keyed to that theme.

Johnson recalled that at a recent press conference he had included the hospital-care bill as among the five "priority" measures he wanted Congress to pass this year.

"We shall continue our efforts to secure action on this legislation," he wrote Meany. People needing hospital care in their "twilight years", he said, "deserve more than to have to ask for hand-outs or think of themselves as burdens on their families and on society. They deserve better treatment and they must have it."

The bill is pending in the House Ways & Means Committee, the tax-writing unit that usually initiates social security system programs.

Senate Rights Fight Nears 1st Test Vote

contempt cases involving alleged violations of the voting rights and public accommodations sections.

The agreed-on amendment was accepted by both the Democratic and Republican Senate leaders, Senators Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) and Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.), and by the bipartisan floor managers for the rights measure, Senators Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.). It would extend the jury-trial provision, in case of a severe sentence, to all alleged criminal violations of court orders under the pending bill.

In the 1957 voting rights bill, the first civil rights measure passed by Congress since 1876, jury trials in criminal contempt cases were provided in all cases in which conviction was punishable by a fine of more than $300 or a jail sentence of more than 45 days.

The possibility of the first test showdown on amendments to the rights bill developed when Dirksen, as Republican leader, served public notice that unless the southern filibuster forces permitted a vote he would move for cloture and said, "We have the votes to get it."

Southerners Caucus

The southerners under the leadership of Sen. Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.) promptly caucused, announced they would not accept a unanimous-consent agreement "this week" for a rollcall, but said through Russell they would consider the issue again the week beginning May 4.

A cloture test on the jury-trial amendment, requiring the support of two-thirds of the senators present and voting, would not go to the heart of major controversies involved in Senate debate on the House bill—the sections on federal guarantees of fair employment practices and on access by minority-group members to public accommodations such as hotels, motels and restaurants.

As proposed by Dirksen, the cloture test would apply to the jury-trial amendment alone.

It was considered possible that southern senators might accept a vote on the single amendment without forcing the Senate to the laborious cloture process.

Engle Withdraws From Senate Race

Sen. Clair Engle (D-Calif.) has withdrawn from the race for a second term on the advice of his physicians.

Engle, who was elected with strong labor support in 1958 after eight terms in the House, has undergone surgery on two occasions. He had steadfastly insisted that he would be able to make a vigorous renomination race, but said after his second operation that he would have to devote himself to "the battle to regain my health."

Leading candidates in the June 2 California Democratic primary to succeed Engle are State Controller Alan Cranston and former White House Press Sec. Pierre Salinger. Cranston was endorsed last month by California COPE.

Carey Scores Quota System In Immigration

The quota system governing immigration into the United States has "seriously damaged" this country's image abroad, Pres. James B. Carey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers told a citizenship conference in Washington.

The McCarran-Walter Immigration Act of 1952 is based on the philosophy that "only North Europeans are suitable for American citizenship," Carey said, and this is foreign to our experience and especially foreign to the experience of our trade union movement, which has often been "inspired and led" by "immortal union leaders" who came through the "golden door" from many lands.

The AFL-CIO in its November 1963 convention in New York endorsed the immigration reform bill sponsored by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) and Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.), Carey reminded his audience, the American Immigration & Citizenship Conference.

The "discriminatory" and "unscientific" McCarran-Walter Act assigns Great Britain an annual "quota" of acceptable immigrants of 65,000, less than half of which is filled, and assigns Germany 24,000, which it "never fills," Carey pointed out, while heavily populated southern European and Asian countries are "baffled" by paradoxically small quotas.

Presidents Truman, Kennedy and Johnson have urged reform of the McCarran-Walter Act, to judge potential immigrants "by what they are rather than their origin," he emphasized, and the rest of the world cannot understand why it is not done.

Hospital Care Backers Urged to Write Doctors

Kansas City—If doctors here start getting letters from patients urging support for the King-Anderson bill to provide hospital care for the elderly through social security, credit it to a suggestion from Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.).

The American Medical Association, leading opponent of social security health care, has been trying to drum up a letter-writing campaign against the King-Anderson bill.

Bolling, addressing a senior citizens' dinner sponsored by the Auto Workers, said:

"I suggest that we have the responsibility of informing the American Medical Association that most of our people do support medicare. I urge, therefore, that each of you write to your family doctor and tell him just how you feel about this program. Let us adopt the techniques that are being used against us . . . we might cause our local doctors to wonder just what the American Medical Association is doing in their name."

Bolling praised the medical profession for having "provided us with the means to a healthier and longer life," but added:

"What a cruel paradox it is, therefore, to find that the very men who have created the means by which we can hope to live longer are at the same time almost entirely united in a bitter attempt to keep those very means from the people for whom they were meant."

The "cold truth," Bolling said, is that as a person grows older his medical needs increase and his income decreases. "The combination results in a situation where the aging must borrow from the bread money to buy medicine—or do without."

He urged the nation's physicians to "take the mid-Victorian social concepts of the American Medical Association and put them on the shelf alongside the nostrums and superstitions that they abandoned long ago."

Labor Denounces Prison Labor Bill

Newark, N. J.—A bill which would permit private employers to contract for the use of prison labor has been sharply denounced by Sec.-Treas. Charles H. Marciante of the New Jersey State AFL-CIO.

Rapid Growth Predicted for Dental Plans

Chicago — Dental prepayment plans, which now cover about 1.5 million persons, are "destined for a period of rapid growth in the near future," AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank predicted in a speech prepared for the American Dental Association conference here.

Union members as "consumers" of dental care are seeking "quality care at a fair price," Cruikshank declared.

In his address, which was read to the conference by Richard Shoemaker of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, Cruikshank urged the dental profession "to keep an open mind and a willingness to experiment in various forms of prepayment."

In order to make prepaid dental care generally available in all areas, he said, "more than one approach will be required."

PRES. JOHNSON, touring areas of declining employment and the "pockets of poverty" in Appalachia, greets wellwishers who met his airplane at the Pittsburgh Airport. Behind the President is Pres. David J. McDonald of the Steelworkers.

U.S. House Majority Leader Urges Oklahomans to Reject 'Work' Law

Rep. Carl Albert (D-Okla.), majority leader of the House, has urged the voters in his home state to defeat a so-called "right-to-work" constitutional amendment in a May 5 referendum.

Albert told Oklahomans that their state has had "very good" labor-management relations, and added: "Our laboring people have made a fine record and should not, in my opinion, be subjected to punitive legislation. Most of our working people are opposed to the proposed amendment. In exercising my right as a citizen, I, for one, shall vote against it. I think it should be defeated."

Both of Oklahoma's senators, Mike Monroney and J. Howard Edmondson, have declared their opposition to "right-to-work," as have all leading candidates in the Democratic senatorial primary.

Albert's statement was made to the National Council for Industrial Peace, which has been carrying on a battle to force an Oklahoma City radio and television station to allow the use of statements from prominent Americans opposing laws banning union shop agreements.

The station, WKY and WKY-TV, owned by E. K. Gaylord, publisher of the city's two daily newspapers, have refused to permit the use of authenticated quotations from prominent Americans unless accompanied by a written waiver for each person quoted.

One effect of this has been to bar the use of statements recorded by the late Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, who was co-chairman of the industrial peace council.

Roosevelt Joins Protest

Her son, Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), has joined the NCIP in protesting the censorship, declaring:

"My mother stated her case against so-called 'right-to-work' in numerous radio and television interviews. I can testify that she never changed her attitude. . . . The people of Oklahoma have a right to hear her voice and reasoning against such legislation."

He noted that Mrs. Roosevelt refuted an attempt by "right-to-work" supporters in 1958 to claim that the late Pres. Roosevelt supported a ban on the union shop. At that time, the former First Lady declared: "Franklin Delano Roosevelt would never have supported such a reactionary doctrine."

Accusing the "right-to-work" promoters of having "no shame," the California congressman declared:

"They sought to besmirch the reputation of my father; now they seek to silence the voice of my mother."

Statement in House Record

Later Roosevelt charged in the House that the Gaylord "effective newspaper and radio and television monopoly is being used to advance the cause of 'right-to-work' in Oklahoma" and entered on the record the text of a statement he had recorded "for the people of Oklahoma" detailing his mother's opposition to such anti-union curbs.

"Merely supporting editorially the cause of so-called 'right-to-work' would not be bad—merely mistaken," he said.

"But the Gaylord empire in its wisdom has ruled off the air and out of its newspaper columns any mention of public figures who might be against imposition of this anti-union law on the working men and women of Oklahoma.

"They have censored any use of the statements, voices, mention of the position of such leading figures as the late Pres. John F. Kennedy, former Pres. Harry S. Truman, Adlai Stevenson, former Vice Pres. Richard Nixon, Gov. Nelson Rockefeller of New York. All of these public figures oppose, or opposed, so-called 'right to-work' laws."

As the May 5 ballot nears, both supporters and opponents of "right-to-work" have stepped up their activity. In an unusual contribution to the debate, 47 non-union workers, who said they had come to Oklahoma to "escape . . . low wages" of nearby "right-to-work" states, took advertising space in the Oklahoma City Times to urge defeat of the "right-to-work" amendment.

"Help us to protect our paychecks by defeating this unfair proposal," they declared in a signed advertisement.

FCC Stand on Stations Draws Strong Protest

A Federal Communications Commission ruling upholding Oklahoma City radio and television stations in barring from the air anti-"right-to-work" statements by the late Pres. Kennedy and the late Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt has been protested by the National Council for Industrial Peace.

John M. Redding, NCIP director, said in a telegram to the FCC that Station WKY and WKY-TV had rejected use of the Kennedy and Roosevelt statements unless "releases" were secured from their estates.

Kennedy and Mrs. Roosevelt were "persons of tremendous national reputation," Redding said, and their opposition to so-called "work" laws would be a "significant factor" in presenting the case against a "work" proposal to be voted on in Oklahoma May 5.

The "basic fairness principle" supposed to be required of radio and television stations in discussion of public issues would be "rendered hollow" unless the FCC took steps to allow Oklahoma citizens to hear the "memorable words" of Mrs. Roosevelt and Kennedy, which were "freely made in life."

Msgr. Higgins' Father Dies at 76

LaGrange, Ill.—Charles V. Higgins, 76, pioneer member of the Postal Clerks in the Chicago area, was to be buried here May 2 after a funeral mass in St. Francis Xavier Church offered by a son, Msgr. George G. Higgins of Washington, D. C., director of the Social Action Dept. of the National Catholic Welfare Conference.

He worked as a clerk and foreman at the Chicago postoffice until his retirement five years ago. He had been seriously ill about nine months. The funeral eulogy was to be preached by Msgr. Daniel Cantwell, chaplain of Chicago's Catholic Council on Working Life.

Johnson Spurs Bill:

state to the nine which had participated in formulating the program for recommendation to the President. Ohio had been included among the states invited by Kennedy to help work out the structure of proposed economic development but Rhodes had previously remained aloof.

In another late change, a proposed spending authorization of $3 million for research into new uses of coal and other minerals was lifted to $13 million for the next fiscal year. This change resulted from a White House appeal to the President by Pennsylvania's Gov. William W. Scranton (R), just before the message was sent to Congress.

Johnson's draft bill kept intact, however, a proposal to which Scranton had objected—creation of a federally chartered "mixed-ownership corporation" to receive development plans from local development groups and finance them from corporation funds.

Scranton, declining to concur in the "separate and associated" support pledged by eight Democratic governors for the self-financing of local development projects, said in his dissent to the regional advisory commission's report that he believed such projects shoud be financed through regular "congressional authorizations and appropriations" processes.

Johnson in his message said the program was aimed "not merely at the symptoms of economic malnutrition but at its causes."

Appalachian people number about 8.5 percent of the country's population but receive 17 percent of all surplus commodity foods distributed to the needy, and "to label the region luckless or unblessed is no answer," he said.

The reasons general economic progress has passed the region by are "cheerlessly clear," he remarked and summarized them:

- "Difficult—and in some instances impossible—access.
- "Inadequate control of water—which breeds both floods and scarcity of water for industrial and recreational purposes.
- "A mineral base of coal, timber and agriculture sorely in need of creative attention."

Johnson said the $228 million he asked for the first fiscal year, plus an additional $34 million from his general anti-poverty program, was included in the budget he submitted to Congress last January.

On the general anti-poverty program, hearings have been completed by a special House subcommittee. Republicans have filed a substitute "states' rights" proposal which Sargent Shriver, head of the Johnson program, labeled "wooden" and "stiff."

Government Unions Attack Firing Rules

The AFL-CIO Government Employes Council has attacked an Administration proposal to give the Agency for Intl. Development special authority to fire employes regardless of civil service regulations.

If Congress accepts the proposal, contained in the pending foreign aid authorization bill, "it will mark a long, backward step in the erosion of individual employe rights," GEC Operations Dir. John A. McCart charged.

'You Are Not Alone,' Oppressed Workers Told

Brussels—Workers in dictatorship countries were reminded that "you are not alone" in a May Day message directed especially to them by the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

"We of the international free trade union movement struggle not only for the rights of our members," they were informed, "but also for your rights, and we are proud of this role. Like you, we fight for elementary rights of the workers—the freedom to choose their representatives, for freedom on which terms to provide their work, for the respect and dignity of the workers."

Gen. Sec. Omer Becu pledged that the ICFTU "will not cease its struggle until these fundamental rights be achieved in your countries, until exploitation is banished and until the workers everywhere may freely enjoy the fruits of their labor."

Free unions, he said, will continue to denounce unions in dictatorship nations as the executors of government or state party orders and "as instruments used by the state-employer to extort greater and greater sacrifices from the workers."

The statement said the ICFTU welcomes any signs of a lowering of world tension, "but only on condition that it shall not be obtained at your cost." Free world labor can support, he added, only measures which will help the workers in dictatorship countries "and not the regimes which oppress these people, nor the state-run trade unions which execute the orders of oppression."

In a separate manifesto addressed to "workers of all lands," the ICFTU noted that "solid progress" has been achieved in the last year for workers in many countries and stressed the fact that "prosperity—like peace and freedom—is indivisible."

"Islands of technical progress and material well-being cannot survive indefinitely ringed by an angry ocean of poverty, hunger and suffering," the ICFTU said. "The speedy advancement of the world's 'have-not' regions is not only a moral imperative; it is also an economic and political necessity.

It called on industrial countries to adapt their economic structures to provide increasing markets for the products of the developing nations, and warned that "no amount of economic aid will ease the real burden of world poverty without strong and independent trade unions in the receiving countries."

In Federationist Editorial:

Meany Hits 'Myths' In Fulbright Thesis

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, taking sharp issue with Sen. J. William Fulbright (D-Ark.), has declared that "in 1964, as in 1939, appeasement of dictators bent on world domination cannot lead to peace, regardless of the profoundest wishful thinking."

In a signed editorial appearing in the May issue of the AFL-CIO monthly magazine, The Federationist, Meany rejected the Fulbright thesis that America has become so myopic about international communism that in Fulbright's words, "It has become one of the self-evident truths of the post-war era that just as the President resides in Washington and the Pope in Rome, the Devil resides immutably in Moscow."

'Devil Resides in Moscow'

"Surely Sen. Fulbright knows," Meany wrote, "that it was not the President of the United States who ordered the construction of the shameful wall that divides Berlin. It was not the Pope's divisions that drenched the streets of Budapest with the blood of workers and students who wanted nothing more than to live in peace and freedom. Only a Devil could perpetrate these and other terrible crimes. And this Devil resides immutably in Moscow."

"These," Meany said, "are not myths but facts—the reality of the current world situation."

Declaring that the free world and the Communist countries are basically divided by "two ways of life," Meany pinpointed as the overriding issue of our times the head-to-head clash between "Communist tyranny," aiming "to dominate the world and remold it on the Leninist-Soviet pattern" and the democratic Western powers who "do not seek to dominate the world and remold it on any particular pattern of democracy."

Policy to Foment War

"The totalitarian dogmas and deeds on the Soviet domestic front are integrally bound up with and reflected in the Soviet foreign policy for fomenting, financing, and directing so-called wars of liberation in Latin America, Africa and Asia and class war in the free world as a whole," he charged. Recalling that as recently as December 6, 1963, "Khrushchev's principal mouthpiece, Pravda," restated the Soviet dedication to the "international duty to give all-round political and economic support, and if necessary, the help of arms, too, to the national liberation struggles of the people," Meany warned, "To forget this is to forget reality."

Meany took sharp issue with the senator's labeling the Castro regime as a "distasteful nuisance, but not as an intolerable danger. . . . ." He said that this is a "failure to realize that any dangerous threat to our Latin American neighbors is a threat to us" and can "only encourage and strengthen the subversive Castroite forces financed and trained by Moscow who are continuing their conspiracy designed to destroy their democratic institutions and leaders in Latin America."

"It is significant that Castro lost no time in welcoming the Senator's notion of 'reality' and 'flexibility' in regard to his totalitarian regime," Meany observed.

"Mr. Fulbright seems to have missed the most important lesson of the post-war era. Soviet aggression and expansion westward have been deterred by Western unity and strength and not by the 'liberalization' of any Communist regime. When Khrushchev's Russia and Mao's China become peaceful and democratic, like the German Federal Republic and Japan have become, then and only then should our government help them overcome their difficulties."

Facing Realities Urged

Meany called for putting aside the myths and facing the realities confronting our country. "The strongest and most aggressive military power in Europe is a Communist power—the USSR. This is no myth. The strongest and most aggressive military power in Asia is a Communist power—Mao's China. This is a reality. The strongest and most aggressive military force in Latin America today is a Communist power—Castro's Cuba."

Meany noted that while there are rifts among the various forces in the Communist camp, they will serve to strengthen the free world "only if we exploit them in the cause of peace and freedom. On the other hand," he warned, "the divisions and illusions in the Western camp, if continued, will invite new Communist aggressions.

"The paramount task of the free world at this moment in history," the Meany editorial concluded, "is to assure superior strength and restore its unity of policy and action."

THE PRESIDENT, MRS. JOHNSON, Labor Sec. and Mrs. Wirtz greeted more than 150 labor editors at the White House after the President held the first news conference specially for the labor press in the East Room. Moving through the receiving line are ILPA Pres. Leon Stein, being greeted by Mrs. Johnson, and ILPA Sec.-Treas. Kenneth Fiester, shaking hands with the President.

Johnson Calls on Labor Editors To 'Enlist' in His War on Poverty

Wirtz and the Intl. Labor Press Association, was the second background and briefing session set up specifically for the labor press.

The President, who told the editors that they were a "part of the conscience of our society" who are "never satisfied with the job that is partially done" and who speak out of a "deep commitment to justice at the working place, to self-government in economic life . . .," said he had a "proposition" to put to them:

"I want to ask you to do something for your country, and for your kiddies and for your President. I want to ask you to enlist now in the army—some of you are above the draft age and I can't force you to do it—but I want to ask you to volunteer to join the army in our war against poverty."

Describes Poverty

The President described in graphic terms the poverty and distress he had seen on his recent trip through the Appalachian region and cited the slowdown in the rate at which families are emerging from poverty since the Thirties.

"It is getting a lot more difficult," he said for persons living on "the other side of the tracks," to get out "and cross the tracks and get out of that poverty classification."

"The real war to end all wars must be the war to eliminate poverty," he stressed. "Let this be known as the generation of Americans who made it their personal duty to give every American an equal and fair chance."

The President, who had made a similar plea to the annual meeting of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce earlier the same day and asked for broad support from business for the Administration's programs, told the labor editors in response to a question that the businessmen's reaction "was very good." The President's freewheeling address to the CofC brought dozens of bursts of applause.

Queried at the labor editors' conference on increasing the minimum wage and expanding coverage as part of the war on poverty, the President replied that the Administration favored and had proposed increased coverage and that in the future "we will have to increase minimum wages . . . as we go along," but that the "first job now is to do something about these fellows that just got four days a week at $4 a day and got eight kids."

Johnson paid tribute to the work of Wirtz in helping to reach an agreement in the railroad dispute and added that he "was never prouder of labor and management than when the railroad dispute was settled."

"Each side gave more than it was willing to give and each side got less than it wanted," he said. "But the thing that I was really proud of was the collective bargaining system, free collective bargaining at work—and work it must, if free enterprise is to continue."

Earlier in the day at a luncheon break Presidential Press Sec. George Reedy told the editors that "without the labor press many of the problems we face would have been ignored or, certainly, would not have gotten into the regular press."

Reedy said there is a need for "specialized coverage in depth" and that labor editors had a responsibility in this field. He described the White House press office as "an office of accountability" and said that while he could not meet all the demands placed on him, his major job was to satisfy his own conscience that he was meeting the obligations of the office to help disseminate news.

The briefing session began at the State Dept. auditorium, where Administration leaders spoke and answered editors' queries.

Attorney General Speaks

Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy spoke warmly of the AFL-CIO record in driving corruption from its ranks and suggested that management had not moved against corruption within its ranks to match the labor record.

Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson made a strong plea for support for the Administration's consumer program and cited the role of the labor press in making consumer information available.

Assistant Sec. of Defense John T. McNaughton briefed the editors on defense strategy and the world's trouble spots. Noting the nuclear superiority the U.S. holds over the Soviet Union, he warned, however, that regardless of the statistics on strength each side was capable of inflicting devastating harm on the other.

Walter Heller, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, expressed optimism about the economic outlook, and said there was real expansion taking place that would drop the unemployment rate below 5 percent. He defended the wage-price guidelines but noted that they "are not intended to be rigid straitjackets for each collective bargaining situation."

Sec. of State Dean Rusk reviewed foreign policy, noting that the most important thing that could be done to help it at this moment was passage of the civil rights bill now before the Senate.

Wirtz summarized the session in his concluding remarks before the White House news conference.

THE ROLE OF THE WHITE HOUSE press office was discussed at the labor editors' briefing session with Administration leaders by George Reedy, presidential press secretary, who called for more specialized coverage in depth and noted the labor press's role in bringing to national attention problems that had largely been ignored in the general press.

Scholarships Announced by Two Unions

Two more AFL-CIO unions have announced winners of four-year college scholarships open to children of members—the National Maritime Union and the Operating Engineers.

The NMU awarded its 1964 Joseph Curran scholarship to Romulo L. Diaz, Jr., of Nederland, Tex. Eight other NMU scholarships went to children of seamen employed on deep sea vessels, whose welfare plan finances the program. All nine scholarships provide $2,500 a year for tuition and expenses for four years at any college which does not discriminate in enrollment because of race or religion.

The eight deep sea scholarships were awarded to Bruce M. Altner, North Bellmore, N. Y.; Francis J. Bonkowski, Ozone Park, N. Y.; Susan Cheng, New York, N. Y.; Jeannine E. Fox, Port Arthur, Tex.; George Guisasola, New York, N.Y.; Robert C. Jackson, Ayden, N. C.; Donald J. Orchard, Nicholson, Pa., and Richard R. Tejada, Northport, N. Y.

The Operating Engineers awarded the 1964 Joseph J. Delaney Memorial Scholarships to Susan E. Hazen of East Wenatchee, Wash., and Joseph M. Lavin of New York City. Their scholarships are worth up to $1,500 a year and were awarded on the basis of ratings in the National Merit Scholarship Foundation competition.

A third scholarship will be awarded later to the son or daughter of an IUOE member in Canada.

Meany Repeats Rejection of Guidelines

Opposes Regulation Of Wages and Prices

from 1953 to 1963, and the number of those employed by 6.6 million, the number of those working full time in private employment, which excludes government jobs, dropped by 400,000.

"This is very disturbing," said Meany, "because it runs to the heart of the private economy" and the free enterprise system, whose failure to provide enough jobs, he added, is "everybody's business, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce just as much as the AFL-CIO."

The finest thing that could happen, he declared, would be to "build up complete cooperation between organized labor and organized business" on strengthening the economy, because if labor and management do not work together to make our system work, "there will have to be some other answer, and this means the federal government."

Joblessness Is Key

The unemployment situation has an impact on every American problem, he emphasized, declaring:

"It's at the heart of the civil rights problem, because Negro unemployment is twice the national average. It's at the heart of the delinquency problem because juvenile unemployment is three times the national average."

When Wagner, representing business on the panel, said the 35-hour week would "harm our ability to compete," Meany fired back: "This is the same argument we heard when we reduced the workweek from 60 to 48 and 40."

Declaring "we've got to come to" a shorter workweek, the AFL-CIO president predicted that at its annual meeting the CofC would again take "automatic opposition" to this and other labor proposals, such as extension of minimum wage protection to laundry workers earning 40, 50 and 60 cents an hour.

At a later session of the CofC meeting, the chamber's legislative representatives led by Dir. Don A. Goodall reported they felt serious concern about possible passage of a bill providing doubletime pay for overtime work and apprehension about some 20 other "problem" proposals and activities of the federal government.

These ranged from doubts about the anti-poverty program ("a gross duplication of effort" and "gilding of the lily") to worry about a possible Tennessee Valley Authority type of operation in Appalachia.

The CofC doesn't have the votes in Congress, the legislative representatives reported, to get unions put under the anti-trust laws, but unions don't have the votes to obtain repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act's Sec. 14-B authorizing state "right-to-work" laws. Businessmen must oppose "any kind" of hospital care for the aged involving social security tax funds, they said, because it would "be a step in the direction of socialized medicine."

Several million workers, Meany said, are "not in the market as consumers because they are prisoners of a low wage economy." Business, he asserted, "ought to look at this for the benefit of the entire economy" and not just that "of a few employers who happen to be your members."

No one could find fault with the cooperation of labor and business in the Intl. Labor Organization, Meany declared, or with the cooperation of "some of the corporations" in sponsoring, with labor, the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Meany drew strong applause when, on the subject of foreign aid, he said "business could help to see that the money we spend gets to the level of the people and is not used in the usual way some of these governments spend money."

Part of America's arsenal in the cold war is its strong economy, Meany declared, "and we've got to keep it strong and healthy."

The accelerated public works program has helped create jobs and the effects of the tax cut have been good, "so maybe we can have a further tax cut some day and do other things" that need doing, he continued.

Doubtful on Profits

As to profits, Meany said history shows that larger profits don't always result in increased investment.

"I don't buy the idea that more profits will do the job," he said, because unless management feels it can sell increased production at a profit, "no amount of cash flow will cause it to invest in new plants."

Simkin said labor and management could be proud of the low record of lost time due to work stoppages over the past four years, with the consequence that "the workingman in a union plant loses only about one day in every 2.5 years of work."

Contract Talks Go to Conciliation

Toronto, Ont.—Negotiations between the Packinghouse Workers and the Big Three of Canada's meat packing industry have broken down following failure to agree on a series of non-monetary issues, and the dispute has been submitted to conciliation.

The union represents about 10,000 employes of Canada Packers, Swift Canadian Co. and Burns & Co. employed at 21 plants in 14 cities. It has failed to win approval of nationwide bargaining, and conciliation is proceeding in the provinces, beginning with Burns & Co. in Calgary, Alta.

TWO HOUSE LEADERS who shepherded through the bipartisan civil rights bill now pending in the Senate were honored at a dinner given by the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. From left are Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N. Blatt Leads Musmanno In Pennsylvania Upset

In a potential upset of major proportions, Pennsylvania Sec. of Internal Affairs Genevieve Blatt held a narrow lead over State Supreme Court Justice Michael A. Musmanno on the basis of nearly complete unofficial returns for Democratic nomination for the U.S. Senate.

Ultimate result of the primary, which will send the winner against Republican Sen. Hugh Scott next November, will presumably be determined by the count of absentee ballots, which will be tallied under Pennsylvania law on May 8.

With only 19 precincts of 9,261 not yet reported, Miss Blatt had 454,020 votes to 450,566 for Musmanno. Pennsylvania political observers, on the basis of past elections, consider the absentee vote likely to split along the same lines as the ballot-box vote from the same counties.

Miss Blatt, who won the Democratic nomination for secretary of state for internal affairs two years ago in a similar cliffhanger decided by the absentee vote, was strongly backed by the state's senior senator, Joseph S. Clark.

Her showing in the Senate primary was considered a personal triumph for Clark, who has urged a thorough rebuilding of the state's Democratic organization to counter the rising tide of Republican strength culminating in the 1962 election of Gov. William W. Scranton, now a dark-horse possibility for the GOP presidential nomination.

Scott, the incumbent Republican senator seeking a second term, won renomination against token opposition by a more than 7-1 margin.

In the Republican presidential sweepstakes, Scranton rolled up a record-breaking write-in total in Pennsylvania's primary and said he was "grateful" though "astonished" in the light of his repeated statements that he is not a presidential candidate this year.

Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge ran a respectable second to Scranton in the Pennsylvania write-in contest and swept the boards in the write-in tally in his native state of Massachusetts.

With nearly complete returns, Scranton got 220,573 write-ins; Lodge, 79,781; former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon, 36,686; and Arizona's Sen. Barry Goldwater 32,305 for fourth place. Votes for other aspirants, including New York's Nelson A. Rockefeller, were far behind.

In Massachusetts, with about 200 of 1,764 precincts not reported, Lodge led with 63,688 write-in votes, Goldwater ran second with 8,395, and Nixon was third with 4,996. Rockefeller was fourth and others got scattered votes.

Pres. Johnson was a runaway victor in write-in votes in both Pennsylvania and Massachusetts.

In a special congressional election in Philadelphia, Democrat William Green, Jr., was elected to fill the vacancy created by the death of his father, beating Republican Edward H. Rovner. Green and Rovner, winning nomination in their respective primaries for a full term beginning next January, will face each other again in November.

Funds Urged to Keep Works Program Alive

Pushing for renewal of the Accelerated Public Works Act, which has created tens of thousands of jobs and poured hundreds of millions of dollars into useful state and local public facilities, Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W. Va.) urged continuation of administrative funds so that the program can maintain its momentum.

A Senate Public Works subcommittee expects to act soon to renew the accelerated works program, Randolph told a subcommittee on appropriations, on the basis of hearings already completed.

A backlog of local applications for $800 million in federal funds is now pending, he pointed out, "for which the local communities have already raised matching funds."

Renewal of the program, originally passed in 1962 for a two-year period, was supported in committee by local officials "who have been closely identified with its administration and who are best situated to evaluate its efforts," the Vest Virginia senator continued.

"There still remains a large deficiency of water and sewage treatment facilities in the towns and cities of our economically depressed areas," and the unemployment rate is expected by expert observers to remain "above 5 percent" for the remainder of this year.

"Construction on projects" for which local communities have already committed their matching money "could be initiated as soon as new [federal] funds are made available," Randolph said.

What is needed pending action by Congress on a renewal project, he told the Appropriations subcommittee, is $5 million "to maintain the continuity of administration . . . and keep the machinery in readiness . . . for the time when new construction funds are available." This would still leave $15 million unappropriated from funds authorized for the first two years of the program.

The AFL-CIO has urged Congress to move quickly to extend the job-creating Accelerated Public Works program for another two years and has urged its affiliates to support the program in letters and other communications to members of the House and Senate.

Peace Corps Seeks Skills Of Artisans

The Peace Corps has sent out a call for building tradesmen—skilled construction workers who can help build "just about anything you can think of" in the developing countries of Latin America, Africa and Asia.

Recruiters for the corps' professional and technical affairs section point out that the skill of a trained artisan "can open the door to travel, adventure and the satisfaction of being challenged to the limit of your capacities while helping people who have asked for help."

Peace Corps training will begin this summer for service in such countries as Peru, Bolivia, Venezuela, Colombia, Sierra Leone, Senegal and Sabah-Sarawak, all of which have asked for volunteers with construction training or experience who can help build houses, farm buildings, schools, community centers, clinics and water supply systems—and in addition teach their skills.

Preparation for overseas service includes training in teaching as well as intensive study of the language of the country to which the volunteer is assigned.

Service is for two years. Living allowances and medical care are provided, and a readjustment allowance of $75 a month is paid on return to this country.

Those interested in Peace Corps service can write the Office of Public Affairs, Peace Corps, Washington, D. C. 20525.

12 Flour Mills Indicted on Price Charges

Buffalo, N. Y. — Twelve flour milling companies and six of their officers were indicted by a federal grand jury here on charges of conspiring to fix prices on flour sold to bakeries for use in commercial white bread.

The companies involved produce 65 percent of the bakery flour sold east of the Rocky Mountains and are estimated to have an annual business of $305 million.

The indictments charge the companies and individuals with conspiring to fix prices, starting in 1958, through a series of meetings "at which company executives agreed on flour prices for sale to commercial buyers."

Maximum penalties for violating the price-fixing section of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act would be a year in prison and $50,000 fine for each individual and $50,000 for each company. General Mills, Inc., and the Pillsbury Co. were the two largest companies named. The others include Archer-Daniel-Midland Co., Intl. Milling Co., Peavey Co., Weber Flour Mills Co., Western Star Milk Co., Bay State Milling Co., Gooch Milling & Elevator Co., Inland Mills, Inc., Colorado Milling & Elevator Co. and Seaboard Allied Milling Corp.

Jobless Rate Sticks at 5.4% for April

'Right-to-Work' Proposal Defeated in Oklahoma Vote

Labor Dept. Reports:

Employment Gain Mostly Part-Time

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's employment picture improved slightly in April, but the jobless rate remained at 5.4 percent for the third straight month, the Labor Dept. reported.

In its summary report for April, the Labor Dept. said that "most of the better-than-seasonal gain in employment was among women who apparently entered the labor force to take part-time jobs."

Unemployment fell by 372,000 —about the usual March to April decline—to 3.9 million, the report said. Thus the job increase again failed to make a real dent in unemployment as the key seasonally adjusted jobless rate hung at 5.4 percent; this compares to 5.7 percent in April 1963.

The jobless rates for adult men and adult women improved slightly, while the teen-age jobless rate worsened to 16 percent.

On the employment side of the picture, the report showed an over the month job gain of 1.4 million to 69.9 million in April. This was about double the normal seasonal gain, the report added, "partly as a result of increases among domestics and farm workers." The job gain on the farm side was 412,000 to a total of 4.4 million.

Non-farm employment rose by 948,000 to a total of 65.4 million. The report said two-thirds of the seasonally-adjusted increase was accounted for by women.

The influx of part-time workers created an apparent paradox in the Corporate Profits Hit New Highs

Corporate profits skyrocketed to historic new highs in the first three months of the year, signalling a record-shattering 1964 for business earnings.

The profit reports dominated the business and financial press and spilled over to page one of the New York Times as the General Motors Corp. symbolized the situation by reporting the largest quarterly profits ever achieved by an American corporation—$536 million, or a 29 percent spurt over the same quarter in 1963.

Amid the stream of increasing profit reports came a survey from McGraw-Hill, major business publisher, showing that U. S. business as a whole expects to spend $44 billion on new plant and equip-

Johnson Tells Labor:

Public Works Seen If Job Lag Persists

Pres. Johnson told the nation's labor leaders at a White House dinner that if private enterprise fails to bring about full employment, "we will step up our public works program."

Emphasizing that "we have talked a great deal about full employment in America, but we have done too little to achieve it," the President declared "the time has come for labor and government and business to agree that we are going to achieve—and keep—full employment."

The President spoke at a dinner for more than 65 top AFL-CIO officials headed by Pres. George Meany and members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council and their wives, similar to the affair held a week earlier for the nation's top business leaders.

The AFL-CIO has been pressing for extension and expansion of the accelerated public works program which runs out this year. The House Public Works Committee voted an additional $900 million for the program and the bill is now before the House Rules Committee. The Senate Public Works Committee has held hearings on a bill to authorize an additional $1.5 billion.

The President, referring to the "agenda of unfinished work in America," cited the need for legislative action on civil rights, medical care for the aged, the anti-poverty program, the food stamp program, housing, and a federal pay increase, and added:

"We need an increased area redevelopment program to provide more jobs. And if all that we do with the help of the private sector cannot employ all our people, the government will have to do for

Anti-Union Drive Fails On Ballot

Oklahoma City—The voters of Oklahoma rejected a proposed "right-to-work" amendment to their state's constitution, defeating a four-year, heavily-financed drive to outlaw the union shop.

Nearly complete returns showed the "work" amendment trailing by more than 24,000 votes out of some 720,000 cast in the referendum.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in Washington hailed the outcome, declaring that labor is "deeply gratified" at the defeat of the "union-busting" measure. He added:

"The returns made it clear that this was a statewide decision. While union members, as expected, turned out in force against the effort to destroy their organizations, they alone could not have won the fight.

"They needed—and received —strong support from outstanding political leaders, from the Negro community, and from a substantial proportion of the farmers of Oklahoma."

Meany expressed the hope that the vote, "in a state where union membership is relatively small, will prove to be the beginning of the end for the 'right-to-work' evil in other states as well."

Surrounded, except for a few miles of the Missouri border, by the "right-to-work" states of Arkansas, Kansas and Texas, Oklahoma was

Johnson Hints Extra Session To Spur Bills

Pres. Johnson put Congress on notice that it may be called back into session after the political conventions this summer unless it speeds up action on the civil rights bill and "votes up or down" the Administration's other high priority bills.

Johnson told a news conference that he expects the Senate to pass the rights bill by early June, followed by quick action on anti-poverty legislation, a federal pay raise, social security hospital insurance for the aged, the food stamp

AFL-CIO Calls on House Group To Expand Foreign Aid Program

Labor pledged its continuing support to "a broad and realistic foreign aid program" and asked the House Foreign Affairs Committee to approve a program "far greater" than the Administration has asked.

"We must bend every effort—at any cost those efforts may require—to help others to help themselves and to win the cold war," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged.

Biemiller said the foreign aid budget request of $3.4 billion, which he noted is "less than 1 percent of our gross national product," does not meet the need, particularly in the area of economic development and technical assistance.

At the same time, he criticized the Agency for Intl. Development, which administers the program, for not having done "nearly enough" to encourage the growth of "people's organizations" in the developing nations.

The agency, he said, should be working with "organizations of farmers, of workers and others whose existence is essential to the strength of the democratic process and to economic and social development." Such groups, he stressed, can be vehicles for "programs that will alleviate poverty."

Firing Request Hit

Biemiller also took sharp issue with AID's request for broad firing authority without regard to civil service tenure and without appeal rights. He charged that the power demanded for agency management "poses a threat to the entire civil service structure."

Backing protests made by unions representing federal employes, Biemiller declared: "It would be difficult to conceive of a more effective device . . . to undermine employe morale."

In stressing labor's continuing support of foreign aid programs, Biemiller told the committee:

"We are proud of that support

ORGANIZING AND THE LAW was the subject of an all-day conference in Baltimore, sponsored by the AFL-CIO Baltimore-District of Columbia Organizing Committee, which attracted nearly 300 active unionists. Speakers included (from left) Assistant Mgr. Ted Shane of the Ladies' Garment Workers' Upper South Dept.; AFL-CIO Assistant Gen. Counsel Theodore St. Antoine; AFL-CIO Assistant Organization Dir William Kircher; Philip Camponeschi, research and publicity director for the committee; AFL-CIO Reg. Dir. Oliver W. Singleton; AFL-CIO Assistant Organization Dir. Alan Kistler, the moderator; Winn Newman, associate general counsel of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and Intl. Rep. Howard Richardson of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

Work of Rank-and-File Stressed in Organizing

Rochester, N. Y.—Union members "must work as never before" to enroll the 30 million organizable workers still outside their ranks, AFL-CIO Organization Dir. John W. Livingston told the Rochester AFL-CIO's Organizing Seminar.

"We need them to retain our strength, and they need us now as never before," he declared.

The seminar marked the fifth anniversary of the Rochester Plan, one of the first coordinated organizing programs developed after the AFL-CIO merger. Established by the Rochester AFL-CIO with help from the national and regional AFL-CIO, it has been responsible for a steady increase of union members in the area and has served as a pattern for several other communities.

Livingston, in lauding it, described it as "a new concept in that the drives are screened and carefully expedited in advance so that the greatest possible strength can be placed behind each one, rather than having each drive a separate, uncoordinated affair and therefore relatively weak."

Robert Miller, AFL-CIO staff representative in Rochester who has worked closely with the organizing project, reported that of 40 representation elections held in the past year as a result of joint organizing drives, 17 were won, 9 were lost and 14 were still undetermined. The victories resulted in a net gain of 4,000 new members, he said.

Organization Dir. Edward J. Carlough of the Sheet Metal Workers ridiculed enemies of trade unionism who claim labor is "too strong and wants to run the country."

"The truth is, we are weak," he declared, "and we will have to organize the unorganized at the rate of the Thirties to become strong again, and able to fight for the welfare of the American worker with a good chance of winning that fight."

Late during the one-day meeting the seminar broke into separate sessions of industrial, building trades and service trades groups for discussion of organizing problems in their respective fields, and to draw up written recommendations for future action.

Other speakers included AFL-CIO Reg. Dir. Michael Mann and Assistant Dir. Charles Hasenmeyer; William Naimarck, a regional National Labor Relations Board attorney from Syracuse; Vice Pres. Michael J. Mungovan of the New York State AFL-CIO; Pres. Anthony Schneider of the Rochester AFL-CIO; Jack Cicotte, chairman of the local AFL-CIO Organizing Committee, who presided, and a group of AFL-CIO organizers including Joseph Lovas, George O'Keefe, John Maurillo and Lee Stanford, and Organizing Dir. William Evans of Technical Engineers Local 66, New York.

Also attending were Henry Rhodes, assistant organizing director for the Canadian Labor Congress, and William Sloat and James Fleming of the Hamilton, Ont., Labor Council.

Rail Signalmen Win 10 Cents In Settlement

The Railroad Signalmen have reached agreement with the nation's railroads for a 10-cent hourly increase for most of the union's members, retroactive to Jan. 1. Helpers, who constitute about 20 percent of the craft, will receive a retroactive 6-cent raise.

The contract was based on recommendations of a Presidential Emergency Board which found that signalmen have suffered from "a serious wage inequity" in relation to the skills required.

Pres. Jesse Clark welcomed the emergency board's "recognition of our skills and responsibilities" but said a higher increase would have been needed to eliminate the "wage lag that has accumulated over many years."

The increase brings the Signalmen's hourly rate to $2.85 an hour and the helpers' scale to $2.50 and $2.52 an hour. The agreement affects some 12,600 workers.

Pact Ends Walkout At Canadian Shipyards

Vancouver, B. C. — Wage increases totaling 40 cents an hour for journeymen and 30 cents for non-tradesmen over three years ended a 12-week strike of 2,000 members of 22 unions at Vancouver and Victoria shipyards. The package also included a lump sum of $51.90 in lieu of retroactivity for those employed—at least 15 weeks —before the strike.

Symphony Wins Pact Of 52 Weeks

New York—The first contract guaranteeing the members of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra 52 weeks of employment has been agreed to by Musicians Local 802 and the Philharmonic Association.

The three-year agreement, which includes four weeks of paid vacation, goes into effect at the start of the next season in September. The minimum weekly wage remains at $200 for the first two years and goes to $210 for the 1966-67 season.

"I am sure that this year-round employment will enhance the cultural life of our city," said Pres. Alfred J. Manuti of Local 802, who led the union negotiating committee.

The old contract, which also ran for three years, expires June 15 and provided for a season of 42 weeks during its last year.

In other areas, the new contract increased rehearsal, overtime and per diem rates when on tour, spelled out improvements in scheduling the work-week, and bettered the pension and life insurance provisions.

The first contract guaranteeing a full year of employment to members of a major symphony orchestra was signed several months ago by the Philadelphia Orchestra and Local 77, but the 52-week guarantee does not become effective until the 1965-66 season.

The current Boston Symphony Orchestra contract guarantees 50 weeks, with four weeks' paid vacation, for the 1964-65 season.

The Philharmonic contract was negotiated by Manuti and other members of the Local 802 executive board and a group of orchestra members that included Rainier Deintinis, Morris Borodkin, Ralph Mendelson, Henry Nigrane and Joseph Novotny.

Textile Industry Hit For Anti-Union History

Wake Forest, N. C.—The textile industry would be a leader among the nation's enterprises had the Textile Workers Union of America been permitted over the last 20 years to use its resources and facilities "to promote the prosperity and well-being of the industry and its employes" rather than in defending itself from employer attacks, TWUA Vice Pres. Boyd E. Payton said in a talk at Wake Forest College sponsored by the College Union.

Press for Clarification:

Rail Unions Charge Rules Shifts 'Chaotic'

Rail unions will petition the U.S. courts for an order preventing the carriers from enforcing "dangerous" and "chaotic" work rules changes to the detriment of several thousand transferred and laid-off rail workers, union spokesmen have announced.

When rules changes permitted by an arbitration board ruling went into effect at midnight May 6, the railroads "went overboard" in putting their own interpretations in effect and ignored disputes over the board's intention, the unions charge.

The new work rules permit carriers to eliminate the jobs of 3,000 firemen with less than three years' service on diesel locomotives immediately, and up to 50,000 other jobs eventually.

"Apparently . . . the railroads have decided that the award of the arbitration board amounts to a license for each individual carrier's personnel officer to do what he pleases in placing the award into effect," said BLF&E Pres. Harry E. Gilbert at a news conference.

Gilbert's union and the Locomotive Engineers have agreed to petition U.S. Judge Alexander Holtzoff for an amendment of the restraining order Holtzoff issued May 5 against protest strikes. The unions were to argue at a hearing May 11 that the roads should be required to maintain the status quo until the arbitration board, which Congress established last year, has had time to hear the disputes over interpretation and settle them.

Gilbert told Washington newsmen that the workers on eight railroads had taken strike votes but that no strike sanction had been given, once the court order was issued. The fact that no strike was authorized on any road, Gilbert said, did not prevent Chairman J. E. Wolfe of management negotiators from securing an order restraining the "men who are being injured by this deliberate, unjust action" of rail managements.

Gilbert said he "feels deeply" that management could have prevented a "very critical situation from arising" by the use of "simple good judgment and normal restraint" until the arbitration board could settle all disputes.

Instead, he said, "we find management inciting and harassing employes in the same antagonistic, arrogant manner that has characterized management's conduct in this long, bitter dispute."

The argument over the number of firemen used on diesels was distinct from the dispute over rates of pay and work conditions which another panel of five mediators settled at the urging of Pres. Johnson. The mediators have authority to settle all but one of the latter issues.

FEC Violates Rail Act, Justice Dept. Charges

Jacksonville, Fla.—The Justice Dept. has filed suit against the strike-bound Florida East Coast Railway on charges of violating the Railway Labor Act, and has asked the U.S. District Court here for a restraining order against further violations. A hearing on the charges was set for May 19 but the FEC asked for a later date.

The suit said the railroad violated the law by posting notices, on and after July 31, unilaterally putting changes in pay and working conditions into effect.

Attorney Gen. Robert Kennedy's department asked that the FEC be directed to "revoke . . . all notices and actions" putting changed pay rates, rules and working conditions into effect and that it "bargain in good faith with the labor organizations" representing its employes.

The FEC's non-operating employes struck Jan. 23, 1963, to gain the same 10.28-cent hourly pay raise won on all other Class 1 railroads in June 1962. The road has maintained freight service since then with the help of strikebreakers as FEC Chairman Edward Ball blocked all settlement attempts, the unions have charged.

Other developments:

- Mayor Robert K. High of Miami told the House Banking Committee Apr. 28 that the railroad's owners avoided paying Florida taxes on $66.5 millions of its stocks and bonds in 1963 or on $60 million in 1956.
- High criticized other alleged abuses of power by the Alfred I. duPont estate and its spokesman, Ball, who runs the FEC. High endorsed a bill by committee chairman Wright Patman (D-Tex.) to dilute the duPont estate's power by putting it under the Bank Holding Company Act.
- Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes' Dept. told Pres. Johnson in a wire that the department, at its recent Chicago convention, had asked the President to order takeover of the FEC until a "fair settlement" has been reached.

Bottle Blowers Chosen At New Plastics Plant

Chicago—The Glass Bottle Blowers won a National Labor Relations Board representation election at the new plastics facility of the American Can Co. by a vote of 21 to 1 for no union.

History Group Gets Papers of Labor Veteran

Madison, Wis.—Adolph Germer, a veteran of nearly three quarters of a century in the labor movement and the first organizer for the former CIO, has added his personal papers, correspondence and diaries to the labor holdings of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin.

Germer is 83 and lives in semi-retirement in Rockford, Ill. He was born in Germany, was brought to the coal town of Staunton, Ill., by his parents and joined the Mine Workers when he quit school to go to work at the age of 11.

In 1894, when he was 13, he participated in his first strike and was launched on a long career as a trade union leader that included organization of Colorado coal miners in a drive that culminated in the Ludlow massacre in 1914.

His offices with the CIO included presidency of the Michigan Industrial Union Council, CIO regional director in Detroit, New York and the Rocky Mountain and Pacific Coast states, organization director for the Woodworkers and national representative for all states west of the Mississippi River.

Precedent Upset:

Board Shifts Rule On Union Rights

A union which loses its majority status by unfair employer practices does not waive its right to press refusal-to-bargain charges after losing an election, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

Three board members, setting aside an Eisenhower-era ruling to return to an earlier doctrine, ordered the Bernel Foam Products Co., Buffalo, N. Y., to bargain with the Textile Workers Union of America.

Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and members John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown reviewed the rule arrived at by a former board in the Aiello Dairy Farms case in 1954 and decided that "the Aiello rule, which was itself a departure from well-established prior board precedent, does not serve to effectuate the policies" of the labor act.

Member Howard Jenkins, Jr., concurred in the opinion that management violated the law but, expressing no view on the Aiello doctrine, noted his disapproval of "what I conceive to be an unnecessary overruling of prior board decisions." Member Boyd Leedom dissented, saying the Aiello rule is "an application of the well-accepted 'election of remedies' doctrine."

The case originated with a complaint by the TWUA in 1962 that the Bernel management refused to have authorization cards of members checked by an impartial person; insisted on an NLRB election, and before the ballots had been cast, promised the employes benefits to defeat the union.

The Textile Workers lost the election but won an order for a new election, which the latest NLRB ruling vacates. Two days after filing the objections, the union brought failure-to-bargain charges which Trial Examiner Sidney D. Goldberg recommended dismissing because of the Aiello rule.

Goldberg said the Aiello rule was that, once the TWUA chose to participate in the election, knowing the company had unlawfully refused to bargain, the union could not press the charges based on management's pre-election conduct.

The board set aside this decision, saying there is no warrant to impose an "irrevocable option" on the union "while permitting the offending party to enjoy . . . the fruits of such unlawful conduct."

"It is the responsibility of the board, not the union, to remedy this unfair labor practice" by providing an "adequate remedy for conduct" which has been specifically forbidden by Congress, the majority wrote.

'Genuine' Bargaining Asked on Railroads

Chicago—A call for stiffer and more genuine collective bargaining was issued last week by G. E. Leighty, president of the Railroad Telegraphers and chairman of the Railway Labor Executives Association, at the 13th convention of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept.

Leighty told the assembly that the rail brotherhoods must look beyond emergency boards for justice in labor disputes. Reflecting on the experience of the last several years with board decisions, he declared:

"Good hard bargaining is the answer to many of these problems. In the final analysis, if the railroad presidents will put their labor matters in the hands of far-sighted men, who are looking at policy, equality and justice, true negotiations are going to work in this industry, and we can get together on what we are entitled to."

He scored the carriers for what he called their $15 million advertising campaign, conducted by top public relations experts, to saturate the nation with the idea that all railroad employes are "featherbedders."

Because of management's negative campaign, he continued, the brotherhoods now must extend their own efforts to re-create in the minds of the public the fact that railroad workers are efficient, industrious, and among the most productive in the country.

Leighty noted that it has now become evident, even to the business world, that the railroads' "poverty plea" is a myth, a charge made by the unions two years ago.

Capital Spending Steady

"Since 1950," he said, "with gross revenues between $9 and $10 billion, there has been no year in which the amount of money put into the capital account of the railroads was less than $1 billion, which is more than 10 percent. Some years it reached as much as $1,400,000.

"In other words, the amount of money taken out of revenues and put into their capital account has been more than sufficient to pay for all of the improvements they have made plus the dividends they have paid out during that period."

A. E. Lyon, labor member of the Railroad Retirement Board, told the delegates that "the railroad insurance program is making a tremendous contribution toward the well-being of railroad workers and their families."

In the year ending July 1, 1963, he said, more than $100 million a month was paid in benefits under the retirement and unemployment insurance systems. Under the retirement and survivor program, benefits totalling $1,068,000,000 were paid to nearly 1 million retired employes, their wives and survivors. Unemployment and sickness benefits of $167 million were paid to 300,000 railroad workers.

"These benefits," he said, "have often meant the difference between the misery of destitution and dependence on relief and the happiness and self-respect that comes from a measure of financial independence."

Coast Union Officials On Manpower Panel

Pres. Joseph H. Davis of the Washington State AFL-CIO and Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts of the California AFL-CIO have been named to a new Pacific Coast Regional Manpower Advisory Committee by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz and Health, Education and Welfare Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze.

The committee is the first of eight regional bodies which will function as adjuncts of the present National Manpower Advisory Committee.

It will be concerned with the manpower needs of California, Washington, Oregon, Alaska, Hawaii and Guam. Chairman is Dr. Ralph W. Taylor, director of the Center for Advanced Study in Behavioral Sciences at Stanford, Calif.

Labor Dept. Clarifies L-G Rules on Elections

The Secretary of Labor will not take enforcement action under the Landrum-Griffin Act because of a failure to hold a secret ballot election where candidates for union office are unopposed and other qualifications are met, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has advised all international unions and directly affiliated locals.

This holds, Meany said in a letter, "provided the nomination procedures and practices of the union furnish reasonable opportunity for the nomination of candidates, write-in votes are not permitted by the union's constitution and bylaws, and compliance is had with all other provisions of Title IV" of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

Title IV requires that local unions elect their officers by secret ballot among members in good standing, and that national or international unions and intermediate bodies elect either by secret ballot among the members in good standing or at a convention of delegates chosen by secret ballot.

Since the Landrum-Griffin Act was passed in 1959 the AFL-CIO had unsuccessfully urged through the AFL-CIO Labor Advisory Committee on the act that a secret ballot was not necessary when there was but a single candidate for office, particularly where write-in votes were not permitted.

Labor Dept. Approves

The change came about, Meany said, "as a result of meetings between the members of the Labor Advisory Committee and the Secretary and members of his staff." The committee chairman, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. J. Hayes, president of the Machinists, was notified of the shift in a letter dated Apr. 20 signed by Assistant Sec. of Labor James Reynolds.

Meany included copies of Reynolds' letter with his notification. It pointed out that L-G provides no exception to the secret ballot required by Sec. 401, and continued:

"However, Sec. 402(c) of the act provides that before an election may be set aside it must be found that the violation of Sec. 401 may have affected the outcome of the election. As a matter of enforcement policy the Secretary of Labor has enunciated the position that he will not institute civil action to set aside an election under Title IV unless there is probable cause to believe that there are violations which may have affected the outcome of the election. . . .

"Accordingly, if the nomination procedures and practices of a labor organization provide reasonable opportunity for the nomination of candidates and write-in votes are not permitted by the constitution and bylaws and all other provisions of Title IV have been complied with, the department's view is that failure to hold a secret ballot where all candidates are unopposed would not affect the outcome of the election.

"Under such conditions the Secretary of Labor would not take enforcement action since no purpose would be served thereby."

Court Voids Pact Setting Store Hours

Chicago—A citywide union-management agreement setting the opening and closing hours of meat markets here has been ruled a violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust law.

The 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that an agreement to prohibit the sale of meat before 9 a.m. or after 6 p.m., Mondays through Saturdays, was illegal and void, though it had been in effect for more than 30 years.

The appeals court upheld the Jewel Tea Co., Inc., and reversed a lower federal court. The appeals judges directed the lower court to issue a restraining order against the Associated Food Retailers of Greater Chicago, Inc., and seven locals of the Meat Cutters.

The district court also was ordered to award "such monetary relief as may be appropriate under this court's opinion" to Jewel Tea. Since 1957, the court noted, the Jewel firm had tried to eliminate the ban on night hours from the industrywide contract, but the union locals resisted.

"The hours of the day when his business is to be open to accommodate the demands of customers, in the judgment of the owner of the business, is not a condition of employment," the court wrote.

"As long as all rights of employes are recognized and duly observed by the employer, including the number of hours per day that anyone shall be required to work, any agreement . . . designed to interfere" with the operation of a retail business, "is a violation of the Sherman Act and not entitled to the exemption" claimed by the defendants, the court declared.

Board Rules Out Spying On New Job Applicants

Surreptitious pre-hiring investigation of prospective employes that includes queries into their union membership is an unfair labor practice even in the absence of any evidence of anti-union bias by the employer, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

The issue arose out of charges by Machinists Dist. 123 against the Wallace Press, Inc., of Chicago. Before hiring for the Clinton, Ill., plant where it prints and distributes business forms, the IAM charged, Wallace engaged the Associated Credit Bureau of America to determine, among other things, if the applicant had been a member of a union and if he had been, the extent of his activity and the nature of his relationship with the union.

The NLRB general counsel contended that the employer's conduct was a form of "unlawful surveillance and/or interrogation" proscribed by the National Labor Relations Act.

"Few propositions are more firmly embedded in the law of labor relations than that an employer who spies upon the union activities of his employes engages in a flagrant violation of the act," the board said as it issued a cease and desist order.

"Such conduct has been condemned by the board and the courts since the early days of the act, for experience has shown that employers resort to labor espionage or surveillance for the purpose of obstructing and destroying employes' self-organizational rights and activities. If such first steps leading to discriminatory practices are outlawed, the commission of other unfair labor practices may be thwarted. . . .

"We think that the respondent's conduct must be held to have violated the act."

The parties stipulated that the company had never refused employment to a job applicant on the basis of information received from the credit bureau.

"We believe it reasonable to infer, absent a satisfactory explanation to the contrary, that surreptitious investigations of the type initiated by the respondent into job seekers' union membership and activity are without a legitimate purpose and, as such, are sufficient to establish a violation," the board ruled.

UNION MADE cup above went to E. P. Taylor, whose Northern Dancer won the Kentucky Derby. Crafted by members of Amalgamated Silver Workers Local 38, a unit of the Jewelry Workers, in New York, it is made of 14 carat gold, weighs about 1,000 pennyweight and is worth about $5,500. Replica in sterling silver was presented to Bill Hartack, the winning jockey.

NEW OFFICERS of the State, County & Municipal Employes are sworn in by retiring Pres. Arnold S. Zander, right, as the 250,000-member union closed its 14th biennial convention in Denver. The union's new president is Jerry Wurf of New York City.

AFSCME Delegates Spell Out New Organizing, Legislative Aims

By David L. Perlman

Denver—The State, County & Municipal Employes convention closed ranks around a program of organizing and legislative goals as a new administration took the helm of the 250,000-member union.

After a hard-fought election battle which installed Jerry Wurf of New York City as president for the next two years, delegates to the union's 14th biennial convention joined in a tribute to Arnold S. Zander, who had presided over the union throughout its history.

Zander was named president emeritus, at full salary until his retirement, with the assignment of representing the union in the international labor field and assisting in a contemplated revision of the AFSCME constitution.

"We need his knowledge, assistance and experience," Wurf told the delegates.

In his acceptance speech, Wurf pledged that "the right to disagree and the right to criticize" will be respected by the new administration as a necessary element of union democracy.

While referring most proposed constitutional amendments for study by a special commission, the convention unanimously adopted a detailed election procedures amendment based on recommendations of the union's ethical practices adviser, Elliot Bredhoff.

Its provisions include the right of candidates for international union office to inspect the union's membership lists and the right of candidates to have a packet of campaign literature mailed by the union, at cost, to all locals and councils.

Both the international union and subordinate bodies are barred from spending money on behalf of a candidate for office, and union publications at all levels are prohibited from supporting any candidate. Detailed procedures are set up to hear and resolve all protests and appeals regarding election procedures and eligibility.

The convention directed a "crash" organizing program to extend union representation and collective bargaining in the public service.

Other resolutions:

- Called for strengthening state and local civil service systems against "the whims of political patronage."
- Pledged intensified efforts to eradicate discrimination "in all aspects of American life" and called on the Senate "to speedily pass" the civil rights bill.
- Demanded repeal of "antiquated and punitive" state laws prohibiting strikes by public employes, such as the Condon-Wadlin Act in New York.
- Directed the union and its affiliates to press for supplementary pension benefits, in addition to social security, for state and local employes through both legislation and collective bargaining.
- Called for joint union-management safety committees and inclusion of safety provisions in all union contracts.
- Expressed appreciation to the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. for financial and manpower help in organizing campaigns.
- Asked repeal of state and local laws restricting voluntary political activity by public employes.
- Praised and expressed support for the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the Public Services Intl., the trade secretariat in which the AFSCME has been active.
- Endorsed AFL-CIO legislative goals, including social security hospital insurance for the aged, consumer protection bills, and programs to strengthen the national economy such as expanded public works, reduction of the workweek, improved federal standards for unemployment insurance and anti-poverty legislation.

The convention paid tribute to the late Pres. Kennedy, terming him "a friend and benefactor to public employes at all levels of government."

Civil Rights Held Key To Basic Ills of South

Atlanta, Ga.—The social, economic and political problems of the South can never be brought under full attack until the civil rights problem is resolved, Dr. Vivian Henderson, professor of economics at Fisk University, told the Southeast AFL-CIO Education Conference here.

Henderson also analyzed the close relationship between poverty and discrimination. He is a former member of the Steelworkers and is the first Negro exchange professor at North Carolina State University.

The program included a panel discussion on "Planning Education Program on Civil Rights" for which Stuart Brock, AFL-CIO education staff representative, was moderator. Assistant Dir. Walter Davis of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights discussed the civil rights bill now befor the Senate and Pres. Harold Boyd of the Virginia AFL-CIO, chairman of labor's Southern Advisory Committee on Civil Rights, explained how the committee works with the department to implement union policy.

Dir. Lawrence Rogin of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education led a panel discussion on state and local follow-ups on aid to education. Participating were Sec.-Treas. A. G. Trammell of the Alabama AFL-CIO; Vice Pres. J. W. Hardegree of the Atlanta AFL-CIO and Thomas Watson of the Southern Regional Council Community Relations Committee.

The Columbia Broadcasting System's television documentary on migratory labor, "Harvest of Shame," was used in another panel session on development of education program on poverty. Participating were Area Dir. L. B. Daniel of the Communications Workers and Dir. E. T. Kehrer of the Ladies' Garment Workers southeastern region. Moderator was Assistant AFL-CIO Education Dir. George Guernsey.

Fire Fighters Move To New Headquarters

The Fire Fighters have moved their international headquarters a half-block from the AFL-CIO Building in Washington to the Moreschi Building, which is owned by the Laborers, at 905 Sixteenth St., N.W.

The postal zone (20006) and telephone numbers (DIstrict 7-9000 and 7-9001) remain unchanged. The move was necessitated by an expanding staff.

Convention Gets Report:

United Shoe Union Studies Unity Plans

Chicago—A rise in per capita tax, the threat of foreign imports to members' jobs, merger with the Boot & Shoe Workers and organizing the unorganized were key items of concern among the 234 delegates as the United Shoe Workers opened the union's 13th constitutional convention here.

Pres. George O. Fecteau and Sec.-Treas. Angelo G. Georgian told the convention that some progress has been made in merger talks with the Boot & Shoe Workers.

Fecteau said a joint unity committee has worked out some of the differences between the constitutions of the two unions, but much more work needs to be done. He said the convention would be asked to endorse further meetings.

After exploratory talks on merger the joint committee will draft a merger agreement, Fecteau reported. When this is approved by the boards of both unions, a constitution will be drafted, he said, and separate conventions would be held to vote on the new constitution.

"Whatever worthwhile and lasting benefits we expect from a merger of our two unions," he said, "will be achieved only if the new union emerges strong enough, militant enough and democratic enough to assure control by the union to safeguard the wages and working conditions of its members, and to attract the thousands of unorganized workers in the industry."

Fecteau said that despite intense organizing by the Shoe Workers there has been no solid gain in membership or reduction of the number of unorganized workers in the industry. In his report, he cited activities to reduce the impact of foreign imports on the industry and the union's 50,000 members.

Illinois Gov. Otto Kerner (D) said he supported the position taken by Fecteau in testimony before Congress on shoe tariffs.

"We have been very generous in accepting foreign shoes," Kerner said. "We should be reluctant to make further concessions. Your president took a sound position in urging that duties on foreign shoes be kept at their present level."

Kerner suggested that Pres. Johnson is aware of the situation and would keep the Shoe Workers' interests in mind in coming tariff negotiations.

"Your industry, employing 12,000 of your members," he said, "is the industrial backbone of many Illinois communities."

Dir. Nelson Cruikshank of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security predicted that Congress will pass a health care for the aged bill before it adjourns this summer. Public pressure is mounting on the House Ways & Means Committee, where the King-Anderson bill to provide hospital insurance for the aged is hung up, he declared.

The AFL-CIO is determined to help close this one remaining gap in the social security program, he said, and urged the delegates to write their legislators in support of King-Anderson.

An increase in per capita tax for organizing and other purposes was to be introduced to the convention in the form of a constitutional amendment. All convention action is subject to ratification by a referendum vote of the membership.

Other speakers in the opening days of the parley included Daniel Healy, director of AFL-CIO Region 14; Stanley Ruttenberg, special assistant to the secretary of Labor; Nicholas A. Zonarich, organizational director, AFL-CIO industrial union dept.; and Ralph Wright, director, Intl. Labor Office in Washington, D. C.

ILGWU Sets Pact Deadline In New York

New York—Employers of 40,000 coat and suit workers in the New York area have been warned by the Ladies' Garment Workers that the union members will not report for work June 1 unless an agreement on terms of a new contract are reached by that date.

The warning came from ILGWU Vice Pres. Henoch Mendelsund, general manager of the union's New York Cloak Joint Board, in a letter to two major employer groups—the New York Coat & Suit Association and the Infants & Children's Coat Association.

Mendelsund, at a meeting of joint board delegates, criticized the employers' "deliberate stall-in policy" in negotiations on contract terms, including a 10 percent wage increase, a second week's vacation, an additional 1 percent contribution to health and welfare funds; an additional paid holiday, and other benefits.

After three meetings the union is no closer to an agreement than it was at the first conference Mar. 12, said Mendelsund.

Further delay on starting serious negotiations "will only aggravate our differences," he said.

Convention Theme:

Building Service Employes Plan 'More Progress Ahead'

Los Angeles—Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Services Employes told delegates representing 315,000 members at the organization's 13th convention here that membership had increased by 46,000 and the financial position of the union had improved by more than $1 million since its last parley in 1960. Refuting rumors of internal warfare, Sullivan declared to the more than 350 delegates:

"We are not here to engage in, or listen to, personal feuds . . . to engage in a series of trials . . . to set in motion the destruction of this great organization. We are here to map plans for more progress in the next four years.

"I am confident that any differences which may exist—and there are always some differences in any democratic institution — must be subordinate to our desire to maintain the integrity of our great union."

He noted that gains in the union's financial position were made while it was spending more than ever to carry out programs and assist local unions in organizing.

He cited other union activities aimed at benefitting the members, including development of a legislative program to win on the legislative front benefits equal to those already gained at the bargaining table. He also noted that BSEIU has established two new publications to aid members and their families in their roles as consumers.

'More Progress Ahead'

Citing the convention theme of "more progress ahead," Sullivan urged the members to continue their fight to organize, negotiate and improve job conditions, remain politically active and effective, continue their role in the civil rights revolution, fight for legislative goals, point up the dangers of automation, and press for more jobs for more people.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a special message delivered by his executive assistant, Lane Kirkland, said that BSEIU had reason to be proud of its record of achievement, noting the increase in membership when "many of our organizations must expend great energy and resources just to maintain their membership."

"As just one measure of an enlightened, forward-looking union, I know that under the fine leadership you have enjoyed, your participation in COPE activities and in our registration drive has steadily increased, and is fast becoming an example to other AFL-CIO affiliates," Meany continued.

He paid tribute to Sullivan's leadership and his activities as a member of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee.

Issues Facing Labor

Meany's message dealt with the public issues facing labor today—civil rights legislation, the food stamp plan, hospital care for the aged, accelerated public works, federal aid to education, broader minimum wage coverage and a higher minimum—all necessary, he said, to the achievement of labor's mission to eradicate poverty and economic insecurity and achieve full and equal opportunities for all.

"The trade union movement, including very prominently the building service employes, has been in the front lines of the war on poverty from the very beginning and we are all in it today," he declared.

Highlighting the first day's proceedings was a personal letter from Pres. Johnson delivered by Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Anthony J. Celebrezze, and a filmed message from the President based on the Administration's program.

The President's letter said in part:

"We have declared war on poverty in the United States and presented a program to Congress to help those now the victims of our past neglect. You and I know that there are many Americans on the outskirts of our prosperity who need your help to join the mainstream of American well being. I solicit your support for this program since it will help many Americans in real need.

Ask With Confidence

"I ask your aid with confidence because your union and your officers have demonstrated that you are willing to work for the welfare of all Americans."

Celebrezze said the BSEIU and the Administration have much in common in that the ultimate goal of both is the betterment of our society.

"I am constantly aware of the many areas in which organized labor has translated ideals into action to give leadership in the march toward social betterment —a march along which nearly every milestone bears the imprint of labor," he said.

Mayor Robert F. Wagner of New York City lauded the BSEIU for seeing its own needs and problems as part of those of the entire nation.

He spoke out for a great public works program for the skilled, unskilled and semi-skilled and for expanded facilities and funds for training and education.

"In waging this fight we battle for the forgotten men, women and children of America—for the silent and invisible poor who are one-fifth of our nation," he concluded.

Distillery Union Parley Stresses Organization

San Francisco—Continued high priority to organizing and negotiations for an overtime ban, shorter work week and a guaranteed work force to meet the challenge of automation were among objectives outlined at the Distillery Workers 24th biennial convention here.

Some 250 delegates representing 40,000 workers in U.S. and Canadian distilleries, wineries and allied enterprises heard Pres. Mort Brandenburg call for giving top priority to organizing in his opening address.

Membership in the union was at an all-time high despite 1,000 jobs lost in the industry over the year as a result of automation and technological advance, Brandenburg and Sec.-Treas. George J. Oneto reported.

One immediate target, Brandenburg said, is the 1,500-member California sugar beet field force. The union already represents most of the 3,000 workers in sugar plants in the state, who have a $2 to $3.12 hourly rate compared with $1.25 for the field workers.

The union also seeks to organize the hard-core Kentucky and Tennessee non-union distilleries, including Stitzel-Weller against which the DWU has launched a nationwide boycott.

Last year's organizing gains occurred in such diverse fields as Seagrams in Canada and salesmen for United Vintners, Los Angeles, one of the largest California wineries, Brandenburg reported.

The guaranteed work force proposal calls for assured year-round employment for a certain number of workers in each plant based on such consideration as seniority.

The collective bargaining program outlined by the officers also seeks a 32 to 35 hour week with no pay cut, a sabbatical leave similar to the Steelworkers' aluminum and can industry formula, severance pay and retraining and relocation of displaced workers, and elimination of all overtime as long as the unemployment problem exists.

Robert H. Moore, deputy director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, told the convention that "we all abhor government intervention" in collective bargaining and declared that the Mediation Service seeks to help reach solutions without compulsion.

Amplifying remarks to reporters, Moore said he feels there is a "solid future for collective bargaining" and that efforts for compulsory arbitration are led by a "small minority," with no unified campaign except in the maritime industry.

Delegates at the 5-day convention also were to hear Pres. Paul Hall of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., COPE Dir. Al Barkan and Pres. George Baldanzi of the United Textile Workers.

Labor Editors Hold Session On Writing

New Brunswick, N. J.—More than 100 labor editors from the tri-state area of New Jersey, New York and Pennsylvania attended the 9th annual Labor Editors' Conference sponsored by the New Jersey Labor Press Council in cooperation with the Institute of Management & Labor Relations at Rutgers, the State University. The conference was held in the Rutgers Labor Education Center.

"Writing With a Purpose" was the theme of the conference, which featured three all-day writing workshops on editorials, feature stories and columns.

Technical workshops were held on mimeographing a local union newspaper, editing a printed or photo offset publication, and effective use of photographs and cartoons.

Civil Rights Leader Bayard Rustin addressed the conference on "Poverty Amongst Abundance." Gov. Richard J. Hughes commended the Rutgers Institute and School of Journalism for promoting a high standard of quality and integrity among the state labor publications.

The conference concluded with the annual awards dinner. First place winners in the general editorial excellence category included: letter press, the New Jersey Teacher, State Federation of Teachers; photo offset, Fairless Union News, Steelworkers Local 4889; mimeograph, Aircraft Lodge 703 News, Machinists Lodge 703.

Minorities Strong In N. Y. Hotel Jobs

New York—Approximately 40 percent of the jobs in New York's hotel industry are held by members of minority groups, according to a survey, conducted by a joint committee of the Hotel & Motel Trades Council and the Hotel Association, that reached 24,000 out of an estimated 33,000 workers.

For purposes of the survey, which was undertaken to provide background for a projected equal opportunity program, the workers were classified as white, Negro and Puerto Rican. Analysis showed 55 percent were white, 20.7 percent Negro and 18.4 percent Puerto Rican. "Others," not designated as to category but known to include some minority group members such as Chinese, totaled 5.9 percent.

Worker Participation Held Essential In Alliance for Progress Programs

Princeton, N. J.—The Alliance for Progress needs the workers of Latin America just as urgently as the workers need the alliance, William C. Doherty, Jr., director of the Social Action Dept. of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, said in a wide-ranging review of AIFLD activities.

Doherty spoke at the second annual World Affairs Conference of the Princeton Latin-American Affairs Committee.

He recalled that in 1960 the AFL-CIO Executive Council earmarked $20,000 for a feasibility study on how U. S. labor could best increase its efforts to improve the lot of "our Ibero-American coworkers." The AIFLD was the result, he said, and its Social Projects Dept. was established "to organize and press the common effort in the field of housing, credit unions, cooperatives, socio-economic projects of local interest . . ." and the Food for Peace distribution program.

"Because of their spontaneous desire to participate in the Alliance for Progress and their immediate reaction to the glimmer of hope created by the alliance," he added, "many Latin American unions submitted project plans in requests for assistance through the AIFLD."

Most of those submitted so far have been concerned with housing —which is natural, Doherty said, in view of the fact that some 90 million Latin Americans live in slums. AFL-CIO unions have made available many millions of dollars from pension funds for low-cost housing projects in Mexico, El Salvador, Jamaica, Colombia, Peru, Argentina, Chile and the Dominican Republic. A few days after Doherty spoke, the AIFLD-aided John F. Kennedy Workers Housing Project was dedicated in the Dominican Republic. U. S. unions provided $1 million of the financing and the Inter-American Development Bank $2 million.

The Social Projects Dept., he continued, also assisted in the establishment of the first genuine workers' housing bank in the Southern Hemisphere, at Lima, Peru. Workers who average $70 a month have contributed from savings $150,000 of its capital, he said, and the AID has agreed to make a $6 million loan.

In the field of cooperatives, Doherty said, the Social Projects Dept. has united the Venezuelan labor and cooperative movements to expand consumer cooperative activities with the twin goals of reducing prices and providing a more balanced diet.

The AIFLD has been recognized as a voluntary agency under the Food for Peace program, he reported, to channel "the product of God's abundant blessings on the most productive farmers in the world . . . through trade union mechanisms and institutions . . . to the neediest of the needy workers of Latin America." Distribution will begin soon in Colombia and Chile, with other countries to follow.

Inventory Launched Of Critical Skills

The Stanford Research Institute has been engaged to conduct a nationwide inventory of training in critical skills for the Manpower Administration of the Labor Dept., Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has announced.

The study will help determine the scope and impact of company-sponsored training efforts in specific "growth" occupations, such as maintenance electrician, tool and die maker, electronic technician, maintenance mechanic, stationary engineer, millwright, foreman and welder.

The study group will be directed by David Bushnell, social-psychologist. It is expected to report to the Labor Dept. by the end of the year.

A Lesson in Oklahoma

THE DEFEAT of the "right-to-work" proposal in Oklahoma in a statewide referendum is a hopeful portent that the drive to weaken and destroy unions on a state-by-state basis is nearing its end.

The anti-union forces that carefully planned the Oklahoma operation had been at work for four long years preparing the ground. They had as allies most of the press, radio and television stations in the state. Earlier campaigns to secure legislative approval of the anti-union shop proposal, although defeated, had created a favorable climate.

When the "right-to-work" forces first petitioned their proposal to statewide referendum as a constitutional amendment, all of these conditions combined to indicate an easy victory.

But these forces, intent on destroying the effectiveness of trade unions in the state, reckoned without the fundamental strength of the unions and, more importantly perhaps, the understanding of the people of Oklahoma that a strong, free trade union movement is essential to the economy and prosperity of any state or region.

On May 5, the people of Oklahoma—the workers, the farmers, most of the major political leaders, the Negro community and others—demonstrated their understanding by rejecting that anti-union approach.

The defeat of the "right-to-work" issue in Oklahoma, unfortunately, is an example of a non-reported or under-reported story, with the nation's press generally ignoring the results. If the "right-to-workers" had scored a victory previous experience indicates there would have been wide reportage of a "labor defeat." As it is, only the labor press is carrying the Oklahoma story in depth and detail.

The last statewide referendums on the "right-to-work" question were held in 1958. In five of six states where the fight was waged, the "right-to-work" approach was rejected, including major defeats in Ohio and California. The 1958 outcome, which resulted in decisive defeat of candidates supporting the anti-union program, brought a nearly six-year break in the fight to destroy unions via the referendum route.

Now the "right-to-workers" have met defeat again in Oklahoma, in a state where conditions appeared highly favorable to their objective. Perhaps this time the lesson will be finally learned —that the people will not be fooled or deluded by phony phrases such as "right-to-work," that Americans will not vote to destroy and weaken unions when they understand the issue.

50 Years of Change

WRITING in the May issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist on the 50th anniversary of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, Sen. Paul Douglas noted that "through the history of the ACWA one can see the transformation of America."

The accepted role of government, Douglas wrote, "has changed from protector of the propertied interests to protector of the public interest. In consistently challenging injustice in any guise the Amalgamated has made an enormous contribution to that transformation."

The trade union movement, sparked by unions such as the ACWA and its remarkable achievements in its 50-year history, is proud of the part it has played not only in helping to transform the role of government in American life but in helping to bring a greater degree of social justice, of bread, peace and freedom, to all Americans, trade union members or not.

'Enthusiasm Is Contagious:'

Suffridge Urges Rededication To Spread Cause of Unionism

The following editorial by RCIA Pres. James A Suffridge, "Enthusiasm for a Cause is Contagious," is reprinted from the May 1964 issue of the Retail Clerks Advocate, official monthly publication of the RCIA.

SEVERAL CENTURIES ago all of mankind was ruled by absolute monarchs who held the power of life and death over their subjects. These rulers claimed that they held this power by divine right. But the human spirit would not tolerate this. Subjects demanded the rights of free citizens and fought for their freedom in a conflict that lasted for centuries. Finally, the Declaration of Independence liberated Americans from the encroachments of absolute monarchy, and the Emancipation Proclamation ended traffic in human chattels. Nowadays anyone who declared that he believed in the divine right of kings would be considered somewhat less than sane.

And yet in a nonunion store a vestige of this old tyranny remains. There the employer holds the absolute power to hire and fire and to dictate what working conditions shall prevail. His employes have absolutely no voice in their job conditions. These are dictated on a take-it-or-leave-it basis.

Trade unions are opposed, without any reservation, to the right of an employer to use up the lives of his employes as if they were expendable raw material, by working them long hours at starvation pay without regard to their dignity as human beings with family obligations and normal aspirations.

The Retail Clerks Intl. Association has championed these causes in behalf of retail store workers for the past 76 years. Throughout the United States and Canada wherever members of the RCIA are employed under union agreements, they may well regard themselves as the possessors of a proud heritage that has been won by the valiant members of the RCIA, who preached, agitated, taught, fought for, and pioneered the rights which we today enjoy.

The improved working conditions, the shorter working hours, the job security, the hospitalization plans, pension plans—all the humanizing social values which union agreements stand for—are in reality a sacred trust which RCIA members have a responsibility to safeguard for each other and for those who are coming into the work force.

This trust obligates every RCIA member to vigilance, loyalty to fellow store workers, a personal interest and participation in union meetings, and an understanding of the ideal of good unionism. These qualities make possible the human dignity and social status that unions bring. The monthly dues a member pays are not a purchase price for these gains. The dues merely defray the administrative costs of the services which only the union can furnish.

As long as there are nonunion stores where the employer may pit worker against worker against worker hire and fire without regard for cause or seniority, pay what he chooses and dispose of the lives of store workers as an expendable ingredient which may be replaced without regard to the dignity or interests of the employe, RCIA members will be deeply concerned. The International Association is devoting its major energies to organizing these nonunion establishments that continue to threaten our collective bargaining gains.

The International Association also opposes reactionary management forces who wish to continue to profit from exploiting their employes under cover of discriminatory legislation such as so-called "right-to-work" laws. These laws are an expression of the employer's desire to continue to wield absolute power over conditions of employment.

IN A NUMBER OF STATES where these laws prevail, RCIA members have proved that courage and intelligence can uphold union ideals and that RCIA local unions can grow in spite of the statutes inspired by greed and avarice.

Fortunately, the unorganized store worker need not repeat the many years of struggle and travail that the earlier trade unionist experienced. If the hundreds of thousands of RCIA members will bear witness to their belief in union ideals, unorganized store workers will learn that there is an organization whose sole mission is to help them fulfill their needs and aspirations.

There are overwhelming reasons why each of us should rededicate ourself to the ideals for which the RCIA stands and make it our personal plan to take an active part in carrying the message of unionism to unorganized store workers.

Ours is a grand and worthwhile cause. Hundreds of thousands of our members are pledged to support it. Millions of retail store employes would benefit by its advancement. It fully merits the devoted efforts of dedicated people. We should never tire of advocating it. Enthusiasm for a cause is contagious. We must never be without it if we would inspire it in others.

Morgan Says:

Pres. Johnson Sets Fast Pace . . . And Seems to Thrive on It

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

A GAGGLE OF unsuspecting reporters, including this one, recently was subjected to the Lyndon Johnson version of the Pierre Salinger 50-mile hike. Since the latter never actually came off, the fact that the LBJ excursion was merely a mile and a quarter around the White House gardens, ablaze with tulips and other spring flowers, nevertheless made the outing exhausting for participating Washington correspondents, the maximum exercise for some of whom consists of trips to the water cooler or the Press Club bar.

Morgan

What this astonishing man from the Texas country has done, after surviving a massive heart attack nine years ago, is to activate the New Frontier. If the entire nation doesn't acquire physical fitness vicariously by presidential example, at least the newsmen assigned to cover this frenetic chief executive will either all become indestructible Lionel Strongforts by virtue of the paces Johnson is putting them through, or they will fall by the wayside with coronaries themselves.

As for the nation's leader himself, he never looked fitter, at least to the eyes of this reporter, who has followed him at fairly close range for nearly 10 years. His waistline was trim. He wouldn't reveal his exact weight but he noted with satisfaction that he'd lost five pounds lately by not eating some of the things he liked to. His big jaw was firm and his brown eyes were clear. "What you fellows forget," the President said, "when you're aghast at my being in the office at 9:30 at night is that while everybody else had to work after lunch I was having myself a nice little nap."

The nap sometimes lasts an hour. Besides, the President swims before lunch and, if possible, again before dinner. As for other exercise, he conceded, with mock indignation over the previous publication of his secret, that he had not been able to find anybody he could beat at golf. (This one-time sports writer has the same trouble. I haven't broken 100 in 30 years, unless you count it by nine holes.)

On the matter of sleep, the President revealed on the fourth lap around the White House flower bed, he tries to follow the Sam Rayburn formula. The late speaker took a walk every day and spent seven hours in bed, whether asleep or not. The president sleeps less, stays abed more. For example, the other night he was in bed shortly after 10:30 but he watched the 11 o'clock TV news and then read until 2 a. m. He was awake at 6:30 but stayed under the covers until 9, reading the papers and documents which aide Jack Valenti had brought him.

"This job," he said, "takes four or five hours reading a day." Does he read for pleasure? Yes, a little. Biography mostly; some history. His mother used to read to him when he was a boy. "Did it happen?" he would ask. "If it isn't true I don't want to read it."

ONE OF THE HARDSHIPS of this White House garden hike was that the reporters kept stepping on each other, scuffing each other's heels trying to keep pace. Once one nearly tripped the President himself. "Now you know how I felt," he grinned, "when those big policemen with the Number 12s were crowding me at the World's Fair." Mercifully, however, the President paused periodically to philosophize or tell a story.

Yes, he had hung a portrait of Andrew Jackson in his study because he admired him as a man of the people who was courageous and decisive. "I like men who are courageous and decisive," he said, "but I admire other Presidents too. There was Franklin D. Roosevelt" —the first President he had ever met personally. He has known them all since, personally.

On the second lap the President had gone over to the southeast gate and shaken hands with a pack of tourists. Possibly in passing and not necessarily reliable deference to the urgent counsel of Harry Truman, the Secret Service and others concerned about his safety, he did not have the gate opened but shook hands between the bars.

He recalled that during World War II he had been touring military bases with a constellation of Hollywood stars and Jack Dempsey. The Mauler invariably spent more time than anybody else shaking hands and giving autographs. Once he nearly caused the party to miss its travel connections. The then Congressman Johnson scolded him about it. Dempsey apologized.

"But you may not understand," he said. "It's been 20 years since I was heavyweight champion and as long as people recognize me I want to acknowledge it."

Pres. Johnson allowed he might be a little like that in his reaction to folks, too.

Washington Reports:

Davis-Bacon Fringe Benefits Held Vital to Fair Competition

GOVERNMENT CONSTRUCTION contracts will not be completely fair to workers, reliable contractors and communities until the Senate approves the House-passed fringe benefits amendment to the Davis-Bacon Act, Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) and Rep. Frank C. Osmers, Jr. (R-N. J.) declared in interviews on the AFL-CIO public service program, Washington Reports to the People, now heard on more than 700 radio stations.

Fringe benefits are now general among most workers, Roosevelt pointed out, noting that "there are 4,000 welfare and pension funds in the construction industry alone.

"Roughly 70 percent of the building trades people are covered by such benefits," he said, "which means they are an important part of the wages of these millions of American workers."

Osmers recalled that the Davis-Bacon Act requiring payment of local prevailing wages on government construction was the reaction to a southern contractor coming into New York City during the depression of the '30s to build a hospital. The contractor got the bid on the basis of the low wages he paid, brought in his own unskilled workers, taking jobs away from local people.

"This was furthermore, at the time of depression," he said, "with the situation made worse because the imported workers were left in New York jobless."

Such practices, said Roosevelt, are unfair to the workers in a community, to the government which gets a shoddy job, to fair contractors and to the community itself, since "every tradesman and others are affected."

OSMERS ADDED that the taxpayers also are the loser in such cases. He recalled that Rep. Robert Bacon and Sen. James Davis, both Republicans, sponsored the original bill in the administration of a Republican President, Herbert Hoover, and that it has been amended under Democratic administrations to include roads, schools, hospitals, airfields, water pollution control facilities and almost every other kind of government projects.

The proposed amendment would require the inclusion of fringe benfits—medical and hospital insurance, pensions, retirement or life insurance, compensation for injuries or illness, vacation and holiday pay—in determining prevailing wages. The measure would also give the secretary of labor the right to certify other fringe benefits if and when they are general in an area.

Approval is expected soon after Civil Rights is disposed of, Roosevelt predicted, on the basis of 13-2 approval by the Senate Labor Committee and "with only 50 votes against it out of a total of 435 in the House."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

MIAMI—ELECTION DAY in Florida was full of surprises, the most significant of which was that a modern-minded Democrat, Mayor Robert King High of Miami, ran second out of six candidates for governor in his party's primary and will go into a runoff against the mayor of Jacksonville, the state's other big city.

Florida is filled with refugees from the North, many of whom adopt sectional thought-patterns as soon as they get here. The state has voted Republican three straight times for the presidency, including 1960, when it gave its electoral college vote to former Vice Pres. Nixon. It has some Republican congressmen, and the GOP increasingly is putting up candidates for statewide office.

Statewide offices are still decided in the Democratic primary, however, and the next governor will be either Mayor High of Miami or Mayor Haydon Burns of Jacksonville.

The winds sweeping the South on civil rights and other national issues are blowing in Florida. Every local political observer is convinced that Pres. Johnson will carry the state next November against any Republican nominee.

THE PRIMARY RESULTS in other states gave little comfort to extremists.

Gov. Wallace of Alabama got a smaller vote percentage as an anti-civil rights agitator in the Indiana Democratic presidential primary than he did a month earlier in Wisconsin. He mounted a full-scale campaign, but he didn't do much better in vote percentage against Indiana's Gov. Welsh than Harold E. Stassen did in a non-heralded token appearance in the Republican primary against Sen. Barry Goldwater. Approximately 20 percent of the Republicans voted for Stassen and against Goldwater, while Wallace got 30 percent of the Democrats.

Oklahoma voters turned down an anti-union proposal for a constitutional amendment prohibiting union-security agreements between employers and workers.

In Ohio, a Republican supporter of Goldwater, Sec. of State Ted W. Brown, was shatteringly defeated for the GOP Senate nomination by Rep. Robert A. Taft, Jr. Brown assailed the bipartisan House-passed civil rights bill, for which Taft had voted, and charged that the son of the late Republican leader was "too liberal" to represent the GOP. Brown didn't do much better on this platform than Wallace did in Indiana.

Ohio Democrats renominated the veteran liberal, Sen. Stephen Young, to face Taft in November.

IN FLORIDA, Mayor High of Miami is a refreshing candidate to be advanced by the voters to a place once removed from governor. His campaign was long on issues, short on money. Elections are getting increasingly expensive, but High's reports show that his campaign cost less than $100,000 as against an average of $500,000 for each of his five opponents.

On issues, High's position in facing Burns of Jacksonville is clear. He is a nationally-minded Democrat.

Negro protest demonstrations erupted in Jacksonville a few weeks ago. Burns reiterated an announcement that he was against the civil rights bill pending in the Senate. High said that racial tensions in a community should be settled at a conference table instead of with "ax handles in the streets" and said he supported the civil rights bill.

South Florida cities have been plagued by the disruptions arising from the Florida East Coast Railroad's long effort to break the rail unions. Mayor High says he supports action by Congress to divorce the duPont holding-trust empire from its control of both the railroad and a network of Florida banks and industrial interests.

Florida's voters will be lucky if they manage to elect him.

FRINGE BENEFITS are a part of normal wages today and must be included in determining prevailing wages under government contracts, Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), left, and Rep. Frank C. Osmers, Jr. (R-N. J.), declared in calling for Senate approval of the House-passed amendments to the Davis-Bacon Act. They were heard on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

Rising Food Prices Provoke Increasing Consumer Protests

By Sidney Margolius

FOOD MAY SEEM to be a bargain to the U.S. Agriculture Dept., as it has been saying in publicity releases. But it doesn't seem that way to wage-earning families. We are getting more mail protesting food costs than on any other subject. Readers express noticeable resentment over current prices, although some are only infuriated at this column for some of our recent statements.

The high prices of coffee and sugar are special targets for reader resentment. But the worst is yet to come. Some important food staples are due to rise further in the weeks ahead, notably meats and some canned goods, especially fruits. Too, food markets report their operating costs are increasing, so that the slice of the food dollar they take as their margin, now frequently 20-22 cents, seems likely to increase.

The Coffee And Sugar Problem: "I think the price of coffee and sugar are outrageous," writes Mrs. T. G. Smith. "Who can afford to pay those high prices? We, the poorer class, can't."

It's a fact that coffee has risen 16 cents a pound this year, reports Frank Anastasio, manager of Mid-Eastern Cooperatives. The quotas for coffee exported by the producing countries of South America and Asia are set by the Intl. Coffee Organization. However, there seems to be no real shortage.

One of our own government officials recently declared, perhaps without considering all the implications, that consumers must be willing to pay higher prices for products in which foreign policy is involved, as in sugar. However, few moderate income families like Mrs. Smith will agree that they should be taxed on their consumption, without regard to ability to pay, especially when some of the price rises are further inflated by speculative profits.

Cents-Off Puzzle: Reader Irving Magram questions the "cents-off" offers of grocery manufacturers: "Today I went to buy Borden's Instant Coffee. The label said '25 cents off the price.' But what price? The manufacturer does not print the price so we are forced to take the word of the grocer."

Such "cents-off" offers are one of the most irritating puzzles to consumers. Grocery merchandisers say that they do get rebates when manufacturers advertise "cents-off," and that most often the stores do pass on the savings, or some, to consumers. But there is no way of really telling. This is especially true in times of price fluctuation. For example, Maxwell House offers a cents-off deal on its coffee. But the grocer will have some he bought at 73 cents, some at 77, some at 81. He may merely give the discount from the highest price he paid.

Still, it would not pay to ignore "cents-off" deals. Your only real safeguard is to compare prices with other brands of the same product and observe whether the cents-off deal really makes this product cheaper than the others.

No Slur On Beans: James Koloctronis takes very intelligent exception to our recent statement that while beans are the best buy in protein foods, "no one wants to make a meal of beans, at least not too often."

He says this gives the impression people should be ashamed to eat a meal with just beans as a main dish; this fails to encourage an interest in the tasty preparation of beans, which is what can make beans "a delicious, as well as economical, main dish."

WE REALLY MADE that reservation because we didn't want to be accused of consigning American workers to beans during a boom period of an affluent society, or at least part of which is affluent. Mr. Koloctronis has firmed up our courage. It is a fact that legumes are the most-complete of the vegetable proteins; most nearly resemble meat in their protein value, especially if served with some meat, and can be an attractive and nutritious way to supplement smaller servings of meat in the period of higher meat prices dead ahead of us.

Eat on $1 Day Per Person? Mrs. A. B. writes that she is infuriated by our statement that it is possible to feed a family on $1 a day per person; "Do you really live on a dollar a day?" she asks. Moreover, she believes that when the markets offer special buys, they choose cheap and nutritious foods.

Our own family's food bill last month came to $1.10 per person a day. This was for a family of three and included school lunches at 35 cents per. A family of four usually can save 5 percent of the cost for three; a family of five, 10 percent. Actually it would be better if a family could allow about $1.25 a day per person. And keep in mind that the figures we cite are for family food only and do not include soaps, paper products and non-foods you usually buy at a supermarket.

Despite Adaptability:

Occupational Noises Pose Major Hazard

THERE MAY BE more American workers exposed to potentially damaging noise than to any other occupational hazard, a U.S. Public Health Service researcher says.

Dr. Alexander Cohen, in charge of studies by the agency to develop criteria for safe noise levels in industrial workplaces and to perfect ear protection for workers exposed to excessive noise, made the damage estimate.

He said recently that human beings are more adaptable to noise than most people think. His research shows that workers performing simple, repetitive operations do their work just as well in a noisy room as in a quiet one. Efficiency on more complex tasks may be initially decreased by excessive noise, he says, but most of us soon forget the noise and work as well as before. Energy expenditure, oxygen consumption, and other measures of effort, which rise when noise is first encountered, soon return to normal.

One type of situation studied shows significant and sustained performance loss under excessive noise conditions. The worker who must keep constant watch over dials or indicators is less efficient when noise is excessive. Workers who monitor a control panel, inspect items on a conveyor belt, or must react quickly to any visual stimulus probably cannot do their jobs well in a noisy environment, Dr. Cohen says.

Cohen says that community studies consistently show different reactions to "annoying" noises, depending upon individual feelings about the noise source. Investigators find less complaining about sounds associated with necessary or desirable operations. A British survey, for example, showed only 10 percent of the residents of one neighborhood were troubled by the noise of delivery trucks while 40 percent complained about the less intense noises produced by the neighbors' pets. Few of us find the hum of an air conditioner annoying—because we regard comfort more important than the noise. Pollsters have found that 80 percent of the people who complain of aircraft noise also express some fear of airplanes.

Research by the Division of Occupational Health into noise effects is primarily concerned with temporary or permanent hearing loss caused by excessive noise in the workplace. Psychological factors are also under study since they can markedly affect man's ability to do his job.

Cohen and his colleagues point out that a combination of factors must be considered in evaluating the effect of noise upon the human ear—the overall intensity of the sound, its spectrum of high and low frequency bands, duration and frequency of exposure, and susceptibility of the individual's ears. Fortunately, Dr. Cohen says, noise control procedures are quite effective in reducing the more damaging high frequency sounds.

Advice That Starts With an 'IF' Brings Lines Written in a Tiff

By Jane Goodsell

THE DOCTOR SAYS that if he were me, he'd give up smoking and get more exercise.

And Aunt Hattie says if she were me, she wouldn't read in bed because it's bad for the eyes.

And the saleslady says that if she were me, she'd snap up that eggplant colored dress, even if it is a little small, because it only needs a bit of alteration to fit perfectly, and it's absolutely the height of fashion and besides, it's marked down to $89.95.

And my eight-year-old daughter says if she were me, she'd buy herself a white sports car because they're really neat to drive.

And the little boy who comes to the door selling raffle tickets says that if he were me, he'd buy at least 10 because then he'd be 10 times more likely to be a winner.

And my bridge partner says that if he were me, he'd take a few lessons to improve his bidding.

MY HAIRDRESSER says that if she were me, she'd have her hair straightened and streaked with a honey-gold rinse.

And the decorator says that if he were me, he'd do his living room over in imported flowered chintz.

And my college sophomore daughter says if she were me, she'd take a course to help her understand theatre-of-the-absurd drama.

And all my children agree that if they were me, they'd be a much more tolerant, broadminded, up-to-date mama.

And my next door neighbor says that if she had a cold like mine she'd get out the croup kettle and give herself a good steaming.

And, while I suppose I ought to thank all these helpful people who are so eager to help me correct my mistakes,

I'd get more satisfaction from telling them to go jump in the nearest lakes.

If they were really me, that's what they'd feel like telling themselves, too.

And if I were them, I'd quit giving me advice beginning with the words, "If I were you. . . ."

May Affect Bargaining:

Use of New CPI in Contracts Urged on Unions by AFL-CIO

The new Consumer Price Index, updated to reflect today's buying and living patterns, may affect escalator and other contract clauses, the AFL-CIO pointed out in advising unions to shift to the new index.

The nature and purpose of the monthly CPI are discussed in the May issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist under the title, "The New Consumer Price Index."

The CPI, explains the article, is not a cost-of-living yardstick; it records changes in the prices of goods and services bought by urban workers and not how much a family needs to live.

With the rise in recent years of suburban shopping centers and discount stores and with changed living habits, the U. S. Dept. of Labor revised the CPI to bring it up to date and make it more meaningful.

Organized labor is a major user of the CPI. Unions rely on it as one of the bases for justifying wage adjustments and it is the basis for escalator clauses in long-term agreements.

Possible Changes Seen

In the article, a Collective Bargaining Report feature prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, it is noted that these major changes have been made with the new CPI: a reweighting of specific items, a new comprehensive index which covers both urban families and single workers in addition to the family index, new indices for cities of 1 million and over and changes in statistical tools, items covered and areas surveyed.

The new CPI went into effect in January. The old CPI is published concurrently but will be discontinued with the June report. Therefore, the article urges, unions with contract clauses affected by the change in CPI should act as soon as possible to modify the contract language accordingly.

The February CPI provided an easy transition, the article observed, since the old and new indexes were identical for that month.

The main adjustment to be made, the article said, involves escalator clauses covering some 2.5 million workers. These clauses aim at maintaining the buying power of wages during long-term contracts by periodically adjusting pay rates to compensate for increased living costs.

The new CPI creates two requirements for contracts with escalator clauses, the article notes. One is that a date must be set for shifting over; the other is that a choice must be made whether to tie the clause to the comprehensive index or the family index. Generally, it adds, unions favor the broader, comprehensive index.

Major Changes Listed

Pension clauses also may be tied to cost-of-living changes, the article said, and may require language changes.

The new CPI, said the article, is based on surveys of consumer expenditures during 1960 and 1961. On this basis, new weights have been assigned to various items.

Food, for example, now accounts for 22 percent of family spending compared to 28 percent 10 years ago; housing is now 33 percent compared to 31 percent; transportation is 14 percent as against 12 percent in the old index.

Jobless Rate for April Sticks at 5.4 Percent

job picture. Part-time workers are counted as employed, thus helping to show an improved job picture. But the key rate of labor force time lost both through unemployment and part-time work edged upward from 5.8 percent in March to 5.9 percent in April; a year ago it was 6.4 percent.

The report said the improvement in the overall jobless rate over the year reflected a drop in the rate for adult men. Their rate in April a year ago was 4.4 percent; this April it moved down to 3.8 percent from 3.9 percent in March. The rate for adult women improved from 5.6 percent in March to 5.4 percent in April, the same as a year ago. The jump to 16.2 percent in the volatile teen-age jobless rate put it above the 15.6 percent of a year ago.

The problem of the long-term unemployed—those jobless 15 weeks or longer—showed some improvement but remained stubbornly high. The ranks of this group fell by 100,000 over the month, to 1.2 million, instead of rising. A year ago this group totaled 1.4 million. Most of the over-the-year reduction occurred among the worst-off—those jobless six months or longer.

For postwar Aprils, the long-term unemployed reached a high of 2.1 million in 1961 and a low of 242,000 in 1953.

Comparing the April job figures to a year ago, the Labor Dept. said employment is now 1.8 million higher. Non-farm jobs registered a gain of 2 million.

The total labor force was 76.5 million in April, 1.6 million above a year earlier, the report concluded.

Cost-of-Living Index Edges Higher in March

The consumer's cost of living inched upward in March, returning to the record high set in January, the Labor Dept. has reported.

Lower food prices failed to offset price advances for most other consumer items, the report said, pushing up the Consumer Price Index by one-tenth of 1 percent to 107.7, the same as in January.

This means the market basket of goods and services which cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period now costs $10.77.

The March rise in the CPI was "very reassuring" and provided "not the slightest indication of any serious inflation," declared Robert J. Myers, deputy commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Myers said the index for April probably will show "another little increase" of one or two-tenths of a point.

Over the year, the CPI has risen by 1.4 percent.

Some 32,000 workers — about 25,000 of them in the aircraft industry — will receive a 1-cent an hour pay hike on the basis of quarterly reviews of the "old series" CPI. In addition, some 25,000 workers receive increases of one-half, 1 or 2 cents an hour on the basis of escalator clauses tied to "old series" indexes for Baltimore, New York and Los Angeles, respectively.

Both the "old series" index and the new CPI, which was updated to reflect changed buying patterns and put into effect in January, will be published through June; the old series will then be discontinued.

Net Earnings Up

A companion report said the net spendable earnings of production workers in manufacturing moved up slightly to a record high in March. The small gain, the report noted, was due to a slight increase in the workweek; hourly earnings were unchanged.

The report showed the factory worker with 3 dependents took home $90.89 in pay—after federal income and social security tax deductions—21 cents more than in February.

The worker with no dependents took home $83.16—19 cents more than in February.

The figures for both February and March reflect the cut in federal income taxes. Spendable earnings in March for the factory production worker were $4.50 higher than in March 1963.

The factory worker's purchasing power, however, remained almost unchanged over the month because the rise in the CPI offset the gain in earnings. Earning power is up 4 percent over the year.

NLRB Case Load Sets New 3-Month Record

Election requests and unfair labor practice cases increased the National Labor Relations Board's work load to a new record high in the first three months of 1964—7,050 new cases filed and 7,925 cases pending, the board reported.

Unfair practice charges were filed at a new all-time record rate—one every 7.5 minutes of every NLRB workday. For the first time, such charges passed the 4,000 mark for a quarter-year: 2,813 against employers and 1,203 against unions.

Of 2,860 petitions for collective bargaining elections, the board said 1,582 were filed by AFL-CIO affiliates, 1,007 by unaffiliated unions, 234 by employers, 9 were filed jointly and 1 by an individual.

During the quarter the NLRB conducted 1,520 bargaining elections, with 91 percent of 134,618 eligible employes casting ballots. Of the valid votes, 80,044 or 66 percent were cast for collective bargaining representation. Unions won majority designation in 870 elections, or 57 percent of all elections conducted.

The board said AFL-CIO unions took part in 987 elections and won a majority in 509 or 51.5 percent.

It said that in elections involving federation affiliates, 50,670 workers voted for AFL-CIO unions, 33,182 for no union and 15,763 for unaffiliated unions.

As of Mar. 31, 7,925 cases of all types were awaiting disposition at all board levels, compared with 7,113 at the end of December 1963 and 7,115 cases pending as of Mar. 31, 1963.

The report showed that cases awaiting decision by the five-member board also have increased despite a steady flow of decisions—517 cases at the quarter's close as against 475 cases at the end of the preceding quarter and 408 as of Mar. 31, 1963.

High Court Upholds Union's Right To Suggest Lawyers to Members

The Supreme Court has ruled 6-2 that unions have the right to recommend lawyers who may represent individual union members in work-connected litigation.

The court, in an opinion written by Justice Hugo L. Black, said an injunction secured by the Virginia State Bar Association in a Richmond city court—later upheld by the State Court of Appeals—denied members of the Railroad Trainmen rights guaranteed by the 1st and 14th Amendments.

The rights of workers to advice on the need for legal counsel "and, most importantly, what lawyer a member could confidently rely on," is an inseparable part of the constitutional right of the members to assist and advise each other, the court said.

In a dissent Justice Tom C. Clark, joined by Justice John M. Harlan, said the decision "overthrows state regulation of the legal profession and relegates the practice of law to the level of a commercial enterprise." Justice Potter Stewart did not participate in the decision.

The finding, said a union attorney, removes the threat that unions have faced for years of bar association action charging them with the unauthorized practice of law for recommending counsel in workmen's compensation or unemployment compensation cases.

It does not, another attorney observed, dispose of the question of union counselors retained by city or state central bodies to represent injured and unemployed union members without fee before state agencies.

At issue in the Trainmen's case was the legal aid program of the BRT, under which the union's Dept. of Legal Counsel selected a lawyer or firm in each of the union's 16 regions who was, in its opinion, competent to represent injured rail workers or their survivors.

When a worker was killed or injured, local union officials would recommend the lawyer who was to be consulted before any settlement was made. The result of this plan, the court was told, was to channel legal employment to approved lawyers.

In a report prepared for union attorneys by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., David E. Feller of counsel for the department said many unions do not have legal referral systems but some do supply counsel for individual members in compensation cases.

The Supreme Court did not refer to this practice, but did make it "perfectly clear that any attempt to prohibit it would also be condemned as unconstitutional," Feller wrote. He cited this court language:

"It is interesting to note that in Great Britain, unions do not simply recommend lawyers to members in need of advice; they retain counsel, paid by the union, to represent members in personal lawsuits, a practice similar to that which we upheld in NAACP v. Button."

Work Injuries Hit 10-Year High

Disabling on-the-job injuries rose to 2.02 million in 1963, the highest in 10 years, the Labor Dept. reported. These included 14,200 fatalities and 84,800 injuries resulting in some permanent impairment.

The lost time through injuries added up to 42 million man-days, the Labor Dept. said. However, when future losses of potential work-time are taken into account, the ultimate total will be 171 million man-days. This is equivalent to a year's full-time employment for about 551,000 workers.

PRES. JOHNSON STRESSED the need to achieve full employment and pledged a stepped-up public works program if other programs fail to do the job in a talk at the White House to top leaders of the AFL-CIO. The President's remarks in the East Room preceded a dinner given by the President and Mrs. Johnson for the labor officials and their wives.

people what private enterprise fails to do—we will step up our program of public works."

Johnson repeated his comment to business leaders that the nation "may even be able to afford another tax cut in a few years," and that as the "strong thrust of an expanding economy swells our tax revenues," there is the possibility of paring defense expenditures and devoting "new resources to important public programs."

He noted that the nation has been "regaining our competitive edge in international markets" and has an excellent chance of winning back additional markets, but warned that this depends on price stability.

'Guideposts' Defended

He cited the wage-price guideposts "as an essential part of our defense against inflation," commenting:

"The guideposts are sensible and fair. They are in the public interest, and while I cannot—and will not—force anyone to follow them, I can call them to your attention and ask for your cooperation."

He continued that "just as last week I asked business leaders to hold the price line or actually cut prices and share their gains in productivity with consumers, so this week I ask you to do your part to hold wage increases in line with the productivity gains of our economy."

Reviewing the general state of the economy, the President said he was gratified with the progress but "not satisfied." He said "unemployment is too high," and "there is too much poverty in the midst of plenty."

Johnson pointed to the 4 to 5 million people out of work in the U.S. "all the time" while across the Atlantic "such levels of unemployment among our allies are a matter of ancient history. We, too, must catch up with modern history."

He said the tax cut will keep production and incomes going up and the unemployment rate coming down, but that "these are not enough."

"We must create stronger domestic and foreign markets for our products—for these in turn create new jobs," he said.

And on poverty, he stressed, "to drain shameful backwaters of poverty and concentrated unemployment, we must press our war on poverty forward to total victory."

Two Education Pamphlets Revised

Two publications on education, revised and updated to cover the federation's latest policy positions, are now available from the AFL-CIO.

"Labor Looks at Education," Publication No. 127, is a 20-page illustrated booklet containing the AFL-CIO's overall policy on education as adopted by the 1963 convention.

"Labor Champion of Public Education," Publication No. 121, is a 14-page pamphlet revised through early 1964 tracing the history of the American labor movement's support for public education.

Single copies of both publications are available free from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th Street N. W., Washington, D. C. 20006. Up to 100 copies the publications are priced at 10 cents each. Orders for over 100 copies are priced at $7.50 per hundred.

Meany Hails Results:

Oklahoma Voters Reject 'Work' Law

chosen as a prime target of the right-wing coalition which has spearheaded the drive to outlaw union shop agreements.

As it turned out, the proximity of the "right-to-work" states was a factor in defeating the amendment.

Upsets Numerous

In LeFlore County, the majority of the residents cross the border each day to jobs in "right-to-work" Arkansas. The vote in the county was 6,894 to 2,803 against "right-to-work."

Kay County normally votes Republican and in 1960 gave Nixon a 2-1 majority over Kennedy. It was considered "safe" by the "right-to-work" forces. However, large numbers of its residents work across the border in "right-to-work" Kansas. The vote against banning the union shop was an upset 9,210 to 8,238.

Other breakdowns furnished by the Oklahoma State AFL-CIO showed heavy margins against "right-to-work" in areas of labor strength, in Negro precincts and in "Indian areas," such as Cherokee County. The amendment trailed in the two biggest cities, Oklahoma City and Tulsa, despite vociferous support from the powerful daily newspapers.

Back of the now-stalled move to make Oklahoma the 21st state to prohibit union shop agreements were the well-financed forces of the National Right to Work Committee and a special "blue ribbon" task force set up by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. They had strong support from Oklahoma's prolific right-wing extremist groups, the great bulk of the press and the state's Farm Bureau.

For weeks before the election, newspaper, radio and television advertisements exhorted Oklahomans to vote for "right-to-work."

Matched against this array was a state labor movement which mobilized thousands of rank-and-file union members and their wives for a massive educational campaign based on door-to-door canvassing, phone calls, leaflet distribution, card checks and a precinct organization which, in key areas, was organized down to the block and even half-block level.

Labor's Allies Listed

Allied with the trade union movement was a broad-based state affiliate of the National Council for Industrial Peace, leaders of the National Farmers Union, and national, state and local leaders of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and other Negro organizations.

Pres. Roy Tillman and Executive Vice Pres. Len Yarborough of the State AFL-CIO told the AFL-CIO News that after the intensive voter registration campaign, "it would be hard to find a local union in Oklahoma which didn't have its membership 100 percent registered." They had words of special praise for the volunteer work of COPE's Women's Activities Division and local union auxiliaries.

Union observers on the scene estimated that the "right-to-work" groups spent from $5 to $10 for every dollar spent to fight the proposition—but that the thousands of hours of volunteer work made up for the dollar difference.

The current drive to ban the union shop began in earnest late in 1959, when national "right-to-work" leaders came into the state to meet with local employer groups and to press for the election of friendly legislators.

A "work" bill was introduced in the 1961 legislature, but it died in committee with both the House and Senate rejecting moves to force it to the floor.

The "right-to-work" forces then switched tactics and launched a petition campaign in 1962, kicked off at an Oklahoma City meeting of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's self-styled Committee for Voluntary Unionism.

Using paid solicitors, the "work" group turned in 213,000 signatures, some 77,000 more than the minimum needed to qualify for the ballot. Opponents, matching signatures against voter registration rolls, charged widespread fraud and irregularities during nearly two years of hearings before the petitions were validated.

bill, and assistance to the 10-state Appalachia area.

As he spoke, the Senate was taking its first substantive vote—after two full months of debate—on a portion of the civil rights bill.

A broad, leadership-opposed "jury trial amendment" to the civil rights bill, sponsored by Sen. Thruston B. Morton (R-Ky.), was narrowly defeated, 46-45. Morton's proposal, supported by the southern bloc, would have required a jury trial in all cases of criminal contempt of court arising under any section of the civil rights bill.

Both Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) and Minority Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) opposed the Morton amendment. They are co-sponsors of a more limited proposal requiring jury trials before a judge may levy criminal contempt penalties exceeding a $300 fine and 30 days in jail.

The Senate then swamped a modified version offered by Sen. John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.), which was opposed by both the bipartisan leadership and the Dixie bloc.

While the floor debate continued on the jury trial amendments, top Democratic and Republican leaders met with Justice Dept. officials to review a series of amendments which Dirksen has said he will try to write into the bill.

The first meeting produced what Dirksen described as "a good deal of agreement" on a series of technical and clarifying amendments. The conferees, however, had not moved into consideration of the more controversial proposals, those which Dirksen described as having "real clout in them."

In the House, meanwhile, three of Pres. Johnson's priority bills moved a step forward in the legislative process.

The House Post Office and Civil Service Committee approved a bill boosting the pay of federal postal and classified employes, top government executives, federal judges and members of Congress.

It differs from the bill which was defeated in March primarily by reducing the amount of the congressional pay raise from $10,000 to $7,500—and deferring its effective date until next January, when a newly-elected Congress will take office.

It would also trim back and defer raises for Cabinet members and other high-ranking officials.

Rank-and-file government employes, however, would receive the same increases as in the earlier bill, averaging nearly 5 percent, effective on enactment.

The House Public Works Committee opened hearings on the Administration's bill for broad-scale assistance to the Appalachia region, including construction of a 2,350-mile highway system, improvement of health facilities and other measures to be undertaken through a federally-chartered "mixed ownership corporation."

Under Sec. of Commerce Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., told the committee that the five-year program would, if successful, serve as a model for other depressed regions.

Democratic members of a House Labor subcommittee met separately, over Republican protests, to consider revisions in the Administration's anti-poverty package before bringing it to a formal committee vote.

Senate Panel Explores Job-Building Water Plan

A Senate Public Works subcommittee plans to study the feasibility of a continental water supply proposal which, its authors estimate, over the next 30 years would give direct employment to 100,000 workers and create 4 million additional indirect jobs—a total nearly as large as the unemployed U.S. labor force.

The plan, unveiled at a special meeting of the Electric Consumers Information Committee, would take surplus waters from Alaska, the Yukon and British Columbia and redistribute them via canals, tunnels and rivers to water-short areas of 33 states, seven Canadian provinces and three Mexican states.

The Ralph M. Parsons Co., engineering and construction firm which conceived the plan and drew a general outline, reported that its proposal for a North American Water & Power Alliance (NAWAPA) would double the amount of water now available in western North America and increase the power output of Niagara Falls and other areas by 50 percent.

Parsons has developed desert irrigation in Iran and made water surveys for Iraq, and is a prime U. S. defense contractor. It proposes to pump water from the Arctic over the Rocky Mountains, dam it in a 500-mile-long reservoir, and then run it south to generate power, provide irrigation, and bring drinking water to the Southwest and Mexico. Charges would bring in $4 billion a year, and operating costs would run to about $500 million a year.

R-T-W Referendum Ignored by Press

Defeat of the Oklahoma "right-to-work" amendment in a referendum was big news to union members throughout the nation and the top issue for Oklahomans, who cast more votes in the referendum than in the senatorial primary contests of the Democratic and Republican parties combined.

But outside Oklahoma, it was hardly worth a line in the daily press. Readers of the principal eastern newspapers looked in vain for a story on the "right-to-work" referendum. If they were sharp-eyed, they might have found a single sentence in accounts of the victory of the former Oklahoma football coach, Bud Wilkinson, in the GOP senatorial primary.

Senior Citizens Charge:

Elderly 'Victimized' On Health Policies

The president of a Florida senior citizens club told a Senate subcommittee that "high pressure salesmen" have victimized the elderly with "fine print" health insurance policies which bring disillusionment when illness strikes.

Loren Hicks, 73-year-old head of a 700-member club in Pompano Beach, Fla., said insurance firms and agents have engaged in both verbal misrepresentation and "legal but misleading" advertising in selling insurance to those over 65.

Hicks told a panel of the Senate's Special Committee on Aging that the field of health insurance was apparently so lucrative that he had been "offered the sum of $200 for the mailing list of our members by an insurance agent."

Hicks stressed that misleading solicitation was not the only problem faced by older persons in purchasing health insurance. His own policy, Hicks told the subcommittee headed by Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N. J.), provides "very limited benefits." But this, he added, "is all I can afford."

The members of his club, an affiliate of the National Council of Senior Citizens, are "convinced" that the only solution is financing of health care for the aged through social security.

Complaints Cited

Williams said his subcommittee, which has been conducting a broad-ranging inquiry into frauds affecting the elderly, had decided to probe deception in health insurance because of numerous complaints from persons who discover that the policies they purchased "failed them when they most needed help."

The "language of the law" may not cover all cases of deception, Williams noted, "particularly when slippery pitch men deliberately set out to find gaps in that language."

"One thing that is certain, however, is that the sale of an insurance policy is too serious a matter to become a battle of wits between buyer and seller," he added.

The Federal Trade Commission announced, as the hearing opened, that it has drafted new guides for the mail order insurance business aimed at clarifying the laws on deception.

Two witnesses, California Assistant Atty. Gen. Charles A. James and Sherwood Colburn, former Michigan state insurance commissioner, agreed that both federal and state regulation are necessary. A California congressman, Rep. Ronald B. Cameron (D) testified before the committee that California's efforts to tighten controls over health plans have been stymied by insurance, hospital and medical lobbies.

The one-day hearing complemented hearings which have been held by another subcommittee, under Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), on the high cost of health insurance for those over 65.

Steelworkers' Gains Recalled By McDonald

Pueblo, Colo.—Contract gains in the past decade have been worth $1.504 an hour to Steelworkers in the steel, can and aluminum industries, Pres. David J. McDonald said on the basis of a 10-year look at the union's accomplishments.

"Put on a weekly basis, that's worth about $60 to the Steelworker who so benefitted," he told the USWA Dist. 38 conference here. "And by the year, he's about $3,000 better off in wages and benefits than he was 10 years ago.

"None of these gains can be considered exorbitant or unreasonable. And none, at least in proportion, can be considered impossible of achievement for other members of our union. . . . Nothing is impossible for our union if our leadership has the loyalty and understanding of our membership."

In evaluating the gains, McDonald recalled that in 1953 the southern wage differential was wiped out at a cost of 5 cents an hour and a general increase of 8.5 cents was negotiated.

Benefits Established

The year 1955 was "memorable," he said for establishment of the principle of supplemental unemployment benefits, which has paid "more than one-third of a billion dollars" to unemployed members.

The long 1959 strike was "worth it," McDonald continued, because it preserved the work rules clause, won cash advances of 14 cents in wages and 2 cents in increments, and led to employers paying the full cost of insurance. The most recent gains, in 1963, made a major advance toward the "objective of job and income security" with the 13-week extended vacation plan, and improved life insurance, medical and hospital benefits.

Insurance Policy Pays Off In Best Wishes, No Dollars

Entered into the record of Senate hearings on misrepresentation in the sale of health insurance policies to the elderly was a letter received by a woman in Houston, Tex., from a Chicago insurance company.

It read in part:

"I'm glad you wrote. . . . I'm happy to answer your question. Your sickness and accident policy doesn't cover doctor or hospital expenses. So, I am returning the doctor bill. Your claim was paid under Part 5B. . . . The policy says we can pay a maximum benefit of 15 days at $15. . . . From our total payment it was necessary to take off 50 percent due to your age. This is explained in General Provision No. 1.

"From the information we have, it does not appear that your policy would pay any more benefits. I'm sorry about this but I know you will agree we can only pay what the policy permits.

"How are you feeling now? Better, I hope. We wish you the best of health."

STEELWORKERS' DELEGATION of senior citizens from Indiana discusses the drive to enact a social security program of hospital care for the elderly with Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.). The 50-member USWA group from Indiana called on their state's congressional delegation during a four-day conference in Washington, D. C.

Survey Shows Union Members Solidly Back United Fund Giving

Miami Beach—An overwhelming majority of AFL-CIO members believe in supporting health and welfare agencies which receive financial support from unified welfare campaigns for voluntary gifts. This was pointed out in a survey conducted by AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, which shows that 96 percent of rank-and-file union members interviewed endorsed the united fund approach.

The survey was released during the ninth annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services here.

The interviews showed that nearly one-third of the union members thought that labor deserved major recognition of the part it plays in voluntary support of welfare activities.

The sharpest division of feeling was on the question of standards for individual gifts. Forty percent thought it was all right to suggest to donors how much they should give, and 55 percent were opposed to this.

While most union members questioned voiced strong support for the united way of giving, only 27 percent said that they had ever used any of the services provided by fund-supported agencies.

Lyman Ford, executive director of the United Community Funds & Councils of America, said that interest in the total community leads labor to its interest in overall community planning, and that labor wants to see all of the needs of all the people met as nearly as possible.

See A Need

"All organized health and welfare activity comes into being because an individual or a group of individuals see a need and decide that something should be done about it," Ford said. "They study the problem and they stimulate their fellow citizens to be interested in it," he added.

Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), speaking at a luncheon session, said that the federal government is the moral and spiritual leader in building a better country. He called for enactment of old-age Social Security hospital insurance and said that present social security retirement payments fall short of meeting the needs of older people.

Leo Perlis, national director of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, criticized united fund budgeting, declaring that there is too much emphasis on agency needs, and too little emphasis on community needs and planning.

Values Shifted

"Somewhere along the line we have become somewhat less sure of our values," Perlis said. "Fund-raisers get much more money than social workers. Fund-raising agencies attract top level leadership while welfare planning agencies don't. Too many united funds dictate to too many community and health and welfare planning councils. Fund-raising goals are established without real regard to community planning and need."

Campaign slogans are devised to frighten rather than to inform and they are often based only on the half-truth, Perlis observed.

Other speakers, commenting on the conference theme of "voluntary giving for community health and welfare services," included Rabbi Balfour Brickner, director of the Commission on Interfaith Activities, Union of American Hebrew Congregations; Dr. Mortimer R. Feinberg, associate professor of psychology, Baruch School of Business, City College of New York; George Leader, Cancer Crusade chairman; Earl Lippincott, director, National Budget & Consultation Committee.

Presentation of the Murray-Green award posthumously to Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) was to take place on the closing night of the conference. Mrs. Nancy Kefauver was to accept the award for her late husband from AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee.

IBEW Receives Award For Aid to Handicapped

Pres. Johnson presented an award to the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers for the union's long aid to the handicapped at the annual meeting in Washington of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

It was accepted by IBEW Pres. Gordon Freeman, who also is a vice chairman of the committee and presided over its sessions during one of the two days it met.

"Our efforts to build a great society in this nation are being opposed by those who suffer from a handicap not of the body or mind but of the soul," Johnson told the opening meeting.

"They see America in terms of regions or classes or races, not in terms of a people committed to great ends. They see America in terms of static doctrine and staid programs—not in terms of an earthshaking revolution. . . .

"They oppose the assurance of full and equal rights to all our citizens. . . . They ignore the old and suspect the young. They dismiss the poor by answering 'No, no, we are not our brother's keeper.' They spread discord and they breed distrust, tearing down instead of building up, dividing instead of uniting."

Johnson also presented the Handicapped American of the Year Award to Jerry J. Walsh, 41, Corona, N. Y., an arthritis victim, and prizes to five students who won top honors, in a field of 60,000 entries, in the Ability Counts Writing Contest sponsored by the committee and the Governors Committees on Employment of the Handicapped.

They were Donald J. LaVoy, Reno, Nev., who won the $1,000 Judge Robert S. Marx Memorial Award; Margaret Frawley, Eau Claire, Wis., $600; Pat Howell, Fredonia, Kan., $400; Jocelyn Weinberg, New Orleans, $300, and Carol Greenwood, Lawton, Okla., $200.

The prize money was contributed by the Disabled American Veterans. The top winners and the victors in state essay contests were brought to Washington for the meeting by the AFL-CIO state bodies in their respective states. All the winners were entertained by the AFL-CIO at a luncheon at which the state prizes were presented by Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler.

They also were taken on a tour of Washington by the IBEW during which LaVoy and Miss Frawley laid wreaths at the tomb of the Unknown Soldier and at the grave of the late Pres. Kennedy. The students were guests of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. at a luncheon in the Senate restaurant at which they were addressed by Senators Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Alan Bible (D-Nev.).

Sharing the role of presiding officer with Freeman at committee sessions was the new chairman, Harold Russell, recently named to succeed the late Maj. Gen. Melvin J. Maas. Russell, former commander of the AMVETS, had been vice chairman of the committee and helped organize Boston Local 592 of the Meat Cutters in the 1930s.

Net Profits Skyrocket in First Quarter

Historic High Marks Left Behind, Record-Shattering Year Indicated

ment in 1964, or 12 percent more than in 1963.

About 20 percent of the total will be spent for automated equipment, an increase over the 18 percent allocated in 1963.

The profits and spending reports came also as the national economy in April chalked up a peacetime record of 38 months of uninterrupted expansion without recession. The outstanding factor, economists noted, was the stability in wholesale prices and, according to the New York Times, "an unusually small upward movement of consumer prices averaging about 1.3 percent a year."

Rate at All-Time High

The Times summed up the profit outlook after surveying first quarter reports from 355 companies showing a 33.2 percent increase over the same quarter of 1963. It commented that "the rate of increase and the total corporate profits easily surpassed any other within a comparable period of history."

The Wall Street Journal, in its quarterly compilation of corporate profit reports, showed first-quarter profits for 548 companies reaching a new record rate, increasing 21.1 percent over the 1963 period. The Journal termed it the biggest year-to-year gain for any quarter since the first three months of 1962, when earnings were compared with those of the "poorest quarter of the 1960-61 business recession."

The Journal estimated that the first quarter is the fourth consecutive quarter to show a "substantial gain" in the annual profit rate and expected the 1964 rate to exceed the $28.7 billion after-tax rate set in the last three months of 1964.

Of the 28 industry, railroad and utility groups charted by the Journal, all but one—tobacco—showed an increase over the 1963 quarter, with railroads up 92.3 percent.

The First National City Bank, surveying 1,000 earnings reports, found a first-quarter profits gain of 21 percent. The bank commented that "higher operating rates, together with firming prices in a number of industries, are bringing long-awaited relief from the profit squeeze."

The record-smashing profit reports came only a few weeks after Henry Ford II in a speech at the University of Chicago declared that profits had really gone down since 1950, and were too low to allow for the necessary level of investments needed to insure economic expansion.

The McGraw-Hill survey noted that in the fall of 1963 the same companies had indicated a 4 percent increase in capital spending for 1964. The early 1964 survey sent that figure to 12 percent.

The manufacturing segment of the survey plans to spend 18 percent more than last year and is beginning to increase its capacity as well as stressing modernization and new, automated equipment. The survey said that new depreciation rules and new tax credits are expected to result in more than $1 billion of investment in new facilities this year.

Labor economists noted that the McGraw-Hill survey supported contentions concerning the speed of technological change. The survey notes that if both employment and sales expectations are realized, it would mean productivity increases in the next four years will be about 3.7 percent annually, a rate considerably higher than the historical average for the private economy.

Labor has noted that the 3.5 percent annual productivity increase of the past three years was not merely a reflection of cyclical changes.

The survey shows also that as a result of planned capital expenditures for 1964 manufacturers will add 5 percent to their capacity. Estimates by the government show an anticipated 87 percent operating rate by the end of 1964 compared to a preferred operating rate of 92 percent.

The survey points out that employment in industry is expected to increase by about 8 percent from the end of 1963 to 1967. This is below the estimated 12 percent rate of growth in jobs which is deemed necessary if the economy as a whole is to achieve full employment by the end of 1967.

LABOR'S SUPPORT of foreign aid program was stressed by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller in this discussion with Chairman Thomas E. Morgan (D-Pa.), chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and in formal testimony later before the full committee.

Labor Asks Expanded Foreign Aid Program

because we believe that foreign aid has been a decisive force in the stabilization, reconstruction and present strength of the countries of Western Europe. We are proud of it because we believe it is contributing greatly to the maintenance and extension of freedom in Latin America, Africa and Asia, and to improvement in the standard of living in those countries."

Warning that "the last year has given no reason to reduce our efforts," Biemiller pointed to the "hot war" in South Vietnam, "threats to the peace" in Laos, and "continuing efforts by the Communist nations to subvert existing free societies" in Africa and Latin America.

He reminded the committee of the AFL-CIO's large-scale efforts in the international field and said AID assistance in encouraging cooperatives, credit unions and labor unions has "not been nearly enough."

There has been some lack of public understanding regarding the accomplishments and operations of the foreign aid program, Biemiller agreed in reply to a question. Few people realize, he pointed out, that 80 percent of the foreign aid budget is spent in the United States for American-produced goods and products.

In urging the committee to go beyond the Administration request in the foreign aid authorization bill, Biemiller noted that the Appropriations subcommittee has "a very unfortunate habit" of slashing the amount authorized to be spent in the foreign aid bill.

"We urge you to fight those who would destroy the program," Biemiller told the Foreign Affairs Committee. "We urge you to make it strong enough to provide hope and freedom for the world."

Rightwingers Rebuffed in Voting, Civil Rights Moderates Supported

Voters in seven states and the District of Columbia marked ballots in primary elections last week rebuffing rightwing conservatives and indicating support for moderate and liberal candidates on the civil rights issue.

National attention was focused on Indiana where Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace was soundly defeated in his attempt to win delegates to the Democratic national convention by Indiana Gov. Matthew E. Welsh, standing in for Pres. Johnson.

Wallace, who racked up about 25 percent of the total vote cast in the Wisconsin primary in his first bid as a presumed presidential candidate, got 19 percent of the total vote cast in Indiana and about 30 percent of the Democratic vote. His backers had claimed earlier that his anti-civil rights program would garner at least 40 percent of the Democratic vote in the state.

Sen. Barry Goldwater won Indiana's 32 delegates to the Republican National Convention but the over 100,000 votes won by Harold E. Stassen, the only other candidate on the ballot, was generally interpreted as an upset. In other state primaries Stassen has won only a handful of votes.

Goldwater won easily in the Texas primary as well, but an unexpectedly large write-in vote for Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge surprised Texas observers.

In Florida, a gubernatorial primary in the Democratic party produced an upset when Mayor Robert King High of Miami won a spot in the May 26 runoff against Mayor Haydon Burns of Jacksonville. High and Burns hold opposing civil rights views with Burns generally reflecting the traditional southern view and High the moderate-liberal viewpoint.

In Ohio, Rep. Robert A. Taft (R) won the GOP senatorial nomination by a wide margin, defeating Sec. of State Ted W. Brown, who had the support of rightwing forces and who made Taft's House vote for the civil rights bill a major issuse in the campaign. Sen. Stephen M. Young (D) won the senatorial nomination defeating astronaut John H. Glenn who had earlier pulled out of the race and did not campaign.

In Alabama, the Wallace forces, as generally expected, named an unpledged slate of electors for the presidential election, preventing Pres. Johnson's name from appearing on the ballot in November.

In Texas, liberal Democratic Sen. Ralph Yarborough successfully fought off a conservative challenge and defeated Gordon McLendon in a campaign that brought charges of "electronic smears" from Yarborough. Gov. John Connally won renomination in the primary, easily defeating Don Yarborough (no relation to the senator).

In Oklahoma, Sen. J. Howard Edmondson and State Sen. Fred Harris will fight it out for the Democratic senatorial nomination in a May 26 primary runoff to determine which one will oppose Bud Wilkinson in November. Wilkinson, former Oklahoma football coach, easily won the GOP race.

In New Mexico, in a Democratic primary contest for a House at-large seat, E. S. Walker defeated Fabian Chavez and will face Republican Jack Redman in Novem

Primary contests in the seven states for House seats showed few changes with most incumbents winning. In Texas there will be a Democratic runoff for the state's at-large seat between Rep. Joe Poole and State Sen. Robert W. Baker. A runoff will be held also in Oklahoma for the Democratic nomination for the seat now held by Rep. Victor Wickersham, who is being challenged by Jed Johnson, Jr.

In the District of Columbia, a three-way Democratic contest in the District's first primary for national committeeman and other party posts resulted in a victory for the Rev. E. Franklin Jackson and his slate strongly supported by the local AFL-CIO.

ILO Body to Hear Japanese Case

Geneva—The Intl. Labor Organization's Fact-Finding & Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association, established in 1950 to examine complaints charging infringement of trade union rights, is about to receive its first case.

The allegations were made against Japan, which has given its consent to taking the case to the commission following an examination by the Committee on Freedom of Association of the ILO Governing Body.

A panel of three members of the commission, which is made up of independent persons, has been named to consider the case. It consists of Erik Dreyer, former permanent secretary of the Danish Ministry of Social Affairs, chairman; David L. Cole, impartial arbiter under the AFL-CIO Internal Disputes Plan and former director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, and Sir Arthur Tyndall, formerly a judge of the New Zealand Court of Arbitration.

'Brotherhood' Film Selected by USIS

The AFL-CIO film "In Common Brotherhood" will soon be shown around the world under the sponsorship of the U.S. Information Service.

Selected for inclusion in the U.S. foreign information program after favorable screenings in 15 countries, the film will be available in English or Spanish dialogue.

"In Common Brotherhood" was first seen on nationwide television on Labor Day, 1963. The 28-minute film depicts the AFL-CIO's worldwide activities to help build free trade union movements everywhere.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Education will continue to make "In Common Brotherhood" available to affiliates and other organizations for rental or purchase.

Construction Needs Studied By ILO Body

Geneva—Steps to help stabilize the construction industry in the face of a worldwide boom and fast-spreading technological changes are being weighed at a meeting of the Intl. Labor Organization's Building, Civil Engineering & Public Works Committee here.

Government, labor and industry representatives from 25 nations make up the committee, with Executive Vice Pres. William T. Dodd of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and Pres. J. C. Turner of the Greater Washington AFL-CIO serving as spokesmen for American workers.

The committee is studying three reports which detail issues growing out of demand for the industry's services, the socio-economic effects of technological change and irregularity of employment.

One of the reports notes that the building boom is as great in developing countries as in the more industrialized countries. This, it said, is due in part to the world population explosion with its related demand for new homes and the things that go with them.

The U.S. delegation to the meeting is led by Deputy Administrator Edward C. Sylvester, Jr., of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Intl. Labor Affairs.

Teachers In Detroit Vote Union

Detroit — Unionism scored a whopping promotion here when teachers graded their own organizations and placed the Detroit Federation of Teachers at the head of the class. The AFL-CIO union became sole negotiating agent for the public school system's 9,700 teachers when it defeated the Detroit Education Association by a decisive vote of 5,739 to 3.848.

The representation election wiped out the Detroit Board of Education's proposal for proportional representation by the rival organizations, a plan endorsed previously by the DEA.

The Teachers' Union local, which brought about the election through a year-long campaign, made plans for bargaining sessions with the school board immediately after announcement of the election returns. Work on the new school budget is scheduled for completion in two weeks.

Mrs. Mary Ellen Riordan, DFT president, hailed the union victory as "a new era for teachers in Detroit."

Immediate objectives in bargaining with the board, she said, will be reduction of class size, improvements in salaries and elimination of non-teaching chores.

"The youngsters in the Detroit schools will have a better chance for a good education than they ever had before," she asserted.

Better Teaching Seen

"Teachers will be able to take better advantage of opportunities and facilities in the school for creative and resourceful teaching. They'll have this opportunity because there will now be mutual agreement between teachers and administrators rather than just having orders come down from the top."

The DFT petitioned for a representation election a year ago. The bid was turned down on the basis of a board statement that such an election would be illegal under Michigan's Hutchinson Act, which restricts union activity of state and local government employes. Upon petition of the DFT, State Atty. Gen. Frank J. Kelley ruled the act did not prohibit holding such a vote.

The school board, which then stalled for months on the DFT election request, ordered a straw poll to determine sentiment on exclu-

THE RESPONSIBILITIES of leadership passed at third annual convention of the National Council of Senior Citizens from Aime Forand, shown at left with Mrs. Forand, to John W. Edelman, recently retired legislative representative of the Textile Workers Union of America. Edelman had been acting president since Forand, former congressman from Rhode Island, was sidelined by illness.

Senior Unit Pushes Health Care Fight

By Gene Kelly

Enactment of a law providing hospital insurance protection for America's 18 million over-65 retirement beneficiaries is still the No. 1 objective of the National Council of Senior Citizens and an "essential weapon in Pres. Johnson's war against poverty," the council has declared.

Girding for a last-ditch drive for passage of their favorite bill in this session of Congress, 1,200 delegates from 40 states, in Washington for their third annual convention, declared their support for hospital care financed by social security by a unanimous standing vote. They also:

- Elected John W. Edelman of Arlington, Va., as NCSS president and paid tribute to his predecessor, former Rep. Aime Forand (D-R. I.), for his earlier leadership. Forand has been ill the past year.
- Urged the President to proclaim May 29 each year as Senior Citizen Day in memory of the late Pres. Kennedy. The date is Kennedy's birthday anniversary.
- Called for improvements in the Social Security Act but declared that "a mere increase in social security cash payments is not an acceptable alternative" to hospital care legislation. Neither, the convention said, is the Kerr-Mills Act with its "built-in indignity" of a means test.

At the convention's close, Edelman took a report on the council's recommendations to Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) of the House Ways & Means Committee, which resumed closed sessions May 12 on this and other pending legislation.

Edelman said the council will, after passage of the King-Anderson bill or a comparable measure, support these social security improvements:

- Earlier retirement—perhaps 60 for men, 55 for women.
- A basic increase in benefits in line with the concept of a "modest but adequate" budget, as defined by the compilers of the Consumer Price Index.
- A program to tie social security benefits to increasing na-

Leaders Propose Amendment Plan

Senate leaders took a first step towards conclusive action on civil rights after more than two months of increasingly repetitious debate.

The move to force action through a bipartisan agreement paralleled the procedures in the House in which the Republican leadership swung party support behind the original stalled civil rights bill.

Democratic and Republican leaders emerged from a series of meeting with Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy and his top staff carrying a package of amendments designed to win additional backing for the bill. The amendments were originally proposed by Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.).

They will be circulated among senators of both parties and brought up for endorsement at separate Republican and Democratic caucuses.

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights said it will undertake "a line-by-line analysis of each proposal" before reaching a final evaluation. "Our preliminary study indicates that some proposals would weaken the measure and result in unnecessary delays in enforcement," the group stated.

The conference, made up of organizations active in the civil rights drive, declared: "We deeply appreciate the efforts of our friends in the Senate to explore every possible avenue toward prompt passage of this bill. Every proposal they make will be carefully weighed by us."

'No Compromise'

"We do not intend to compromise our principles. We insist on passage of a measure which will be meaningful, enforceable and just, and which will provide speedy relief

Railroad Job Slash Hits 3,000

More than 3,000 firemen on diesel railroad engines lost their jobs when 200 U.S. railroads put into effect an arbitration award made by a national panel of arbiters.

The discharge or transfer of several hundred other workers drew charges from rail union brotherhoods of "flagrant abuse" by management in its interpretation of the award and led to at least 12 short protest walkouts.

These were the developments as the award, made by a panel of arbiters healed by Ralph T. Seward, was put into effect May 7:

- Walkouts or "absences due to illness" on several roads were called off at the urging of Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Firemen & Enginemen.
- U.S. District Judge Alexander Holtzoff, in District of Columbia court, issued a permanent injunction to forestall strikes. He said those failing to report for work without a lawful excuse may be fired by their employers or listed as resigned.
- The arbitration board headed

$2 Wage Floor Called Vital to Poverty Drive

A $2-an-hour minimum wage and extension of protection to millions of workers now not covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act is "needed badly" as an expansion of Pres. Johnson's "war on poverty" program, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told a national radio network audience.

"We feel that passage of the poverty bill itself is important," Biemiller said.

The Administration bill "will stimulate planning in the cities to attack slum areas, to attack illiteracy, to attack the problem of basic adult education," Biemiller pointed out. It would provide "special programs" for migrant farm workers, "a very hard-hit part of our population."

The separate Administration Appalachia bill, which he described as primarily a public works program designed to provide dams and access highways, is a "cleaning-up sort of thing," Biemiller said, and labor supports it "very strongly."

Nevertheless, other measures are needed to supplement both the anti-poverty bill and the Appalachia bill, he declared in a Labor News Conference appearance in which he answered questions from Hobart Rowan, economics reporter for Newsweek, and Eve Edstrom of the Washington Post. The interview was carried nationally over the Mutual Broadcasting System radio network.

"The real cure for poverty is jobs," Biemiller said. "If jobs are non-existent, all the preparation in the world won't help" those who are trained under the anti-poverty program.

"We think there ought to be a much broader program of public

Clothing Workers Back New Term for Johnson

By David Perlman

New York—Pres. Johnson came to the World's Fair to ask cheering thousands of union members—delegates and guests at the Clothing Workers 50th anniversary convention—to help win the Administration's "unconditional war" on poverty and discrimination.

"You can count on our unqualified support," ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky told the President.

Later, as the convention moved from the fairgrounds amphitheater to its regular business sessions, the ACWA voted a formal endorsement of Johnson for election to a full term as President after a standing, whistling, foot-stamping ovation.

Referring to the President's speech, Potofsky told the delegates there was "no question" where Johnson stands.

"Whether it is civil rights or medicare, unemployment or poverty," Potofsky said, "he stands where we stand."

The President repeated, in his nationally televised speech to this New York convention, the words he had spoken the day before to Georgia state legislators in Atlanta, that the civil rights bill must be enacted "because the constitution requires it and justice demands it."

The President spoke of the "30 million hungry, aimless, forgotten refugees" left behind in the nation's "march of progress" and warned that "a future generation of Americans will rise up to curse us for the bitter legacy of despair we passed on" unless there is action now to achieve "full employment in America . . . in our time."

STRIKE at Planters Peanut plant in Suffolk, Va., ended in an agreement not long after picture was taken. The photo shows strike leaders, during "break" in negotiations, leading workers in song on plant steps. The union, a local of Retail, Wholesale & Department Store, won wage raises of 10 cents an hour now and 7 cents next May 1 for 900 workers, 16 cents for others.

$1.50 Minimum Won for 900 Women In Peanut Plant Strike Settlement

Suffolk, Va.—In an emotion-filled meeting, 1,600 members of Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Local 26 ratified a new two-year contract with the Planters Peanut Co. to end their week-long strike.

The union won its chief demand, a $1.50 hourly minimum for the lowest pay category of workers by May 1, 1965. This means a 17-cent an hour wage increase for 900 Negro women workers, while the other plant employes won 16 cents, or 8 cents each year.

"We won a real victory," Local Pres. Lock Parker said.

The strike, which began at midnight Apr. 30, was marked by police brutality as Suffolk city policemen, state troopers and police dogs moved in on a group of pickets at a railroad spur leading to the plant. Forty local members were struck by police clubs or bitten by dogs, and four were hospitalized. Sixteen strikers were arrested, but freed on bail later the same day.

An essential element in the union's victory was the solidarity of 1,300 Negro workers and 300 white union members. In the past the company has had some success in separating the whites from the Negroes, and "conquered by dividing," a union spokesman said. "This time all the union members agreed on the need to raise the wages of the lowest-paid workers as the primary goal in bargaining.

The union won improvements in arbitration procedures, the right of union officials to speak to workers at the plant, a guarantee of five days of pay a week for employes transferred to the night shift by the company; the right of senior employes in the raw peanut department to shift to other departments when that department is shut down, usually July through November; a number of inequity adjustments; and the right to negotiate on rates for new jobs. In the past the company set these rates by itself.

The company will also continue a 7-cent-an-hour welfare plan contribution and a 5-cent pension plan contribution. The joint labor-management plan, which is administered by the union, was set up Apr. 1 of this year. It provides pensions ranging from $40 to $65 monthly.

Unsettled Issues

A number of issues not settled are to be negotiated. If no agreement is reached, the items will be resolved by arbitration.

This was the first major walkout at Planters in 14 years, but the workers carried out their strike assignments with spirit.

The violence took place at a Norfolk & Western Railroad spur at the plant when the company tried to move out its products in four boxcars. Union trainmen refused to drive the engine, and an N&W supervisor took over as engineer. When the locomotive reached the picketline, the pickets laid down on the tracks. The police moved in and beat the demonstrators, both men and women. Other policemen directed dogs at several hundred local members across a street, preventing them from coming to the aid of their fellow members, the union said.

A group of civil rights leaders, including officers of Local 26, protested to the city administration and to the FBI. The next day, at a bargaining session, members of the local's negotiating committee bluntly denounced a company officer for "complicity" in the police attack.

The plant manager, T. J. LoCascio, issued a statement of company regret and denied that any supervisory personnel were involved.

Seven FBI agents, sent to Suffolk by Assistant Atty. Gen. Burke Marshall of the Dept. of Justice, in charge of the Civil Rights Division, investigated the incident. They have questioned the union members who were attacked.

Suffolk Bus Boycott Wins Job for Negro

Suffolk, Va.—After a four-day boycott of Suffolk busses by Negro residents here, the local bus company has promised to hire a Negro driver.

The boycott, which had the full support of Negroes in this Tidewater Virginia community, began May 3, two days after 1,600 members of Local 26 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union struck the Planters Peanut Co. The support of union members was decisive in the boycott, which was almost totally effective.

The Rev. Ronald E. Morris, the Rev. C. J. Word and Local 26 Pres. Lock Parker headed the Suffolk Coordinating Committee, which directed the boycott.

Detroit Teachers Seek 1st Contract for Union

sive bargaining after federation members overwhelmingly approved strike action. Almst 80 percent of the classroom teachers supported holding the election, on the basis of seeking exclusive rights, after an aggressive DFT campaign caused the DEA to reverse itself and abandon its stand for proportional representation.

Mrs. Riordan said the election does not change her union's reluctance to use strike weapons. "They are an absolute last resort," she said, "and we've said that right along."

The federation had the support of Detroit's organized labor movement although the union could not match the well-heelel DEA drive, which made extensive use of newspaper advertising plus television and radio programs and spot announcements.

Detroit became the second large city, following New York, to agree to deal exclusively with the teachers' union. The DFT's recognition, however, is not permanent. The school board has announced it will set another representation election to be held "no sooner than 11 months and no later than 18 months" from the date of the union-won balloting.

Board of Education members expressed hope the election would mark the beginning of a better relationship with teachers. "This is possibly the beginning," said Pres. Leonard Kasle, "of a new and creative relationship between the board, the superintendent and the teachers."

Retired Electricians Train for Recreation

New York—More than 80 retired members of the Construction Div. of Local 3, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, have registered for a special, union-sponsored training program in electronics.

Business Mgr. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., in welcoming them to the class, pointed out that the program offers them an interesting recreation and will teach them how to repair their own radio and television sets.

Abuses Charged:

Railroad Crew Slash Hits 3,000 Firemen

by Seward scheduled meetings for May 16-17 and June 8-9 to settle disputes over interpretation of the award.

Union sources said up to 30,000 firemen and other trainmen may ultimately be affected. Those with less than two years of seniority were subject to immediate layoff under the award, and others may keep their jobs but will not be replaced when they retire or die.

Gilbert said some rail managers, by misinterpreting the award, deprived men with high seniority of their job rights. He cited the example of experienced workers assigned, after their jobs were abolished, to fill vacated jobs in adjoining states where "full crew" laws require an irreducible number of crewmen.

He reported that of 51,000 BLF&E members, some 31,000 work as firemen-helpers, 16,000 as engineers and 4,000 as hostlers.

The Seward award affects about 34,000 firemen in freight and yard service. Of these, 22,100 have 10 or more years of seniority and may continue to work as firemen. Some 10,000 men with 2 to 10 years of seniority will work as firemen until or unless they are offered comparable employment. A third group consisted of 3,000 low-seniority and irregular workers severed May 7.

After the award expires in March 1966, the BLF&E will "demand that firemen be placed on all jobs that now require firemen, unless an agreement on the question is reached beforehand," Gilbert asserted.

In a parallel development, union and management negotiators met in Washington to draft final language of an agreement to be submitted for ratification by members of five operating brotherhoods under the White House agreement of Apr. 22. This involved a dispute over working rules and away-from-home expenses for road and yard crews.

Screen Guild Asks Hike In TV Rerun Payments

Hollywood, Calif.—A 100 percent increase in residual payments for reruns of television films in the United States and Canada is being sought by the Screen Actors Guild in contract negotiations just opened.

The demand was served on the Association of Motion Picture & Television Producers, with which the union bargains on behalf of actors, singers and stuntmen. The present contract expires at midnight June 30.

SAG, in addition, asked for an 8-hour day on location, with reduction of the workweek from 6 to 5 days; overtime at the rate of time and one-half for the ninth hour, double time for the 10th hour and triple time thereafter.

The Guild is not asking for an increase in basic minimum rates, which are $100 a day, $255 for three days and $350 on a weekly basis.

On reruns in the U.S. and Canada the current agreement calls for 35 percent of the applicable minimum for the second run, 30 percent for the third and 25 percent for the fourth, fifth and sixth runs.

The formula SAG is seeking would yield 100 percent of the applicable minimum for the second run, 75 percent for the third, 50 percent for the fourth, 30 percent for the fifth and 25 percent for the sixth run, with the total number of runs limited to six.

World Rates

In other countries, the union has proposed a rate of 60 percent of the applicable minimum for worldwide rerun rights except for Great Britain, where the 60 percent would cover one rerun and a 33⅓ percent rate would be set for the second and third runs. The proposed British fees are the approximate equivalent of those set by British Equity. The limit of three reruns set by the British union also would be applied.

Executive Sec. John L. Dales of the union said the actors' share of the TV reruns had not kept pace with "the profits the reruns generate for the broadcasters."

"There are obvious and justifiable reasons for the increases," he said, "including value received, increases in comparable charges such as station time, and the unfair competition created by reruns. For any given run, the present compensation is just not adequate."

The SAG proposal also seeks improvement in other contract items such as trailers, re-use of photography and sound tract, options, layoffs, exclusivity in connection with series contracts, increase of flight insurance to $100,000, first-class transportation, screen credits, non-discrimination, conditions on the sets and holidays.

Election Won By Teachers In Yonkers

Yonkers, N. Y.—A spirited young local of the Teachers defeated a chapter of the National Education Association in a runoff election here to choose the exclusive collective bargaining representative of 1,177 teachers.

The vote, conducted by the Board of Education, was AFT 582, NEA 507. In a previous vote, the union came in second in a choice between three organizations and no union, when it got 488 votes to the NEA's 523 with scattered votes for the other two choices.

The winner has petitioned the board to recognize the wish of a majority as expressed at the polls. The board, which had declared that a majority among all teachers would be necessary for exclusive recognition, has the request under consideration.

The union margin was seven votes shy of an absolute majority. Fifty of the teachers who did not vote were absent because of illness or other reasons. The Yonkers local of AFT has asked that the board permit them to vote or eliminate them in counting the majority.

The NEA group petitioned for the election, and both union and non-union groups campaigned vigorously for bargaining rights. The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. cooperated with the Teachers in the ensuing campaign, one of several such cooperative efforts at organizing now under way.

A First for Texas:

New Hotel Contract Ends El Paso Strike

El Paso, Tex.—The first major hotel contract in Texas has been won by a plucky band of 125 low-paid workers, back on the job after a 54-week strike.

Culinary Local 628 of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes succeeded in getting a contract from new management of the Plaza Motor Hotel that members never were able to win from the prosperous Hilton Hotel chain, the former owners.

The new management not only agreed to the return of all strikers to their jobs with no loss of seniority but also provided wage increases ranging from 5 cents an hour for some workers up to $87.50 a month—for cooks.

Every job classification won a rate increase. Also provided in the contract, besides a dues deduction or "checkoff" clause and a grievance-arbitration procedure, are the following benefits:

Hospitalization and surgical insurance for workers and their families, group life insurance, vacations of one or two weeks, two paid holidays, reduction of the workday to eight hours with time and one-half pay for overtime, maintenance of uniforms and linens at the employer's expense.

The contract is most notable, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Lester Graham said, because the hotel agreed to a settlement despite the opposition of the strongly non-union Texas Hotel Association. Graham has notified 27 labor central bodies in the state that the Plaza now is a union hotel and also free from racial discrimination.

Congratulations on the local's victory were voiced by Graham and by the officers of the Texas AFL-CIO—Pres. H. S. (Hank) Brown and Sec.-Treas. Roy R. Evans. Those who helped, they said, included Mrs. Gustava Holohan, of the Hotel & Restaurant staff; J. M. Scott of the regional director's staff; and the Most Rev. S. M. Metzger, bishop of the El Paso Catholic diocese.

The Plaza was a Hilton Hotel when the workers picked the union as their representative in a National Labor Relations Board election. After months of futile trying for a first contract, the bellboys, maids and culinary workers walked out Apr. 18, 1963.

The strikers declared in public messages that the huge Hilton chain, with 34 U.S. hotels, was paying its El Paso workers lower wages than Mexican contract farm workers (braceros) were receiving for field work.

Some workers reported they got no wages at all, but had to live on tips. Others said they received as little as 13 cents an hour.

Hilton sold out after the first seven months of the strike.

After the settlement with the new management, the union won a second contract—with the Hilton Inn near the El Paso Intl. Airport, where it had been the legal bargaining agent for two years. The new pact provides wage hikes of 10 cents an hour and up for about 150 employes.

GREETINGS WERE EXCHANGED between AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany (third from right) and 30 visiting members of the Swedish Metal Workers Union at a meeting in the AFL-CIO Executive Council room. Their hosts in the U.S. also included the Auto Workers, Machinists, Steelworkers and Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Study of Automation Job Losses Endorsed by Distillery Workers

San Francisco—The Distillery Workers convention urged Congress to create a top level Commission on Automation, as proposed by Pres. Johnson, to draft action preventing widespread job destruction and unemployment from new technology.

The DWU's 12th biennial convention wound up with re-election of incumbent officers headed by Pres. Mort Brandenburg and Sec.-Treas. George J. Oneto.

Resolutions and convention speeches sounded the alarm at automation's inroads against workers' jobs and urged constructive programs to extend the benefits of automation to working people rather than increase joblessness.

Other convention action included calls to beef up the war on poverty by enacting old-age social security hospital insurance, improving social insurance and welfare benefits, ending job discrimination, and extending labor's campaign to organize the unorganized. The convention urged passage of the civil rights bill and state and local legislation for equality.

The automation commission would comprise top labor, business and government leaders. Its tasks would include making information available to predict technological changes before they occur, aiding labor and management with information for collective bargaining solutions, drafting needed public and private economic policies, coordinating government agency efforts and studying other nations' answers to automation for possible adaptation.

The convention approved DWU bargaining aims of a guaranteed work force, shorter work week, sabbatical leave, a fifth week of vacation, severance pay and a ban on overtime as long as there is a jobless problem.

Oneto warned the convention that management does not yet accept full employment as a goal so the solution "is not entirely at the bargaining table." He said that management has the responsibility to retrain displaced workers while retaining them on the payroll. If management rejects such retraining, Oneto said, "then it is the employer responsibility to permit the worker to retire as superannuated by a machine just as surely as by age."

"Industry and labor must agree in principle that no worker shall join the permanently unemployed because of new technology," Oneto said.

The convention opposed further reduction now of U.S. tariffs on wines and spirits under present conditions. It charged that these conditions include discriminatory foreign barriers to American liquor imports and higher U.S. labelling and production requirements for domestic than for foreign products.

The delegates called on American negotiators at Geneva to propose international fair labor standards, guaranteeing fair shares of the benefits of productivity to workers in each country, as a prerequisite to tariff revisions, thus curbing low wage competition.

The union sought a larger sugar market allotment to domestic suppliers and larger acreage and urged that the minimum wage for beet sugar field workers be raised to conform with Fair Labor Standards Act levels.

Pres. George Baldanzi of the United Texile Workers, a convention speaker, discussed the job-displacing effects of automation and urged a union role in planning for new equipment so that technology's benefits are shared with the workers.

Addressing the Distillery Workers the day after defeat of the "right-to-work" proposal in Oklahoma, COPE Dir. Al Barkan said that "the miracle of Oklahoma" refutes any doubt that labor has great political effectiveness if it makes the proper effort.

"Work" forces in Oklahoma had the support of every major newspaper and enjoyed a 10 to 1 advantage over labor in newspaper, radio and television advertising, spending more than $2 million, Barkan said.

But the "work" proposal lost, he pointed out, because the state's labor movement went back to fundamentals—voter registration, appeals to the Negro and Indian communities, and above all speaking up in churches and the community.

Connors Named to Head Labor Panel on Safety

Toronto, Ont.—John D. Connors, assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, was elected chairman of the Labor Conference of the National Safety Council at its semi-annual meeting here.

Connors, who is executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, will serve for one year beginning in October, succeeding Victor E. Whitehouse, safety director of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Replacing Connors as vice chairman was Grand Lodge Rep. J. George Eichhorn of the Machinists.

The conference also recommended that the NSC re-elect Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers as vice president for labor of the Safety Council. Eichhorn was reelected a director of the council while Vice Pres. Finlay C. Allan of the Carpenters, whose term as a director also had expired, was succeeded by the union's safety chief, Paul H. Connelley. Continuing as directors are Connors; Sec.-Treas. Arthur P. Gildea of the Brewery Workers and R. J. Lamoureux, Canadian safety director for the Steelworkers.

Executive Vice Pres. Joe Morris of the Canadian Labor Congress in a luncheon speech predicted that organized labor will seek a greater voice in industrial safety programs.

"No one has a more direct interest in industrial safety than workers," he said. "If an injury occurs, it is the worker who gets hurt. Yet, to a considerable degree, workers and their unions have been relegated to a secondary position in the planning and the carrying out of safety programs.

"We recognize that management has definite responsibilities with regard to safety; but we say that a safety program can be successful only if it is carried out on an equal partnership basis at all levels.

"The time has come to establish this partnership. Safety is not just a matter of dollars and cents; it is a matter of human suffering and human lives. The people who suffer and the people whose lives are at stake are our members, and we intend to see to it that their voices will be heard."

At a session on growing radiation hazards the conference, which attracted about 50 union representatives to the first session it has held in Canada, heard a report from the CLC on the increasing use of ionizing radiation in Canada. The report warned that without proper safeguards, workers are being exposed to both immediate and long-term genetic dangers.

Radiation education is almost entirely neglected so far as workers in industries using radioactive isotopes are concerned, the report disclosed.

E. B. Haggerty of the Fire Fighters outlined plans for union participation in an industrial fire prevention program, which could protect both the lives and the jobs of workers.

Pensions Cover 75% Of California Workers

San Francisco—Collectively-bargained pension plans cover more than three out of every four California workers protected by union agreements, State Dir. of Industrial Relations Ernest B. Webb said on the basis of a survey conducted by the department's Division of Labor Statistics & Research.

Shoe Workers Approve Increase in Per Capita

Chicago—An increase of 15 cents a month in per capita payments was approved by the 234 delegates to the 13th convention of the United Shoe Workers here, subject to a referendum vote of the union's 50,000 members.

Shoe Workers' Pres. George O. Fecteau said that while the increase is not earmarked for any special purpose, it is likely that some of the additional funds would be used for organizing.

"We've had to work like blazes just to keep even," Fecteau said. "Rising imports of foreign footwear and the migration of shoe factories from organized areas to unorganized areas have cut into our membership."

In other actions the convention:

- Approved further negotiations with the Boot & Shoe Workers on a merger of the two unions.
- Took a strong position against further concessions to manufacturers of foreign shoes.
- Voted continued support of the AFL-CIO legislative program and the Committee on Political Education.
- Supported the national war on poverty, the fight for the 35-hour week and improvements in the federal minimum wage.
- Urged action to halt plant piracy and improve the federal area redevelopment program and the Manpower Development & Training Act.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and COPE Director Al Barkan praised participation in COPE activities by the union which received a COPE award at last year's federation convention.

Both urged the Shoe Workers not to let up on the political front in this election year. They stressed registration of union members and their families, getting to the polls on election day and voluntary COPE dollars to help elect candidates friendly to labor. The convention approved a resolution calling for a COPE "registrar" in every local union.

Schnitzler stressed that members should recognize the need for adequate financing of their union's activities and the honesty of trade union officials. He pointed to labor's performance in relations with bonding companies and in contrast to the performance of bankers and other businessmen.

The four-day parley was followed by a one-day wage policy conference.

Regan Ticket Wins Screen Extra's Vote

Hollywood, Calif.—A "Unity" ticket endorsed by Pres. Tony Regan won control of the board of directors of the Screen Extras Guild in a hotly-contested annual election, taking 10 of the 11 posts. Results of the vote were a setback for the ticket headed by former Pres. Jeffrey Sayre, who was defeated by Regan last year but whose board term continued to the present.

INSTALLATION OF OFFICERS, headed by re-elected Pres. David Sullivan, was the closing ceremony at the Building Service Employes convention in Los Angeles. The union's western conference president, Arthur T. Mace, administers the oath.

Inquiry Set On Hoffa Use Of Funds

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz announced that he has begun an investigation of possible misuse of union funds by Teamsters' Pres. James R. Hoffa to pay his legal expenses in court cases.

Wirtz said he was acting on request of 16 members of Teamsters Local 107 in Philadelphia, who had previously filed a complaint with the union's executive board that union money was improperly used to pay Hoffa's legal expenses.

The Landrum-Griffin Act requires officers of a union "to hold its money and property solely for the benefits of the organization and its members" and authorizes a Labor Dept. inquiry if the secretary believes it needed to determine whether a violation has occurred or is about to occur.

The Dept. of Justice and the National Labor Relations Board are conducting an inquiry into a charge by James Partin, a Louisiana Teamsters official, that Hoffa once gave him $5,000 to bribe an NLRB employe. Partin recently testified against Hoffa in a Chattanooga, Tenn., U.S. district court trial on jury-tampering charges. Hoffa was convicted and sentenced to eight years in prison and $10,000 in fines. He is appealing the verdict.

He is currently on trial in federal court in Chicago on charges of defrauding the union's pension funds.

Building Service Union Votes 'Progress' Plan

Los Angeles—The Building Service Employes wound up their 13th convention by electing Pres. David Sullivan and Sec.-Treas. George E. Fairchild to new four-year terms and shuffling the general board to fill vacancies left when Thomas J. Burke and Henry Kruse, both of Chicago, declined to run for re-election.

Moved up to first vice-president was George Mardy of Los Angeles, while Charles C. Levey of Pittsburgh, Thomas Shortman of New York, and Albert G. Mearn of Toronto were elected to the second, third and fourth vice-presidencies. The final two positions went to Peter Ottley of New York, the first Negro to be elected to the board, fifth vice-president, and Thomas Kelly of San Francisco, sixth vice-president.

Program Adopted

The convention adopted a "Program for Progress" which included such goals as a $2 minimum wage, a standard straight-time workweek of 35 hours, improved working conditions, employer-paid hospitalization and surgical insurance or equivalent health protection, adequate pensions and employer-paid life insurance.

The convention also set up a program for retired members, including pension plans through collective bargaining, the establishment of an international pension fund and a retirement program for officers and employes of BSEIU affiliates.

Among several constitutional changes were mandates to local executive boards to establish civil rights and political education committees to assist in carrying out union programs and policies.

Another change, effective next Jan. 1, bars election or appointment to international union office of any member aged 65 or older.

William L. McFetridge, former President of the BSEIU, gave up his position as adviser and consultant to the parent union to devote more time to his position as president of a union housing project.

Nelson Cruikshank, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, urged intensified membership support of the King-Anderson bill to provide old-age social security hospital insurance in keeping with the vigorous support being given the measure by Pres. Johnson himself.

Under Sec. of Labor John Henning called attention to the paradox of poverty in the midst of plenty.

Al Barkan, national director of COPE, called the dearth of local union activity "the weakest link" in labor's political drive. He urged local leaders to speak out against curbs on unions in the "life and death struggle faced by labor."

Dir. Don Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights discussed the federation's civil rights program, calling particular attention to the work being accomplished by the "task forces" operating in key areas.

Oklahoma 'Formula' Cited:

Colorado AFL-CIO Spurs New Coalition

Denver—A formula to turn the tide of conservatism in the West was outlined by state and national labor and political leaders at the Colorado State AFL-CIO convention here.

It was a formula that had been proved successful only a few days before when organized labor in Oklahoma—although it numbers only 7 percent of the state's total civilian working force—turned apparent defeat into victory and defeated a "right-to-work" proposal.

The formula calls for a "proud and informed" labor movement headed by militant leaders to form an "all-for-one, one-for-all" political partnership with minority groups and liberals in a program for social justice, equal rights and world peace.

Such a program was described here by Sen. Edward (Ted) Kennedy (D-Mass.), who told the delegates that "in 1960 my brother pledged a great national effort to build a greater America and Pres. Johnson is carrying on his pledge."

He described the program as one of concern for the poor and underprivileged, a showdown on the race issue, and turning the world away from war toward peace.

Kennedy predicted Senate passage of the civil rights bill without damaging amendments, followed by concentration on problems of poverty—particularly unemployment and job opportunities, which he called "the most crucial problems we as a nation are going to have to face during the rest of the '60s and perhaps the rest of the century."

In another major speech, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan lashed out at the apathy of unions that are unconcerned about poverty and growing unemployment and local leaders who "leave their COPE books on the shelf."

Unless there is a rebirth of a "militant labor movement," Keenan said, labor faces the prospect of "returning to the pre-1935 days before the Wagner Act was passed."

Roy Reuther Message

Roy Reuther, director of the AFL-CIO COPE voter registration program, decried "pure trade unionists" who think a union's only concern is to negotiate wages and working conditions and forget about political action. "The political atmosphere," Reuther said, "is the key to collective bargaining."

Reuther said labor sometimes is too much on the defensive and too prone to "adjust" to restrictive legislation instead of mobilizing to overcome them. What is needed, he said, is the total mobilization in every state that takes place in one state in the face of a "right-to-work" threat.

The mobilization of labor in Oklahoma was described by Texas AFL-CIO Pres. H. S. (Hank) Brown, National Farmers Union Pres. James Patton, and Colorado AFL-CIO Pres. Herrick Roth, all of whom took part in the Oklahoma campaign.

The model for the Oklahoma effort was the "Texas coalition," which is beginning to change the political climate of that state with a working coalition of labor, the Negro and Mexican-American communities, and liberals. In Oklahoma, another group was added—the farmer.

The Negro and farmer vote proved decisive, Patton said. In rural Oklahoma, where "right-to-work" proponents expected margins of 3-to-1 to 5-to-1, they gained only a bare majority. Returns of 401-3 and 81-2 against the "work" proposal were typical of Negro precincts in Tulsa and Oklahoma City.

"Workaday" Unity

The farmer's vote too often goes so-called "conservative" by default because he isn't presented with the issues, Patton said, and called for "solid workaday cooperation" of farmers and workers.

The "Texas Coalition," Brown emphasized is based on full partnership of all groups. To get endorsement, a candidate must be acceptable to all four partners. A candidate who is "right" on labor issues but "wrong" on civil rights gets no endorsement. Brown said labor leaders must be ready to take unpopular positions, as the Texas AFL-CIO leadership did in making a total comittment to civil rights and the Kennedy-Johnson rights program.

William Hart, president of the Allegheny County (Pittsburgh) labor council, stressed the need of building pride in the labor movement among union members and the need to gain the help of one more essential "friend," the members of one of the nation's established majority groups—women.

Organizing Theme Marks Furniture Union's Parley

New York—The keystone was organizing—and more organizing—at the Furniture Workers' 13th biennial convention here.

Pres. Morris Pizer and Sec.-Treas. Fred Fulford stressed the need for an intensified effort to meet the challenge posed by a continuing shift of large segments of the industry to the South.

"Time and again," they said in a joint report to the convention, "our members have suffered unemployment as a result of chains shutting down all or part of their unionized operations and shifting the work to unorganized locations. This runaway threat also hangs over our members when it is time to negotiate contracts."

Pizer, in his opening address to the 150 delegates representing some 40,000 union members, warned that government action to stimulate the economy to full employment is only one part of the war on poverty. There is poverty also among workers employed at substandard wages, he stressed, and union organization is "the only sure way" to win that battle.

A "climate of fear" among unorganized workers, resulting from "the anti-union weapons placed in the hands of employers by the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts," has hampered union efforts, Pizer said. Despite this, he added, the Furniture Workers won bargaining rights in more than 60 percent of the campaigns in which it participated during the past two years, including 10 of 13 in the South.

He praised the joint organizing campaigns launched by the AFL-CIO in the Los Angeles and Baltimore-Washington areas and a series of campaigns coordinated by the federation's Industrial Union Dept.

"These programs of pooling the resources of participating unions have been helpful in creating the necessary spirit and atmosphere for further organization," the UFWA president reported.

The problem of "runaway" operations was touched on also by Pres. Johnson in a telegram of greetings to the convention.

'Many Serious Problems'

Johnson noted that while employment in the furniture industry reached an all-time high last year, there are "many serious problems" as "plants and companies located for many years in a community move to new locations, often far away."

This shift of the industry, he said, "poses a challenge both to collective bargaining and to government—to the labor movement as to the Administration."

Pizer told the delegates that the past two years has seen a further development of cooperative relations with the Upholsterers, lending encouragement to "the goal of merging and uniting all the furniture workers into one international union."

A telegram from Upholsterers Pres. Sal B. Hoffmann voiced "sincere satisfaction" that "virtually all of the problems and strife arising from years of division . . . have been peacefully and constructively solved."

Hoffman said he looked forward to "a united furniture workers organization and a spirt of unity."

Welcomed to New York

The convention was welcomed to New York by both Pres. Harry Van Arsdale of the city's Central Labor Council and Pres. Raymond R. Corbett of the State AFL-CIO.

With a rising workforce and a shift in employment patterns, the labor movement must intensify its organizing efforts to keep from losing ground, AFL-CIO Organization Dir. John W. Livingston told the convention.

He said today's organizing, in the face of restrictive legislation, requires more money and manpower than during the decade of the 1930s, "when workers flocked into unions."

The convention also heard a report from James Pierce, coordinator of the IUD organizing campaign in North and South Carolina, in which the Furniture Workers are participating.

Scheduled speakers included Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan, Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and Cleveland Robinson of the Negro American Labor Council.

On the business agenda, in addition to policy resolutions and election of officers, was a proposal by the union's officers for an increase in per capita tax.

Among the resolutions the delegates will be asked to adopt, Pizer told the convention, will be a formal endorsement of Pres. Johnson for election to a full term.

'Dreams and Determinations':

ACWA Pays Tribute To Union's Founders

New York—"Fifty years ago, a handful of workers in the clothing industry met in Webster Hall, in New York City, to form a new union. They had nothing—no money, no experience, not even a name. Their world was the sweatshop. . . ."

The speaker was Jacob S. Potofsky, who received his baptism in the trade union movement as a teenager on the picket line during the Hart Schaffner & Marx strike in Chicago in 1910.

The setting was New York's Hilton Hotel, the 50th convention site after opening ceremonies at the World's Fair.

'They Had Dreams'

"Many of them did not know the language and they were strangers in their own country," Potofsky went on. "They lived in slums, jammed together without light or air or privacy. But . . . they had their dreams and they had their determination."

Addressing the 1,500 convention delgates, "the successors to that handful who met in Webster Hall," Potofsky spoke of "the results of the dreams and determination" of the union's founders. He said:

"Our members enjoy decent wages and working conditions, paid holidays and vacations, health insurance and pension benefits. Their grievances receive serious attention as a matter of right.

"The union they fashioned now owns insurance companies and banks, health centers and a mobile clinic, several retired members' centers, four massive cooperative housing developments and a vacation resort. Through their union, our members have become an important force in their community. . . ."

Out to Villages

He spoke of the organization of the major clothing centers in the 1920's, of the "great campaigns of the 30's, which gave a new dimension of the union [and] took us beyond the big cities into the small towns and villages."

The ACWA, he reminded the delegates, "shared in the Roosevelt Revolution, but we also helped make it."

Potofsky spoke of the union's debt to its first president, Sidney Hillman, "who charted our course, who combined vision with realism to make our goals come true."

During the past half-century, Potofsky said, "we have traveled a long road, from poverty and helplessness to security and strength." But, he stressed, "the trip has just begun. There is much to do, for our nation, for all mankind."

The union's greatest achievements, Potofsky declared, "have not yet been done; our greatest victories have not yet been won."

A similar theme was sounded by ACWA Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum when he addressed the convention the following day.

Social Idealism Cited

Rosenblum, who has served on the union's executive board since its founding convention, told the delegates that the source of the ACWA's strength has been the "idealism" and the "social philosophy" of the union and its leadership.

Speaking of the union's 50-year "journey," Rosenblum said the progress that has been made both through collective bargaining and social legislation "far exceeded the wildest hopes" of the union's founders.

At the same time, he stressed, "we cannot afford to relax, for the problems which face us are compelling and awesome. It will take all our intelligence, energy and good will to understand them—to cope with them—and finally to master them."

Johnson Gets Election Backing Of Clothing Union Delegates

some 10,000 union delegates and members amidst the futuristic backdrop of the fair's exhibits, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the delegates that they can take pride in their union's accomplishments in "meeting the unfilled needs of the workers of America," in serving as "an instrument of protest against injustice in every form," in its pioneering programs in housing, health, banking and its political activity.

"Let us take just a fleeting moment of satisfaction," he urged them, "and then turn our faces to the task ahead."

It is not material wealth but "the yardstick of human values" by which labor measures progress, Meany declared.

"This is not a wealthy nation if one-fifth of our people are living in squalor and need. . . . We cannot say that we are an enlightened and cultured nation as long as ignorance and want prevail . . . when we are still in the midst of an ugly specter of race bias and hatred," he said.

He praised Johnson as having done "a great service by bringing poverty out of the dark corner of neglect and putting it in the forefront of the public conscience," but cautioned that poverty "will not be eliminated by the enactment of a single bill."

Labor, he stressed, supports the President's program "as a beginning, not as an end to the war that he has declared."

Praise from Wagner

There was a welcome to the delegates from New York's Mayor Robert F. Wagner, who declared that the history of the union and of the nation's largest city "are inseparable." To the "cruelly exploited" immigrants who had poured into New York early in the century, Wagner said, the union served as both "shield and sword."

With such leaders as the late Sidnel Hillman, "social justice and compassion were written into the laws of the state, the city and finally into the laws of the nation," Wagner declared.

In the audience, as well as among the union leaders on the platform, were graying men and women who had built the union, a second generation of dedicated unionists and, scampering up and down the aisles, boys and girls caught up in the excitement of the occasion.

There were business sessions later on when the convention shifted to New York City's Hilton Hotel, and comitteee meetings and resolutions to be acted on. but on the opening day the atmosphere was festive.

There were cheers for Mrs. Johnson, who accompanied the President and was introduced as an honorary member of the ACWA, who had sat down at a sewing machine to help publicize the Clothing Workers' union label campaign.

There was laughter as Pres. Johnson gave a tongue-in-cheek account of how Potofsky had warned him that the people in New York "are pretty mad" because word had reached them that Johnson had "pulled the ears of a bagel."

A bagel, no kin to the President's famed beagle dogs, is, of course, the hard doughnut-shaped roll which New Yorkers devour by the millions.

But the audience, laughing with the President one minute, listened with intentness as he spoke of the nation's problems.

"Not from charity, not from condescension, not from coercion, but from a deep commitment to justice must we open wide the door of equality and invite all Americans to walk through that door," the President said.

He spoke of the poverty he had seen on his Appalachian tour and the poverty also of "the widow around the corner barely surviving on a pension of $70 a month."

"What Sidney Hillman advocated . . . what Mr. Potofsky and this fine union urges," the President said, "I feel deep in my heart and I'm preaching it from one end of the country to the other."

National Party Focuses On Need for Indian Aid

American Indian reservations could serve as the testing ground for the nation's "war on poverty," Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn. told the American Indian Capital Conference on Poverty.

The proposal was immediately welcomed by Interior Sec. Stewar L. Udall, who told the conference that Pres. Johnson wanted India "in the very forefront" of the anti-poverty struggle because of the seriousness of their problems.

Some 400 delegates, including 200 representatives of tribes from all over the country, attended the four-day meeting. It was called by the Council on Indian Affairs, made up of 13 organizations.

Humphrey said a major assault against poverty should be directed to the benefit of Indians because "no other group has been so totally victimized by the ravages of poverty." He said the reservation would be ideal for pilot projects.

Humphrey said Americans "have not treated the original owners of this country, indeed our forefathers, with a sense of decency and respect." The "cultural gap between tribal life and our modern society" is illustrated in the continuing isolation of the Indian, he added.

Udall said the anti-poverty program could help lift 400,000 reservation Indians out of destitution and enable them to make cultural contributions long suppressed by government paternalism.

Robert Burnette, executive director of the National Congress of American Indians and a Rosebud Sioux, also welcomed Humphrey's proposal. He urged that Johnson tour the reservations "to see for himself the indescribable conditions that exist."

Burnette cited these conditions: 90 percent of housing is substandard; family income averages $1,500 a year; the average life span of Indians is 42 years compared to 62 years nationally; the high school dropout rate is 60 percent and unemployment runs about 50 percent; some 9,000 children are out of school for lack of seating space.

Jack T. Conway, executive director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Dept. and a member of the President's task force on poverty, outlined the proposed Economic Opportunities Act of 1964. He said nearly every section could benefit Indians.

Indian leaders in workshop sessions listed these major needs: a great increase in low-interest loans for industry, housing and hospital projects; more and better schools and vocational training; youth job corps centers; sanitation facilities and mobile health clinics.

Schnitzler Hails Local On 75th Anniversary

Chicago—"We go into Pres. Johnson's war on poverty with the same understanding of human beings as we have had in the past, but with our eyes open," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told the 75th anniversary dinner of Carpenters Local 80 here.

Addressing 1,500 local members, wives and guests, Schnitzler observed that labor has been conducting its own war on poverty for many years.

"In our early days," he said, "we asked the employers for an existence wage for our members. We got that and then we asked for a living wage. After that was won at the bargaining table, we began the fight for a saving wage.

"Today unions are not concentrating as hard on the wage issue as in the old days, but they continue to seek improvements in the lives of their members."

He noted that there are fully employed workers today receiving relief payments because of substandard wages and declared that unions have an obligation to help improve their pay scales.

Schnitzler paid special tribute to John R. Stevenson, first vice president of the Carpenters international union and a former president of Local 80, who served as toastmaster at the dinner.

Stevenson was initiated into the union on Apr. 1, 1907, and is one of 75 50-year members.

He urged the local to use the lessons of the past to guide it toward "a complete and satisfactory solution to all our problems," and declared:

"When asked what we as an organization want, we say: We want more wages, more improvements in working conditions, more of the better things of life. When we get that, we will still want more. More of the sunshine of life."

Other speakers were Pres. Ted Kenney of the Chicago Carpteners District Council; Pres. Earl J. McMahon of the Chicago Building Trades Council; and Pres. Oscar H. Larson of Local 80.

Private School UnionContract Ups Salaries

New York—Teachers at the privately-operated Queens School in Kew Gardens will get salary increases ranging from $300 to $1,200 over a three-year period under a new agreement with the United Federation of Teachers.

The union, Local 2 of the American Federation of Teachers, said the agreement was the first in a current drive for contract protection of private school teachers. About 12 schools are involved.

The new pact raises the salary schedule and also provides fringe benefits for the Queens School staff.

In announcing the organizing drive, the UFT cited "generally low salaries" among faculties of private schools. The union's assistant to the president, Al Shanker, said private education is growing rapidly and the UFT feels it important to "help improve professional standards" in private schools.

Let the Nation Speak!

THE INTERMINABLE and essentially repetitious debate on the Civil Rights bill in the Senate—now nearly two months old—is producing a reaction, at last, of indignation and anger among senators.

A number of important conservative Republicans, as well as liberal Democrats, have indicated that they have had enough of the southern filibuster. They and other senators, even those holding some reservations about the House-passed measure, believe the "abuse of the legislative process" should be ended.

The filibusterers have pushed the basic American concept of fair play and justice too far and the conscience of their Senate colleagues and of the nation is being aroused despite the southern appeal to legislative tradition and custom and the privileges and rules of the Senate.

This apparent new determination by liberals and conservatives alike—the bipartisan coalition that was responsible for House passage and will in the end secure Senate passage—needs the vocal and manifest support of the majority of Americans who believe that the time has come to secure meaningful legislation providing equal rights for all.

Now is the moment for the conscience of America to speak—to speak out loudly and clearly in favor of Senate action, in support of the existing majority in the Senate that favors the end of aimless and frustrating debate.

Risk Capital?

"THE (STOCK) MARKET is useful to corporations, because it enables them to offer stock options to executives and also helps considerably in setting the terms of mergers. But as an instrument for raising capital, it is plainly of much less importance than it used to be."

Who said it? The May issue of Fortune Magazine in an article entitled "Personal Investing," which says that all the classic assumptions about the stock market's reason for being "correspond less and less to reality."

Fortune cites statistics to show that "in 1963, for the first time since the war, more old stock was retired than new stock was issued," and that since 1961 there has been a sharp decline in gross sales of new stock to the public and a rise in the retirement of outstanding stock.

The business magazine offers some explanations—the 1962 investment tax credit, the new depreciation guidelines and anticipation of the 1964 tax reduction "left many corporate planners feeling free to finance new projects internally without going to the capital markets at all."

The Fortune article underscores a growing trend in American business in the postwar years—that more and more corporations are financing expansions from profits rather than following the presumed classic pattern of raising capital from the general public through stock issues.

This reflects sharply the strong profit position of American corporations. It reflects also the fact that workers getting less than their fair share in wages are in effect paying for the internal financing; that consumers, also, living in an era of administered prices, are paying for the new plant and equipment, while the classic pattern of corporations going to the marketplace for risk capital falls into disuse.

'Pernicious Cynicism':

University Labor Expert Charts Union Critic's Cockeyed World

The following is excerpted from "The Cockeyed World of Paul Jacobs" by Irving Bernstein, associate director of the Institute of Industrial Relations, University of California at Los Angeles, which appears in the May issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

I DO NOT CONSIDER it especially significant that Paul Jacobs holds the views he has or that he has written a book around them. What I do consider significant is the fact that he is representative in whole or part of a substantial group of intellectuals, persons who were either drawn into the labor movement, and especially the CIO, in the Thirties and Forties or were attracted to it by sympathy. Some of them form nowadays a coterie of disillusionment, those disenchanted because their particular dream of the union has not come true. Since they are unusually articulate, they have pressed their views upon many other less knowledgeable people. For reasons that will shortly be set forth, I feel that they did not understand the American trade union and collective bargaining in the Thirties and have done nothing since to perfect their knowledge. They are, therefore, purveyors of useless misinformation, empty moral judgments and pernicious cynicism. Jacobs is typical of them and I think they should be answered.

I should like to set out the essence of the Jacobs analysis of the trade union and collective bargaining in contemporary American society. This is difficult to do for two reasons: The first is that his book is not systematic; it is rather, a set of disparate pieces written largely for magazines over a period of a decade. Second, and more important, Jacobs is internally inconsistent over a wide range of problems, which I should like to illustrate.

He attacks Hoffa, Hayes and Dubinsky for undermining democracy within their unions; yet he fears that the democratic political system within the Typographical Union breeds social irresponsibility and may sap "the values of a democratic society." In the face of his conclusion that collective bargaining has collapsed, he says that government must step in to fill the void; at the same time he argues vigorously against compulsory arbitration. He contends that unions have lost their "militant stance" and now give "unquestioning acceptance" to the status quo; but he says that the strike problem is very serious.

Featherbedding, he says, is wicked, degrading, and useless, but workers, apparently those who do useless as well as useful work, have rights to their jobs. AFL-CIO must end discrimination against the Negro; but the discrimination is by international and local unions and AFL-CIO has little or no control over them. Most unions are badly led, but they are well-administered. Internal union judicial procedures deny due process, but there is little evidence that the unions violate due process. He denounces Hoffa in moral homilies ("Jimmy Hoffa and the Teamsters Union are the antithesis of what I believe a union leader and a union ought to be"); yet he is enormously impressed with Hoffa's ability to manipulate power and his achievements in collective bargaining.

The rendering of simple moral judgments on complex problems, to which Jacobs is prone, I believe adds nothing to either the analysis or solution of these problems.

WHAT JACOBS MISSES in the contemporary labor movement is the "sense of crusade." Militancy has been displaced by the Establishment, social justice by jurisdiction and contract. Hoffa is the prototype. He shares the dominant mores of business in our business-oriented society. With this narrowing of viewpoint organized labor has lost the support of the liberals and the reformers. Members regard their unions as "limited-purpose institutions and not as movement."

This dribbling away of social dynamism has meant that unions have failed to come to grips with the most pressing contemporary problems: automation, unemployment and, above all, the Negro.

This is the heart of the Jacobs attack. It is, I believe, fundamentally wrong because it is a fundamental misreading of collective bargaining and that essential element of it in the American environment, the business union.

I can see no basis for Jacobs' conclusion that collective bargaining is "collapsing." What he is really saying, if I understand him correctly, and I believe I do, is that his particular vision of the trade union that was shaped in the Thirties has not been realized. He is sorry; I am not.

In conclusion, I want to emphasize the affirmative elements in his position. The problems he stresses—automation, unemployment and the Negro—are very serious problems, indeed. While no individual union and no particular bargaining relationship can resolve them, each can and should make its own small contribution. But if they are ultimately resolved, this will come about by the cooperation of all the important institutions of American society.

Morgan Says:

Johnson's Grasp of Leadership Adds to Republican Frustration

MADISON, WIS.—We Americans confront a strange scene as we peer out at the political horizons of 1964, whether the view is from a window on Capitol Hill or from the woods of Wisconsin. The panorama is a paradoxical one of peace abroad and war at home.

Not a sure peace, by any means. An uneasy, unreliable one, but one which contains some crumbs of hope that the Cold War is turning into not a peaceful but a kind of restless coexistence.

Morgan

Nor, of course, do we have a shooting war at home. But we have been drawn into a genuine social revolution as the American Negro, with a combination of new confidence and exasperation, demands rights denied him for 100 years. His offensive has stirred a white "backlash" against his demands. The public first became tangibly aware of it here in Wisconsin when Alabama's Gov. Wallace captured a fat third of the state's presidential primary vote recently, almost but not quite repeated the performance in Indiana and may well outdo himself in Maryland on May 19. This serious two-way commotion with ugly overtones of racial violence could become the dominant issue in the presidential campaign.

A connected though lower-key conflict is Pres. Johnson's war on poverty. Poverty is more directly linked with the Negros' struggle than most people realize. Proportionately, the black man is the poorest of American citizens. His rights won't do him much good if he does not have the economic opportunities by which he can afford to enjoy them.

Though in its approach it is by no means acting with unanimity or sufficient boldness, the Democratic Party does seem to be facing up to these foreign and domestic situations with a little more candor, realism and sense of urgency than the GOP. The Republicans are gripped in a grave leadership crisis. The mounting struggle between the moderate and the right wings threatens to tear the party to pieces. The minority party not only lacks an acceptable leader, it lacks an appealing cause.

Republican frustration is heightened by the fact that Lyndon Johnson has not only seized the middle ground of moderation but has robbed the GOP of its classic economy issue by getting a tax cut and slicing government spending, ranging from reduced production of uranium to plowing under unneeded pamphlets of the Dept. of Agriculture and dousing lights in the White House.

Barring the unlikelihood of inflation between now and November, this leaves the Republicans only three apparent areas of attack, all of them dubious. They can and will decry the slippage of the American "image" abroad, accuse the Administration of being "soft on communism." But, sensing some popular relief at the easing of tensions, Pres. Johnson will be delighted to run on a "peace" platform.

SECONDLY, THE OPPOSITION is sure to ask, does the country want a wheeler-dealer in the White House? What about Bobby Baker and the Johnson family's profitable holdings—in trust though they may be—of a TV monopoly in Austin, Tex.? Et cetera. But unless such personal attacks cause the President to blow his top, they are not likely to shake out any vast number of anti-Democratic votes. At least the country does not appear to be particularly aroused on these subjects now.

The third and most dangerous issue is civil rights. We may well be in for a summer of smoke and violence, North and South. The Republicans presumably would try to lay the responsibility for such disturbances in the lap of the Administration, charging it had encouraged Negro "extremists," or at least had not curbed them sufficiently. Richard Nixon laid the groundwork for this kind of attack in a speech in Cincinnati some weeks ago by warning Negroes against excessive demonstrations. Some observers think that because he is the most experienced and best equipped by nature to handle the exploitation of such an aggressive campaign, Nixon therefore becomes the most logical Republican presidential nominee. Maybe so, though Sen. Goldwater is showing impressive theoretical staying power with a continued accumulation of convention votes.

But these prospects only point up basic Republican weaknesses. With the future packed with both promise and peril, it is hard to think of a time when our two-party system should be stronger, when the loyal opposition needs to challenge the Administration on the basis of real problems.

But while these problems include the population explosion, traffic strangulation of the cities, automation, health, education and the preservation of resources as well as war and peace, and while they demand the most imaginative, possibly even the most revolutionary approaches to solutions, the fine modern moderates in the Republican Party are threatened by extremists who seem to be becoming more firmly entrenched and whose ideas of solving a crisis seem to leap straight out of the Middle Ages.

No matter what you think of the Democrats, they don't deserve such irresponsible opposition.

Washington Reports:

Douglas, Javits Urge New Drive To Meet Nation's Social Needs

EDUCATION, urban renewal, mass transit, housing and conservation are not programs "to be kept pending" for use only when jobs are needed, but should be pushed and pursued "all the time in the public sector," Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) declared in discussing the recent report by the Senate Subcommittee on Employment & Manpower.

Javits was heard along with Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.) on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service broadcast now heard on 700 radio stations, more than any other program in the country.

Douglas pointed out that continued high unemployment especially affects unskilled young people trying to enter the labor force and workers 45 and older who have been displaced by automation and who lack the skills needed to get new jobs.

Javits asserted that "no worker should ever be called upon to bear the hardship which results from the need to automate business" or industry. He urged government financial backing of retraining such workers by private business and expansion of the government's manpower retraining program.

He recommended a more technical, job-training high school education program to try to keep in school young people who might otherwise become drop-outs, plus public school programs to help retrain jobless older persons.

JAVITS SAID that private business retraining could be financed "through what would be analogous to the Reconstruction Finance Corp., the technique we used in the great depression."

He also urged expansion of U.S. exports, action on the Youth Employment Opportunities Act, enactment of the fair employment provision of the Civil Rights bill, revision of the anti-trust laws to facilitate U.S. competition with other nations, and tax legislation reserved along with public works "which could then be moved into the Congress very quickly in the event of a threat of a recession."

Douglas criticized businesses that do not put the earnings of capital into productive use to make more jobs. He also stressed the need of a conservation program, not only as a means of providing jobs, but also because of the increased need of the means for healthful recreation.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE REPUBLICAN presidential primary season approaches its climax with only the "big one," the California primary June 2, plus Oregon May 15, still to be run, and backers of Arizona's Sen. Barry Goldwater are claiming "victory, victory." The senator himself says he expects to be nominated on the second ballot at the San Francisco convention opening July 13.

The Goldwater claim, if it stands up, will come in the face of mounting evidence that the rank and file of the Republican Party has little enthusiasm for the Arizona senator.

- In Nebraska's primary, where only Goldwater's name appeared on the ballot, more than half the state's GOP voters wrote in the name of others—former Vice Pres. Nixon, Ambassador Lodge, Gov. Rockefeller of New York, a scattering of others.

- In the earlier Indiana primary, where no write-in votes were permitted, Goldwater and the shopworn Harold E. Stassen were the only recognizable names: Stassen did better than he has done running for many offices in years, rolling up 105,000 votes against Goldwater's 262,000.

- Still earlier, in Illinois, Goldwater managed only 51 percent of the total Republican vote, although his name was alone on the ballot and Lodge, Nixon and Rockefeller benefited solely from write-ins.

These are midwestern states, the Republican heartland, the places where state GOP machinery has been taken over by Goldwater adherents while the so-called "Eastern Establishment," the group of finance, corporation and communications bigwigs that has chosen Republican nominees for decades, sat as if palsied. Even so, the Goldwater popular vote has been unimpressive.

CALIFORNIA OBSERVERS say that "almost beyond question" the current polls showing Goldwater with 43 percent of the likely vote, Rockefeller with 27 percent, will be reflected in the June 2 voting. (Subject only, they add, to whether Rockefeller scores an impressive victory in the May 15 Oregon vote to put spirit back into his disheartened forces.)

The California Republican Party organization, both Young Republicans and the state committee, has been captured or heavily infiltrated with Goldwater backers and John Birch Society fellow travelers, and they are seeking to expand their grip in the primary itself.

All of this in the face of the reliable Lou Harris polls that show Lodge favored by 41 percent of Republican voters across the country, Nixon by 30 percent, Rockfeller by 9, Goldwater by only 15 percent.

And in the face of the opinion, widely held in southern states, that while Goldwater clearly has the GOP party machinery in nearly all of them, he has little chance of carrying the South in November against Pres. Johnson. (Mississippi and Alabama, with provisions to set up "uncommitted" Democratic delegate slates, are considered the possible exceptions.)

IN THE REPUBLICAN convention of 1960—the one that nominated Nixon—it was perfectly apparent that if the delegates had been given the chance of a secret ballot, they would have chosen Goldwater.

In a secret-ballot vote, they would have nominated Goldwater for Vice President rather than Lodge, who was chosen by Nixon.

They would have repudiated Nixon's "Fifth Avenue Compact" on platform modifications with Gov. Rockefeller and adopted a Goldwater platform.

In a convention that is nearly two months off, leadership might still be established by Republican Party leaders who clearly command far more popular strength than Goldwater. But any such leadership has been long allowed to lie dormant.

The suggestion that Goldwater is a sure-thing nominee means that Republicans who would not dream of following him where his cloudy policies might lead have decided to concede Mr. Johnson's re-election this time. It may mean that the Goldwaterites themselves are not so much concerned about winning in November as in getting themselves in control of the party nationally.

NO WORKERS should have to bear the hardship which results from automation, Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.), left, declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People. Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.) spoke on the same AFL-CIO public service program of the need for retraining of displaced workers 45 years of age and older.

How to Buy:

2-Door, No-Frost Refrigerators More Expensive to Buy, Operate

By Sidney Margolius

RETAILERS REPORT that a noticeable share of consumers' tax-cut savings is going into refrigerators and washing machines. Manufacturers and dealers have not offered any special price reductions on these appliances so far this spring, since consumers are buying without being enticed. But more special sales can be expected in July, traditional month for clearances of refrigerators.

The convenience and capacity of refrigerators has been improved in recent years. But in some cases, operating cost has increased as a result. Local power companies are urging dealers to sell, and families to buy, the modern two-door frost-free or frostless models. These require no manual defrosting in either the refrigerator or freezer sections.

But you also may want to measure the undeniable convenience and usefulness against the greater cost of buying and operating the frost-free models. They do use more electricity, which, of course, is why the power companies are urging everybody to buy them.

According to Manning Greenberg, appliance expert for Home Furnishings Daily, if a single door refrigerator uses 485 kilowatt hours a year, the equivalent combination model (frost-free in the refrigerator section only) will use 900, and the completely frostless models, 1685. At an average KWH charge of 2.5 cents, operating costs are $1 a month, $1.88 and $3.51 respectively. You can check your electricity bill to see if the KWH rate in your area is lower or higher, which would affect the relative cost.

For a family that needs to watch its utility bills, and such household costs truly have become a major expense, the middle-cost two-door combination model is a reasonable compromise. It provides much of the convenience of the completely-frostless models at a medium purchase price and operating expense. You really need to remove frost from the freezer section only several times a year.

IF YOU DON'T NEED the additional freezer space, estimate for yourself whether the job of manual defrosting of the freezer section occasionally is worth about $20 a year in operating costs, plus an additional initial expenditure of $30-$50.

In comparing different models and brands, especially compare the freezer capacity, rather than such deluxe but not essential convenience features as swing-out shelves, glide-out crispers, extra egg trays, ice trays or ejectors, etc.

Actually some of these features take away from your usable storage space, as well as being used by sellers to "step-up" buyers to more expensive price levels for the same basic refrigerator. One big chain offers a 14.4 cubic-foot bottom-mounted refrigerator, with 172 pounds of freezer capacity, for $250. It sells the same refrigerator with the same capacity, but with adjustable shelves, twin crispers, egg holder, and other space-using devices, for $289. Actually an egg box is a fine place to keep eggs.

On the other hand, if a refrigerator with large freezer capacity costs not much more, it does have potential financial usefulness in providing storage space for special buys in food, especially meats. For example, one model, recently observed, provides 150 pounds of freezer capacity for only $20 more than another with 116 pounds.

THE NATION'S 33rd President, Harry S. Truman, surveys a cake given him for an 80th birthday celebration at the National Press Club in Washington. Still spicy, still a political figure with strong convictions, Truman returned to Washington from his Independence, Mo., home for a series of such occasions.

From Soup to Nonsence:

A Physical Checkup Is a Cinch If You Don't Die of Fright First

By Jane Goodsell

A PHYSICAL CHECKUP is a simple, precautionary measure, just to make sure that all systems are go. It's routine procedure—like balancing the checkbook and getting the furnace checked. That's what I keep telling myself, but I don't believe a word of it.

I can telephone the furnace company with barely a flicker of emotion. I remain cool and collected, and I display none of the anxiety symptoms (shaking hands, sinking heart and trembling voice) that betray me when I dial the number of the doctor's office to ask for an appointment for a checkup.

But last week I did it. I even scraped up enough courage to stay on the line until somebody answered. I explained into the telephone who I was, and suggested that an appointment several weeks hence would be plenty soon enough. To my dismay, the voice on the other end chirped brightly that I could come in that very afternoon. As luck would have it, they had just had a cancellation.

Numb with shock, I mumbled incoherently: "Oh dear" and "Un, well, I just don't know. . . ."

The voice purred silkily that she would put me down for 2 o'clock, and I replaced the receiver with trembling hands. I dressed carefully for the appointment. Wearing my best suit made me feel braver, although it seemed a little silly to get all dressed up to undress.

I sat in the reception room for 25 minutes, staring blurrily at a magazine. Then I was ushered into the doctor's office, which was filled with enormous books on pathology, radiology, mental disease, gynecology, endocrinology and other light topics. I amused myself by looking through these tomes and, by the time the doctor poked his head in the door (15 minutes later) I had developed the symptoms of five serious afflictions that I'd never heard of before.

The doctor greeted me heartily, which made me suspicious. He could probably tell, just from looking at me, that something awful was wrong, and he was trying to cover up his concern.

He asked the usual questions, which I answered in the negative, but I felt uncertain. Shortness of breath? How long were breaths supposed to be? Did I tire easily? What's easily?

He turned me over to a nurse for a chest x-ray and laboratory specimens. She hummed all the time she was drawing blood from my arm. Another attempt to fool me into thinking everything was okay?

Then she handed me a sheet, and told me to take off my clothes and put it on. Still trying gallantly to keep up appearances, I tried to drape it becomingly like a sari or a sarong, but finally settled for the slapdash effect of a Halloween ghost.

THE DOCTOR RE-APPEARED, and began probing, listening and peering. During the entire session, he kept up a constant stream of small talk. It was a one-sided conversation because I find it impossible to engage in aimless chitchat while having a reading taken on my insides. Besides, I was convinced that he was only talking to keep my mind off what he was doing. But I'm not that easily diverted. My blood pressure was probably 320, and he prattled about his golf score.

He patted my shoulder. "All finished. You get dressed while I check the lab reports. I'll see you in my office."

I was sitting with clenched fists in his office when he dashed in.

"You're fine," he said. "Everything's great. See you next year."

I was so dizzy with relief that I wandered into a drugstore and ordered a hot fudge sundae.

Writes Esther Peterson:

Shopper Is Fed Up, Hits Price Gimmicks

A HOUSEWIFE recently returned from a visit to the grocery store. She was emotionally exhausted trying to determine how she could put her limited funds to the best use, trying to understand false bargains and the gimmicks that were being offered.

Finally, she sat down and penned a letter to Mrs. Esther Peterson, assistant secretary of labor and special assistant to Pres. Johnson for consumer affairs.

"With a family of five young children," she wrote, "and 25 percent of my husband's weekly pay going for food and milk, I am concerned with some of the tricks that go on to take my money in nickels and dimes and pennies which all add up.

"Most important to me as a food shopper, of course, is the nonsense that goes on in the supermarket. I want my savings on each package of food . . . not with fabulous trips around the world. I want the manufacturer to be honest enough to have enough faith in the quality of his product to be able to sell it in 'old fashioned' standard weight packages . . . I want a chance to decide which product I want, the cheaper or the better quality. . . ."

This is just one of thousands of letters Mrs. Peterson has been receiving from housewives on consumer problems they face.

SHE TESTIFIED before the Senate Commerce Committee recently and emphatically endorsed Johnson's proposal for a bipartisan commission to study the changes taking place in the food industry.

"I feel certain that American consumers will welcome such a study," she told the senators. "They cannot help but benefit from a careful, thorough, unbiased appraisal of the present structure of the food industry, all along the line."

The importance of food to American consumers and their budgets was explained by Mrs. Peterson in this way:

"It is the largest single element in the family budget. Typical American city families, with incomes averaging $6,230 after taxes, spent about 23 percent of their dollars on food in 1960-61. Families with low incomes, under $3,000, spent an even higher percentage."

The consumer expert says that all of us who shop want to get the largest quantity, the most value, the greatest amount of real satisfaction for the dollars we spend. Food prices have risen. In February of this year the retail prices of food bought by the typical American city family were up about 6 percent over the 1957-58 figures, while prices of other elements in the family budget were up considerably more—about 8.5 percent, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

This means that some prices, such as for fruits, vegetables, cereals and bakery products, have risen most, while retail meats and poultry have dropped slightly.

In urging a food study commission, Mrs. Peterson said that it ought to answer the following questions, among others:

- Are the economies of large scale production and distribution being passed on to the consumers?
- What accounts for the growing spread between what the consumer pays and what the farmer gets? Given this redistribution of the consumer dollar, what additional services and benefits are provided that might explain this redistribution?
- Are state and federal laws governing the grading, branding and packaging and labeling of foods adequate from the consumer point of view? (PAI)

Presented to Widow:

Murray-Green Prize Cites Sen. Kefauver

Miami Beach—The AFL-CIO honored the late Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) for his service to the people with presentation of the 1963 Murray-Green Award.

Mrs. Nancy Kefauver, the senator's widow, accepted the posthumous award—a gold medallion and a check for $5,000—from AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee. The award was made at a dinner concluding the ninth annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services.

Beirne, president of the Communications Workers, praised the late senator's "determination in fighting for needed legislation to curb excessive drug profits and to restrict the sale of drugs until they are properly tested."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a telegram, called Kefauver "one of a rare handful of statesmen who emerge in each generation to fight for principle, regardless of political risk. His contributions to the welfare of all the people, in many aspects of their lives, will never be forgotten."

The award to Kefauver was for his "drive and determination in fighting for needed legislation to curb excessive drug profits and to restrict the sale of drugs until they are properly tested."

The Philip Murray-William Green Award was originated by the AFL-CIO Executive Counsel to honor those whose achievements in the areas of health and welfare inspired others to work for the common good.

"It was the southern drawl of Sen. Kefauver which called for a department for the consumer," Beirne noted.

"He spoke against excessive profits by big steel companies, against the marketing of inadequately tested drugs, against the shocking mark-ups of drug prices . . . opposed the Dixon-Yates power deal . . . fought to help the small businessman, and the small farmer . . . called for increased federal aid to improve the nation's health and educational standards.

"Because of the Kefauver drug legislation, we in this country will never have to face the heartbreak of those mothers in Europe who bore deformed babies because of the effects of thalidomide."

Beirne also said that Kefauver's voice "was never the voice of the racist or the demagogue."

Friend of Labor

"Organized labor never had a better friend or supporter," he said.

The speaker described the late Tennessee senator as "a maverick in the Senate and in the political arena . . . a homespun intellectual, a quiet man who carried big ideas."

In accepting the award, Mrs. Kefauver said that "during Estes' public career he always felt that this country derived its real strength from the working people of the nation."

"If Estes were here today he would deny that he deserved this award, but he would have been tremendously proud," Mrs. Kefauver said.

THE MURRAY-GREEN AWARD for 1963 is presented to Mrs. Nancy Kefauver, widow of the late Sen. Estes Kefauver, Tennessee Democrat who was a friend of labor, a fighter for the public interest, by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, left, chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee. The posthumous award, voted to Kefauver by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last year, was given at the annual Community Services Activities conference at Miami Beach. CSA Dir. Leo Perlis is at right.

Dinner at World's Fair Marks Local's Birthday

New York—One of the nation's largest local unions marked its 30th anniversary with a dinner at the World's Fair with its officers helping to put some of the finishing touches on this newest wonder of the world.

The union is Building Service Employees, Local 32B, which observed its third decade with a celebration at the fair's French Pavilion attended by hundreds of shop stewards and guests.

The dinner is expected to provide sufficient revenue for the union to give college scholarships in memory of the late Pres. Kennedy.

After the invocation by Francis Cardinal Spellman, chief guest of honor, BSEIU Pres. David Sullivan paid tribute to the union staff which had worked from early morning to help prevent cancellation of the dinner.

Sullivan cited the gains made by the local during the past 30 years, noting that its 42,000 members today enjoy wages four times what they were when it was chartered in 1934. He also pointed to the local's free medical center, convalescent home, pension program and broad range of fringe benefits as "conditions which have taken once-forgotten building service employes up the ladder of progress to achieve human dignity."

Local 32B Pres. Thomas Shortman, a BSEIU vice president, noted that the union has given more than $230,000 in college scholarship awards during the past 14 years.

"We thought it especially appropriate to celebrate our 30th anniversary by giving scholarships in honor of our late Pres. Kennedy, who did so much for the youth of this country and was himself a man of considerable education," Shortman said.

The number of Kennedy Memorial Scholarships has not yet been announced, but it was indicated that each will be worth the same amount given under the union's regular scholarship program, or $4,800 to cover a standard four-year college course.

Foundation Dedicates Debs' Indiana Home

Terre Haute, Ind.—The big rambling house, built in the style of the early 1900s, where Eugene V. Debs spent 25 fruitful years of a life devoted to others, was dedicated as an archive and memorial to the internationally-known labor leader and Socialist at a ceremony attended by more than a score of union officials.

The dwelling, built when Debs' wife, Kate, received an inheritance, has an elaborate fireplace and mantel in each room. It was restored by the Eugene V. Debs Foundation, organized to perpetuate the memory and works of Debs. Contributors to the foundation include Albert Schweitzer, whose German mother was a cousin of Debs.

The dedication exercise featured an analysis of Debs' life and work by Norman Thomas, 79-year-old six-times Socialist candidate for President, who as a Presbyterian minister delivered the Debs funeral sermon from the porch of the home Oct, 23, 1926.

"His greatest contribution to mankind," Thomas said, "was his personality, which found expression in his writing and speaking. That was uneven in quality but at its best magnificent.

Vision of Brotherhood

"Debs' vision of a truly cooperative society, a brotherhood of races and nations, and with it an end of bittter poverty and war, was never more important than it is today. His dream is our necessary hope as we love life. His life should ever remain an inspiration to believe that we fallible men may yet learn to live together as brothers, controlling machinery and power far beyond any that he ever saw, for life and not for death, for fraternal peace and not for war."

President of the foundation is Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman of the Meat Cutters, who presided.

Tilford Dudley, director of the AFL-CIO Speakers' Bureau and one of the organizers of the foundation, described some of its accomplishments. Pres. Dallas Sells of the Indiana AFL-CIO also spoke and Pres. Raleigh Holmstedt of Indiana State College here brought greetings. Guests were introduced by Ned A. Bush, Sr., executive vice president of the foundation and former president of the Terre Haute Newspaper Guild.

W. C. Midcap, editor of the Enginemen's Press, official journal of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, presented the foundation with original files of the publication, of which Debs was the first editor.

RAMBLING HOME of Eugene V. Debs in Terre Haute, Ind., was dedicated as an archive and memorial to the union and Socialist leader with the main address given by Norman Thomas (right), six-time Socialist candidate for President. The home is owned by the Eugene V. Debs Foundation, of which Sec.-Treas. Patrick Gorman (left) of the Meat Cutters is president. With them is Mrs. Marguerite Debs Cooper, niece of Debs and his only living relative.

Nyasaland's Unions Face TrainingNeed

Unions have to be free to help the government of the new republic of Nyasaland develop its economic structure within the shortest possible time, Labor Minister Willie Chokani told the seventh graduating class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Nyasaland will get its independence on July 6. Chokani, formerly a school teacher, expressed gratitude to the AFL-CIO, the Postal, Telegraph & Telephone Intl. and the Intl. Federation of Petroleum Workers for aid given local unions in his country. The main problem facing it, he said, is lack of trained leadership, and the type of training provided by the AIFLD would be welcomed.

"We believe that no amount of training outside the country would meet all the needs of the unions in the developing countries," he said. "However, if the union movement is going to succeed, if it is going to develop into a strong, free trade union movement, then a lot of training must be done at the local level."

State Scored On Mailing of Jobless Checks

Jobless workers, not their lawyers, should have first claim on unemployment compensation checks, the AFL-CIO declared at a Labor Dept. hearing.

Social Security Dir. Nelson Cruikshank sharply criticized the policy adopted by New Hampshire of mailing unemployment checks, when requested by claimants, to the offices of attorneys who represented them in appeals or claims.

Testifying with Cruikshank were AFL-CIO Associate Gen. Counsel Thomas E. Harris and Exec. Vice Pres. Joseph Moriarty of the New Hampshire State AFL-CIO.

The hearing is to determine if federal funds to administer its employment security program are to be cut off unless the state abandons its policy of mailing checks to attorneys. The Labor Dept's. Bureau of Employment Security has recommended that this be done. The bureau maintains this amounts to a lien on the check, in violation of law.

Cruikshank termed mailing of benefit checks to attorneys a "diversion of benefit funds" which gives lawyers a greater right to the meager assets of a jobless worker than other creditors.

The real solution, Cruikshank suggested, is to have fees to attorneys who successfully represent claimants in unemployment compensation cases paid by the government, out of administrative funds, as is now done in six states and in a number of other states in workmen's compensation cases.

Such a procedure, Cruikshank noted, was recommended by the federal government to states as far back as 1950.

"In any case," Cruikshank told the hearing, "the United States government should not permit its legal guardianship of the unemployment insurance program to be diminished by the efforts of attorneys or bar associations to assert the priority of their interests as against that of an unemployed worker."

Appeal Upsets Potash Strike Jailings, Fines

Carlsbad, N. M.—The New Mexico State Supreme Court has reversed a lower court decision imposing a $10,000 fine following a strike two years ago in the Carlsbad potash basin by Local 177 of the Stone Workers.

The case involved a charge of contempt of a restraining order obtained by the Intl. Minerals & Chemical Corp. at the height of the strike called by the Stone Workers and other unions against six major potash producing companies.

The court reversed the fine against the local and also voided a fine of $1,000 against Pres. Casimir Alexandre of the local. The order further voided 30-day jail sentences against Alexandre and Harvey Barton, Ralph McKee and J. E. London, all members of the Stone Workers.

The sentences and fines were imposed by District Judge John R. Brand, of near-by Hobbs. In all he imposed jail terms on 10 members of the local. Six served their jail sentences while the other four appealed.

Basis for the Supreme Court ruling was that the lower court had erred in imposing criminal punishment in a civil proceeding.

The action of the high court released the bonds under which the four men had been free and lifted the threat of the $10,000 fine from the local.

Senator Sees Picket Line, Shifts Location of Speech

Wichita—One of the biggest trade associations in Kansas moved a convention session out of a struck hotel because its keynote speaker—Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.)—refused to cross a picket line.

Proxmire had a major address prepared for the opening of the Kansas Independent Oil & Gas Association's annual meeting at the Lassen Terrace Hotel here. But when he discovered that the Hotel & Restaurant Employes were on strike because of the hotel's refusal to bargain, the Wisconsin senator told his hosts that they had two choices.

They could cancel his speech, or they could hold their meeting elsewhere.

The upshot was that the 1,000 delegates moved their session to a nearby auditorium—and then heard Proxmire deliver a blistering account of "What's Wrong with the Oil Industry?"

Senate Unit Nears Vote On Public Works Bill

A Senate Public Works subcommittee neared a vote on a bill to give the accelerated public works program a new lease on life, with a $1.5 billion extension and expansion of the job-creating measure.

If the subcommittee, headed by Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W. Va.), approves the measure as anticipated, full committee action is expected to clear the way for Senate consideration after the civil rights bill is passed. The bill's sponsor, Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), is chairman of the full committee.

The AFL-CIO has urged prompt action, warning that unless additional funds are made available hundreds of thousands of jobs created directly and indirectly by the program will come to an end.

Congress in 1962 authorized a $900 million program, but the funds are fast running out. The House Public Works Committee has approved a $900 million extension although the bill is stalled in the Rules Committee.

The McNamara bill was given endorsement by a Senate Labor subcommittee in a recent report. The panel, headed by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), said the need was so great that the public works program should be considered as "semi-permanent" rather than temporary.

Pres. Johnson recently promised support for a stepped-up public works program if other Administration measures fail to bring full employment.

The AFL-CIO has called for $2 billion in public works and AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged affiliated unions and union members to "help achieve action on this program by expressing their support in letters and other communications" to senators and congressmen.

Amendment Plan Offered:

Bipartisan Senate Coalition Presses Civil Rights Action

from today's intolerable situation," the group said.

If the amendments are approved at the caucuses, possibly with further modifications, the bipartisan leadership hopes to be able to count the two-thirds vote needed to cut off debate through cloture or compel the southerners to permit a vote under threat of cloture.

Dirksen said cloture is being talked about by GOP senators who had previously been opposed to the move.

"There comes a moment," he said, "when there's a feeling in the air that the time has come for action, and we have just about gotten there."

The bipartisan discussions came amid signs of increasing impatience with the drawn-out debate that has blocked votes on both the House-passed civil rights bill and a mounting backlog of other legislation.

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.), Democratic floor leader for the bill, charged the Senate with "a display of adult delinquency."

He denounced the filibuster but stressed that the 19 southerners alone could not block a vote. The blame, he said, must be shared by those of the 81 other senators who up to now have been unwilling to vote to cut off debate.

He invited a national letter-writing campaign to help stir the Senate to action.

In floor debate, other senators echoed the cry for action. The nation is "tired" of debate, Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.) said. Continuation of the filibuster will "bring the Senate of the United States into disrepute," Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) added.

Sen. Norris Cotton, conservative New Hampshire Republican, took the floor to say that while he could not vote for the bill as it stood, he considered the filibuster "an abuse of the legislative process."

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.), normally mild-mannered, electrified the Senate with an angry denunciation of the southern tactics.

Mansfield Sees 'Travesty'

"We are witnessing a travesty on the legislative process," Mansfield said. "The majority is being told what it can do and what it cannot do. I hope what has been happening during the past two months will make itself felt in the mind of each senator, because the times call out for a change in the rules under which the Senate operates."

Mansfield's ire was aroused by what he considered a breach by Dixie leaders of an agreement that a vote would be taken during the past week on the jury trial amendment supported by the bipartisan civil rights leadership.

Sen. Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.) said the Dixie bloc would not agree to a vote on the jury trial issue until after May 19—the day of the Maryland primary in which Alabama's Gov. George C. Wallace is carrying his segregationist appeal into the presidential preference balloting. Russell's apparent hope was that a big vote for Wallace would weaken civil rights support in the Senate.

Meanwhile Pres. Johnson carried the case for passage of civil rights legislation to the country, telling audiences in Georgia as well as in the North that "justice demands" protection of the rights "of all of our citizens regardless of race, religion or the color of their skin."

Speaking as a southerner to southerners, he told an Atlanta audience which included members of the state legislature:

"Heed not those who would come waving the tattered and discredited banners of the past, who seek to stir old hostilities and kindle old hatreds."

And in Washington, D. C., addressing a gathering of business executives, he called for increased public pressure for Senate action on the rights bill, warning that if the bill should fail "we will have some very dark days in this country."

Union Issues Study On Automation

The economic implications of automation and its impact on bargaining are examined in a new 432-page book published by the Dept. of Research & Education of the Pulp-Sulphite Workers.

The volume is in the nature of a preliminary survey and does not itself supply final answers to the problems posed by technological advances. It presents instead, the union said, a basis from which locals "can forge their own solutions to automation in the light of their own particular circumstances" by concentrating on collective bargaining approaches.

Copies of The Automation Study may be obtained from the Dept. of Research Education, of the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers, 1145 Nineteenth St., N. W.,Washington 6, D. C.

McCulloch Answers Rights Bill 'Misinformation'

Concerned at misinformation being circulated about the civil rights bill passed by the House and now before the Senate, Rep. William M. McCulloch (R-O.), one of the architects of the bill, has released the following summary:

False and misleading charges are being directed at the Civil Rights bill now in the Senate.

To those people who believe in equality under the law, who support the Constitution, and who love liberty for themselves and for others, the Civil Rights bill is moderate in scope, and in accordance with the best traditions of America.

Here is what the Civil Rights bill does and does not do.

EDUCATION

The bill does not permit the Federal Government to transfer students among schools to create racial balancing.

The bill does not permit the Federal Government to dictate to schools or teachers as to what they must teach.

The bill does not permit the Federal Government to force religious schools to hire teachers they do not want.

The bill does not permit the Federal Government to interfere with the course content or day-to-day operations of public or private schools.

The bill does not permit the Federal Government to interfere with the job or seniority rights of school teachers.

The bill does authorize the attorney general to bring civil suits to desegregate public schools where individual citizens are too poor or are afraid to bring their own suits.

Only at and after the request of a school board, the bill would authorize the commissioner of education to furnish limited technical and financial assistance to those public schools which need assistance in desegregating.

HOUSING

The bill does not permit the Federal Government to tell any home or apartment owner or real estate operator to whom he must sell, rent, lease, or otherwise use his real estate.

BANK LOANS

The bill does not permit the Federal Government to tell a bank, savings and loan company, or other such financial institution to whom it may or may not make a loan.

EMPLOYMENT AND UNIONS

The bill does not permit the Federal Government to interfere with the day-to-day operations of a business or labor organization.

The bill does not permit the federal government to require an employer or union to hire or accept for membership a quota of employes from any particular minority group.

The bill does not permit the federal government to destroy the job seniority rights of either union or non-union employes.

The bill does authorize a bipartisan commission to investigate charges that an employer has refused to hire or that a union has refused to accept for membership an individual solely because of his race, sex, color, religion, or national origin. If the commission cannot dispose of the charge through the voluntary cooperation of the employer or union, the commission must either drop the charge or bring a civil suit in a U.S. district court. In court the commission must prove its charge by a preponderance of the evidence.

This authority is weaker than that granted to 25 state commissions under state law. And, where a state commission is doing its job, the federal commission may not interfere.

FARMERS

The bill does not permit the federal government to interfere with a farmer's operation of his farm.

The bill does not permit the federal government to impose minority quotas upon a farmer's farmhands or tenants.

The bill does not permit the federal government to interfere with membership in farm organizations.

The bill only requires that a farmer, having 25 or more employes, may not refuse to hire an employe solely because of the color of his skin or his religion.

SOCIAL SECURITY, VETERAN'S BENEFITS

The bill does not permit the federal government to deny or interfere with an individual's right to receive social security or veteran's benefits.

VOTING

The bill neither authorizes nor permits the federal government to interfere in a state's right to fix voter qualifications.

The bill does not permit the federal government to practice "judge shopping," or otherwise interfere with the local federal judiciary.

The bill does provide limited procedural safeguards to assure that citizens are not denied the right to vote because of their race, color, religion, or national origin.

HOTELS AND RESTAURANTS

The bill does not permit the federal government to tell general retail establishments, bars, private clubs, country clubs, or service establishments whom they must serve.

The bill does not permit the federal government to interfere with or destroy the private property rights of individual businessmen.

The bill does not permit the federal government to tell a lawyer, doctor, banker, or other professional man whom he must serve.

The bill does not permit the federal government to tell a barbershop or beauty shop owner whom he must serve, except that such establishment, if located in a hotel, must serve all patrons of that hotel.

All the bill does is to require that the owners of places of lodging (having five or more rooms for rent), eating establishments, gasoline stations, and places of entertainment are to serve all customers who are well-behaved and who are able to pay.

This requirement is weaker than the public accommodation laws of 32 states. And, where these states properly enforce their laws, there is no reason for the federal government to interfere.

JURY TRIALS

The Civil Rights bill contains no primary criminal penalties. Only civil actions are authorized to prevent an individual from continuing to violate provisions of the bill. Historically and according to the Constitution, jury trials are not authorized in these types of cases. The laws of the 50 states are the same in this regard.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

The bill does not permit the federal government in any way to interfere with freedom of the press and freedom of speech.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT POWERS

A majority of the states have enacted legislation which is as strong or stronger than the major provisions of the Civil Rights bill. Nothing in the bill interferes with the effective enforcement of these state laws. And, where these laws are being effectively enforced, there is no reason for the federal government to interfere in states' rights.

In each title of the bill, effective administrative and judicial safeguards are provided. Federal officials are granted no final authority to withhold federal financial assistance or impose penalties upon citizens. Every citizen is guaranteed his day in court with all the judicial safeguards that the Bill of Rights guarantees.

STATE CIVIL RIGHTS LAW

A majority of states have strong civil rights legislation which is effectively enforced. The federal Civil Rights bill specifically provides that the federal law will in no way interfere with the right of those states to continue enforcing their laws. And, where the states do so, the federal government will have no cause to enforce the federal civil rights law in those states.

Thus, for the Americans who do not discriminate against their fellow citizens because of race, color, or religion, the federal civil rights bill will have no effect on their daily lives.

House Reverses Action:

Johnson Wins Tests On Foreign Aid Bill

Pres. Johnson won two major foreign aid victories in the House after a direct appeal to Democrats to back up his program and a letter from former Pres. Eisenhower to Republican House Floor Leader Charles A. Halleck urging GOP support.

By a startlingly large margin, the House reversed a three-month-old floor decision and authorized $312 million in U.S. contributions to the Intl. Development Association—a multinational agency which makes long-term loans at low interest rates to underdeveloped countries. The rollcall vote was 249-132.

In a second action, the House Foreign Affairs Committee beat down early efforts to slash the Administration's $3.4 billion direct foreign aid bill before sending it to the floor.

Both bills were strongly backed by the AFL-CIO in testimony before congressional committees. The Senate passed the IDA bill last year.

On the Intl. Development Association vote, Johnson with the help of Eisenhower's appeal got 17 Democrats and 36 Republicans to switch from opposition to support of the bill. More than a dozen other Democrats, mostly from the South, voted against the bill three months ago and abstained from voting the second time around.

Rep. Otto Passman (D-La.), normally a bitter opponent of foreign aid spending and Intl. Development Association loans, noticeably abstained from the debate. Rep. Albert Rains (D-Ala.), who is retiring from Congress this year, took the floor to point out that IDA gets $1.40 from other countries for its projects for every $1 the U.S. advances.

The IDA lends "hard" western currency to underdeveloped countries for basic economic foundation projects, allowing as long as 50 years for repayment at less than 1 percent interest rates, Rains asked the House: "How can you go back to your constituents and say we turned down $438 million . . . from England and France" to match the U.S. contribution of $312 million across three years?

In the Foreign Affairs Committee, not a single Democrat deserted the Administration in defeating a series of Republican amendments designed to slash the "bare bones" $3.4 billion foreign aid request—the same sum finally appropriated by Congress for the current fiscal year ending

Each year Passman's Appropriations subcommittee has chopped actual funds well below the authorized amount. Johnson is now seeking renewed southern support from powerful committee chairmen to hold the line against appropriations-slashing.

PRES. JOHNSON carries forward his fight for his "war on poverty" program with a six-state rapid-fire tour of the Appalachian mountain chain, pledging the support of the federal government to upgrade the education standards and economic opportunities of the region, where per capita income is below the national average and the unemployment rate higher than the average.

Morgan, Smith to Head ABC Convention Team

Television coverage of the national political conventions for the American Broadcasting Co. will be anchored by Edward P. Morgan, whose news and commentary is sponsored by the AFL-CIO on 200 ABC stations each week-night, and the veteran reporter Howard K. Smith.

In making the announcement, Elmer W. Lower, president of ABC News, Special Events & Public Affairs, said the two make up "a very powerful combination."

"These two reporters distinguished themselves and television journalism with the excellent job they did, under pressure and tension, of covering the assassination and funeral of Pres. Kennedy," he said. "Viewers acceptance of the new team was immediate and commendation was widespread. We think they will bring our viewers the deepest and most knowledgeable analysis of politics and politicians in the 1964 conventions."

"Anchoring" means Morgan and Smith will offer commentary of an interpretive nature and select the coverage provided by other ABC staff reporters.

Morgan's news programs have won him many honors, including the Peabody Award. He attended his first convention at the age of 18, accompanying his father, who was a delegate from Iowa, to the Republican session in Kansas City. As a reporter and analyst he covered the 1948, 1952, 1956 and 1960 conventions. He is co-author of Candidates, 1960, and has published Clearing the Air, a collection of some of his news commentaries.

Smith covered three conventions in 1948, the campaign of 1956 and the conventions and campaigns of 1960, and served as moderator of the first Kennedy-Nixon debate in 1960. He was in Europe on assignment in 1956.

NEWS TELEVISION coverage of the political conventions for the American Broadcasting Co. will be anchored by Edward P. Morgan (left), whose week-night broadcasts are sponsored by the AFL-CIO, and Howard K. Smith, another veteran reporter.

Betancourt Elected AIFLD Trustee

Former Pres. Romulo Betancourt of Venezuela was elected to the board of trustees of the American Institute for Free Labor Development of its annual meeting in Washington.

The new labor trustees are Pres. Celeo Gonzalez of the Labor Federation of the North Coast of Honduras; Dr. William Thayer, Santiago,, Chile, labor lawyer; Dir. Jay Lovestone of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs, and his executive assistant, Ernest Lee.

New members chosen from the management field were Pres. William M. Hickey of the United Corp. and Ambassador Robert C. Hill, a director of Merck & Co.

Rep. Cannon Dies; Oldest In House

Rep. Clarence Cannon (D-Mo.), at the age of 85 oldest member of the House and second in seniority-of-service only to Rep. Carl Vinson (D-Ga.), died suddenly May 12.

An expert in parliamentary law, parliamentarian for many years at Democratic National Conventions, Cannon wielded great power as long-time chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, in which his budget-cutting tastes made him a factor to be reckoned with by several Democratic Presidents.

In the current Congress he extended his control of budgets by abolishing a subcommittee on supplemental appropriations and channeling Administration requests for supplemental funds through the regular subcommitees, of which he was ex officio a member with a vote.

Prospective ranking member of the House, after this session of Congress, will be Rep. Emanuel Cellar (D-N. Y.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, whose service began the same day as Cannon's, Mar. 4, 1923. Vinson has announced he will not seek re-election.

Rep. George H. Mahon (D-Tex.) was in line to replace Cannon as chairman of the Appropriations Committee. Cannon was buried in his home town of Elsberry, Mo.

works than is now contemplated by the Administration.

"We regret very much that the accelerated public works program passed by the last Congress is now dying simply because there is no more money available."

There is no authorization for more money, he said, and labor will continue its "agitation" to get the speeded-up works program "revived," and "with more money" than the $900 million first authorization approved by Congress in 1962.

"We also think that other important construction projects, like mass transit [for major city systems] ought to be given very serious consideration, so that a bigger dent can be made in unemployment." the AFL-CIO legislative director said.

In addition to the bill for hospital care for aged social security beneficiaries, now pending in the House Ways & Means Committee, he said "we think that federal standards for unemployment compensation" should be carefully examined, "so that there will be more adequate funds."

In directing an attack against poverty, however, "extension of coverage under minimum wage laws and raising the minimum wage to $2 an hour instead of the [present] $1.25" would do "the most good," Biemiller said.

He pointed out that in testifying on the Administration's anti-poverty bill, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had cited the plight of city workers in Hoboken, N. J., who "have full-time jobs" but nevertheless are having to ask for and get supplementary relief funds from the municipal authorities.

"They are covered by the minimum wage, they are getting $1.25 an hour, and this income is not sufficient to meet the standards that New Jersey has for large families," he said.

"These are fathers who have 8, 9 and 10 children, and the city is supplementing their wages to the tune of $100 to $125 a month.

"This is why we say that the minimum wage law—good at it is, valuable as it is—must be strengthened if we are going to seriously attack poverty. A lot of people who are living in poverty have jobs, but they don't have enough money to get near the $3,000 standard that is generally accepted today as the border line" between poverty and a yearly income raising them above the poverty class.

The AFL-CIO supported the Administration's tax-slashing program, he observed, but adheres to its "consistent statement" that the tax cut alone cannot get the economy rolling fast enough to soak up the unemployment that for six years has stood at a 5 percent rate or higher.

"That is why we keep harping on public works and other measures of that type," he said. "We think that public works should precede another tax cut."

Job Bias Unit Sets Rule for Apprentices

The President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity has proposed that federal contractors be required to comply with non-discrimination standards established by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

All apprenticeship programs registered with the Labor Dept. now prohibit discrimination against applicants on the basis of race, creed, color or national origin. A number of apprenticeship programs, however, are not registered with the Labor Dept. and therefore are not bound by the policy.

If the Equal Opportunity Committee's proposed regulations become final—a 21-day period is provided for interested parties to comment or suggest changes—employers could be barred from bidding on federal contracts if they failed to comply with the non-discrimination standards, whether or not their apprenticeship programs are registered with the Labor Dept.

The proposed regulations apply to the selection of apprenticeships, to waiting lists, and to employment during apprenticeship. The announcement said they "make clear that nothing contained in them requires or supports a quota system for minorities in apprenticeship programs."

House Speaker John McCormack, a convention speaker, reported 12 Democratic votes on the Ways & Means Committee for hospital care and appealed for "just one vote" from the 10 Republicans on the committee to give the bill a majority of the 25 members of the committee.

The convention also adopted resolutions calling for legislation to make higher quality drugs available at lower cost and for repeal of state "fair trade" laws. It opposed "quality stabilization" or other "price fixing" legislation and recommended an investigation of doctor-owned drug firms. It also commended the Administration for its new consumer education program and for urging use by doctors of the generic names of drugs in writing prescriptions.

Drugs at Cost Proposed

Edelman, reporting as acting president before his election, proposed that the NCSC provide an at-cost drug service for members and launch a drive for 1 million "gold card" members paying $1 a year each to keep the council solvent.

He said he realizes that "some of you are tired of being called on again and again" to back social-security hospital care but "you dare not shirk" because the American Medical Association is "staging a bitter, costly battle" to defeat the program.

"We must do better," he declared. "Certainly the President of the United States will do his part, but no Chief Executive, even with the President's magic touch, will prevail if we fail to do our utmost.

"Everything you have done before has to be done all over again. We are coming down the home stretch in our seven-year battle."

Johnson Message

Johnson sent a message to the council, saying he would continue to urge Congress "to take long-overdue action to provide hospital insurance for the aged under social security" and adding "your council has done much to foster public understanding of the importance of this legislation."

Whitney M. Young, Jr., of the National Urban League compared the struggle of 19 million Negroes for equal rights with the battle of seniors for hospital care.

Declaring that "if we believe in democracy we must make it work," Young noted that "those who oppose civil rights also oppose medicare." He called for a "coalition of conscience" for the common good of all citizens.

Labor Calls for Action To Protect Wilderness

The AFL-CIO has urged the House Interior Committee to approve a wilderness preservation bill which the Senate passed more than 13 months ago.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, in letters to Chairman Wayne N. Aspinall (D-Colo.) and other committee members, termed the Senate-passed bill the "best" of the wilderness protection bills pending in the committee.

The Senate bill, backed by the Administration and conservation groups, would place 8.2 million acres of undeveloped national forest land permanently in the wilderness system and add an additional 57.2 million acres of public land conditionally to the system, subject to review. Over a 10-year period, other "primitive" areas could be added on the recommendation of the President, subject to a veto by either house of Congress.

A similar bill was passed by the Senate in 1961 but died with the adjournment of the 87th Congress after the House committee reported a drastically amended bill that never reached the floor.

Biemiller wrote the committee that while the AFL-CIO preferred the Senate bill, two alternative House bills could, with amendments, "provide a basis for progress towards enactment of sound wilderness protection legislation."

Biemiller urged that mineral leasing in wilderness areas be restricted to those situations where the President has ruled that a special need exists for mineral development.

Job Retraining Pays Dividends In Organizing

Santa Ana, Calif. — A training program sponsored by Local 2125 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers is turning out qualified workers for Southern California's booming electronics industry.

Two classes of women are undergoing instruction in the union's headquarters here in the mysteries of electronic wiring and soldering —a program that got under way last November.

The union pays the full cost for each trainee who takes the full 40 hours of academic and mechanical instruction. An inclusive 21-question test follows, and each student who passes it is presented with a training certificate at a general membership meeting of the local. Then the local makes every effort to place them in one of Orange County's electronics plants.

Clinton G. Brame, business manager of the local, pointed out that the program not only has made stronger union members out of unemployed women who hold IBEW cards, but in addition has recruited union supporters from among women workers who had been discharged from non-union plants. Those hired by non-union plants serve as a natural nucleus for organizing, he added.

Factory Hiring Up Less Than Seasonally

The factory hiring rate rose less than seasonally between February and March, the Labor Dept. reported. The hiring rate edged up from 34 to 35 per 1,000 workers—below past years. The seasonally adjusted layoff rate was unchanged.

Nixon Buoyed By Nebraska Write-in Vote

Former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon made his best showing of the Republican primary season when he picked up 31.4 percent of the GOP presidential preference vote in Nebraska on the basis of write-ins of his name.

Sen. Barry Goldwater (Ariz.), the only candidate whose name was on the ballot, ran first in the primary with 67,369 votes in complete though unofficial returns, and his backers claimed he had won 4 of 6 GOP convention delegates, with 10 others still to be chosen at a state convention June 1.

The Goldwater vote, nevertheless, was slightly less than 50 percent of the total—Nixon getting 42,811, Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge 22,133 and Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York 2,311—all through write-ins. Goldwater had the endorsement of the state's entire congressional delegation but won only 49.5 percent of the total vote —a slight decline from the 51 percent he had won in the Illinois primary, where the Lodge and Nixon write-ins also mounted impressively.

A former Eisenhower Administration official, one-time Interior Sec. Fred A. Seaton, said the vote showed a diminishing of Goldwater popularity and "the beginning of the Nixon surge."

Rockefeller, the only candidate listed on the West Virginia Republican primary ballot, won about two-thirds of the total GOP votes cast in fairly hot races for state offices. Goldwater supporters had urged a boycott of the presidential preferences. The New York governor's state campaign manager, Maf G. Guthrie, called Rockefeller's showing "beyond our expectations."

Full Pound Urged As Bread Standard

Sacramento, Calif.—California's Consumer Counsel, Helen E. Nelson, urged the legislature to require bakers to put 16 ounces of flour into a one pound loaf—not 15 ounces as permitted under present regulations.

She also asked that California follow the example of Arizona and Oregon and require bread whipped or fluffed to resemble a larger-size loaf be prominently labeled "balloon loaf."

Negro Actor Is Elected New Equity President

New York—Equity, the stage actors' union, has elected Frederick O'Neal as president and Ralph Bellamy, retiring from the top office after 12 years, as president emeritus.

O'Neal, an officer and Equity council member for 14 of his 20 years as an actor, is the union's first Negro president.

The first item of business at the first council meeting at which O'Neal presided was to name Bellamy president emeritus, and to send him a message of "humble thanks" for the "dignity, prestige and integrity" he brought to the office.

The message, sent to Los Angeles, saluted Bellamy for the "unselfish and devoted service" that has "providently and positively affected the long-range interests of all American performers."

In a campaign statement O'Neal had listed union objectives as improvement in various contracts particularly in the soon-to-be-negotiated major production contract; extension of employment opportunities, merger study, consolidation of pension and welfare funds, earnings under pay TV and others.

In the balloting for officers, O'Neal, who had been nominated by petition, got 1,872 votes to 1,590 for Eddie Weston, nominated by a committee majority. For first vice president, the vote was Theodore Bikel 1,746, Lillian Gish, 1,656.

The following candidates won council seats in contested elections: Alan Bunce, Roger C. Carmel, Mildred Dunnock, Frances Foster, Margaret Hamilton, Polly Rowles, Frederic Tozere, Rowan Tudor, George Voskovec and Iggie Wolfington.

Union officers said Helaine Feldman, business manager of Equity magazine, has been named editor to succeed Dick Moore, resigned.

Disablement Rate Higher In Jobless Men

The rate of chronic disability reducing an individual's capacity to work is nearly twice as high among unemployed men as among those with jobs, a study conducted by the U.S. Public Health Service's National Center for Health Statistics reveals.

The study was based on household interviews conducted weekly from July 1961 through June 1962 in cooperation with the Census Bureau.

It found that during the one-year period, 15.5 percent of the jobless men were limited by chronic disease or disability, whereas the corresponding figure for employed men was 7.9 percent. Among women the percentages were 8.5 for those out of work and seeking jobs against 5.2 for the employed.

When limitation of activities in addition to work capacity was considered, such as recreation and community affairs, restrictive chronic conditions were reported by 10.9 percent of the entire labor force, employed and unemployed. The percentages in this overall category were 16.7 among the jobless and 10.5 among the employed.

Gains Won For 70,000 By ILGWU

New York—Three major units of the Ladies' Garment Workers reached contract settlements in the same week that gave about 70,000 workers in the New York metropolitan area substantial wage increases and other benefits.

The increases range at 5 and 6 percent as a first step up to 26 cents an hour for wages and fringe benefits—15 cents in wages, the rest in such fringes as a second vacation week and improvements in holiday and cost-of-living clauses.

The new agreements, effective June 1 and running for three years, cover 40,000 coat and suit workers represented by the union's New York Cloak Joint Board; 15,000 skirt and sportswear workers belonging to Blouse, Skirt & Sportswear Local 23-25, Cutters Local 10 and Pressers Local 35; and 10,000 workers on outerwear for infants, children and young teenagers represented by Local 105.

New Minimums Set

In each contract new minimum rates were set for craft workers, a second week of paid vacation was gained, and Election Day, now a half-holiday, was made a full paid holiday in alternate years when a governor or a president is to be elected.

"We are pleased that in renewal of the agreements settlement was reached peacefully at the bargaining table," said ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky, who noted that the pacts cover "some of our oldest veterans as well as our most recent newcomers."

The cloakmakers won an estimated 26 cents an hour in gains,

LABOR'S PLEDGE to build the world of which John F. Kennedy dreamed, contained in a resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council a few days after the late President was assassinated, is presented to Mrs. Jacqueline Kennedy and Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy by Federation Pres. George Meany. With the specially bound copy of the resolution Meany presented also a copy of the AFL-CIO film, "John F. Kennedy's Last Words to Labor," for the Kennedy Memorial Library.

Urges Free World To Maintain Power

By Saul Miller

Immediate action on a strong civil rights bill, free collective bargaining for better wages, shorter hours and improved working conditions, and a unified free world alliance emerged as the major themes of the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting.

The three-day session at Washington surveyed these three key areas of the nation's concern and spelled out labor's position. It adopted policy statements as well on housing legislation, educational television, aid for Alaska, and the situations in Brazil and the Middle East.

On internal matters the council received a report indicating the continuing success of mediation in handling disputes under the internal disputes plan and welcomed the Canadian Labor Congress' adoption of a similar plan.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told reporters at a press conference dealing with the council's statement rejecting a productivity yardstick as the sole means for measuring wage increases that rather than impinge on free collective bargaining, "we want the government to do something about jobs."

He cited again the need for an extension and expansion of the accelerated public works program as one among many measures the government can take to cope with the current high levels of unemployment.

Concessions Opposed

On the question of freer trade with the Soviet Union, the AFL-CIO president said he was clearly opposed to easing barriers on trade with the Communists unless the U.S. gets something in return. Those who believe that more trade and extended credits will convert the Communists from their goal of world domination are living in a "fool's paradise," he said, adding: "There's no profit in doing business with the Communists."

On the domestic scene the council took the following actions:

- Called on the Senate to "stop talking and start voting" on civil rights legislation and to shun "crippling compromise" and weakening and delaying amendments to the bill before it. (Story this page.)
- Rejected "completely" the concept that the national productivity rate is the only factor in collectively bargained wage levels and assailed wage restraints without similar restraints on prices and profits.
- Warned that a "distinct and dangerous lack of balance in the economy" is becoming evident as workers' buying power lags while business and industry become top-heavy with "booming profits, soaring dividends and capital gains." (Story this page.)
- Urged passage of the Administration's housing and community development bill, the need for which "grows daily more urgent." (Story page 4.)
- Asked low-cost loans to Alaskan businessmen seeking to recover from the earthquake on the same basis as loans under the foreign aid program—three-quarters of 1 percent. (Story page 5.)
- Called on unions to participate in the development of educational television as a major means of adult education and communication. (Story page 2.)

In the international affairs area, the council:

- Warned that neither the trouble of the Communist world nor the "tactical changes" they have forced on Moscow should serve as

'No Single Formula':

Free Bargaining Key To Equity for Labor

Organized labor will press forward for "better wages, shorter hours and improved working conditions" on the basis of free collective bargaining in a free economy, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

"There can be no single wage formula in a pluralistic economy," the council declared in a statement reiterating the federation's position on the "much advertised national wage formula" promulgated by the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a press conference that there is "nothing wrong with the government advising restraint," but that he does not agree the government has a right to assert the public interest to bring about certain results.

Labor and management, Meany said, have a responsibility to bargain "within reason" to assure that neither side prices itself "out of the market."

Pandora's Box

Meany commented that if the government asserts its right to get into bargaining on wages and fringes then it must also act on prices, profits, management wages, dividends and other such areas. But, he added, this would "open a Pandora's box," and that he strongly opposed all such actions.

He noted in reply to a query that government guideposts tended to act against wages rather than prices.

The council rejected "completely" the concept that the national productivity rate is the only factor in collectively bargained wage levels, declaring "other important, tangible factors—such as the cost of living, em-

Rockefeller's Strength Up In California

New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and Arizona's Sen. Barry Goldwater headed into California's climactic Republican presidential primary with Rockefeller for the first time looking like the frontrunner.

The copyrighted Louis Harris survey, based on California interviews following Rockefeller's upset victory in the May 15 Oregon primary over Goldwater, former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon and Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, showed a pronounced shift away from Goldwater to Rockefeller, with New York's governor having a 57-43 percent margin among voters who said they had made up their minds.

Senate Pressed to Invoke Cloture, Shun Crippling Rights Amendments

"Stop talking, start voting," the AFL-CIO Executive Council urged the Senate as the civil rights debate dragged into a third month.

"The filibuster must be broken," the council said, calling on the Senate "to shun crippling compromise; to reject weakening and delaying amendments; to invoke cloture and to pass the bill now."

The council asked for a single cloture action—the procedure for limiting debate through a two-thirds vote—covering the entire bill "and every pending amendment." To seek separate cloture votes on each title of the bill, the AFL-CIO statement said, "would only provide America with another 1,000 hours of meaningless talk."

As the council met, Senate Democratic and Republican leaders for the first time expresed public optimism that progress is being made toward the votes needed to break the filibuster. A cloture vote may come soon after the June 2 presidential primary in California.

Key to the search for cloture is the package of amendments, agreed to by party leaders but still subject to possible revision in a series of Democratic and Republican caucuses being held as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Sen. Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.) emerged from a Dixie caucus to charge that the amendments made the bill "more obnoxious" than it was originally.

Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) told newsmen he had become convinced that the challenge of civil rights "is inescapable, and the time has come to deal with it."

Asked how he had overcome the "misgivings" he had originally expressed about key sections of the ployer and industry profits, substandard wages and working conditions, inequitable wage and fringe benefit levels—all must be considered."

The council assailed "wage restraints without price and profit restraints" as "neither workable nor equitable," adding that neither wage nor price restraints "are tolerable in a free society except in the gravest national emergency and then only when coupled with stringent restraints upon excess profits."

In a companion statement analyzing the current economic situation the council warned of "a distinct and dangerous lack of balance in the economy" as workers' buying power lags while business and industry is "topheavy" with "booming profits, soaring dividends and capital gains."

The statement stressed that unemployment has remained above 5.5 percent of the labor force in the last five months despite expansion of economic activity and booming profits, adding that "the anticipated expansion" during the rest of the year "is not expected to reduce unemployment appreciably."

The council statement on wage policy hit out sharply at the "cries of alarm from some" that inflation is threatening the nation, asserting "today's threat is idle men, idle plants and idle machines."

"To the AFL-CIO the answer is simple: we must put America back to work. We must provide the consumer purchasing power which is the base of our entire economic strength."

To achieve this goal, the council stressed that wages, hours and conditions would be advanced on "a union-by-union, company-by-company and industry-by-industry basis" in the light of the needs of the workers involved and the economic ability of the companies and the industry involved.

Documenting the case for the growing unbalance in the economy, the council noted that in the first quarter of 1964 profits were running about 42 percent above 1961 while labor income was 16 percent greater.

It pointed up the fact that workers' buying power has lagged behind the nation's rapidly rising productivity since the mid-1950s, with productivity rising at a yearly rate of 3.2 percent from 1956 to 1963 while buying power rose an average of only 2.3 percent a year.

"What America needs is not a lid on collective bargaining and wage increases—as some people suggest—but strong unions, effective bargaining and substantial improvements of wages and fringe benefits," the statement declared.

The nation also needs "special efforts" to lift wages and working conditions of the lowest-paid workers through extended coverage of the wage-hour law and an increase in the minimum wage to $2 an hour, the council said.

It called again for increased public works programs and specifically extension of the accelerated public works program with a $2 billion federal appropriation.

Khrushchev's Egypt Tour Seen Worsening Tension

The AFL-CIO has charged that Premier Khrushchev's tour of Egypt "has deliberately sought to whet Nasser's appetite for aggression against Israel and encourage his maneuvers for dominating the entire Arab world."

The federation's Executive Council unanimously adopted a statement calling on the U.S. government to oppose aggression against any country in the Middle East, to pursue policies to prevent such action and to make new efforts to encourage and assist Middle East nations to develop their natural resources to help improve living standards.

The council noted "with dismay" the "hate-breeding tour" by the Soviet premier which, it said, has not only "disturbed the situation in the Middle East" but has aggravated international tension. The council charged that the Soviet leader promised Nasser additional shipments of "the most modern Soviet weapons of war and gave him the green light to do what he wants in the Middle East."

It noted that Khrushchev had denounced "our country's peaceful and humane role in the Middle East" as "aircraft carrier diplomacy," language "more abusive" than he has used in many months.

Still at 5.4 Percent:

April Job Gains Fail to Cut High Unemployment Rate

By Robert B. Cooney

Job gains in manufacturing and trade highlighted the employment picture in April, the Labor Dept. has reported, but the improvement made no real dent in the unemployment problem.

The number of workers on non-farm payrolls rose by 497,000 to a total of 57.9 million, according to the detailed job report. Normal seasonal patterns call for a rise of about 300,000, the report noted.

Earlier, the summary job figures—based on census surveys of households—showed that unemployment declined by nearly 400,000, as expected seasonally to a total of 3.9 million in April. The job gains thus were not to drop the key seasonally adjusted jobless rate below 5.4 percent, where it has hung for three straight months.

In a separate report, the Federal Reserve Board said industrial production scored its sharpest gain in almost a year in April. The record auto output and increased output in steel and machinery led gains which boosted the industrial production index by a full point to 129.2.

The Labor Dept. also issued its April survey of 150 major job centers and reported that Lorain-Elyria, O., had been removed from the list of areas suffering substantial unemployment. This reduced to 39 the number of areas with 6 percent or more jobless; a year ago this group totaled 47.

Other Areas Improve

The report said Lorain-Elyria dropped below 6 percent jobless due to sizable recalls in the area's iron and steel industry as well as pickups in trailer production and shipbuilding. Four other areas improved into the 1.5 to 3 percent category: Jacksonville, Fla., Saginaw, Mich., and Charlotte and Greensboro-High Point, N. C.

Both Labor Dept. and FRB officials viewed the employment and production gains so far recorded in 1964 with caution. The job gain is about 700,000, with some 160,000 of it in the factory sector, sizable but not impressively larger than in the same period last year, they noted.

In both of the past two years, these officials cautioned, the strong gains of the first half of the year were not sustained through the second half.

On the detailed job report for April, the Labor Dept. had this to say:

- "The pickup in factory employment was accounted for by a better-than-seasonal performance in all five major metals and metal-using industries, including electrical equipment, which had been declining since mid-1963.
- "On a seasonally-adjusted basis the primary metals group has shown steady job gains in recent months and by April was back to the comparatively high employment levels registered in June and July of 1963.
- "Reflecting continued strength in the auto industry employment increases in transportation equipment have amounted to 50,000 since January.
- "Manufacturing industries have reported seasonally adjusted employment gains totaling 165,000 over the past 3 months—135,000 in the metals sector.

"Employment in trade," the report continued, "rose between March and April, although there is usually a sharp decline after Easter and was 100,000 higher than in February, on a seasonally adjusted basis. Job developments in transportation, finance and services were about in line with normal seasonal patterns. Employment increases in contract construction were smaller than the usual spring gains; however, the total job gain since December has been about 50,000 greater than seasonal."

The factory workweek, the report said, remained at 40.4 hours in April. Overtime also was unchanged at 2.8 hours in April.

Hourly earnings of factory production workers edged up by 1 cent to $2.52, the report added. Average weekly earnings rose to $101.81, up 41 cents over the month and $4.45 higher than a year ago.

New Pension Talks Sought by URW

Akron, O.—The Rubber Workers have served notices of contract termination on three major firms in an effort to negotiate improved pension and insurance agreements covering 40,000 workers. Termination date is July 10.

URW Pres. George Burdon suggested that the negotiations, recessed since May 1, be resumed June 26 in Cleveland.

The union will open pension and insurance talks for 24,500 U. S. Rubber Co. workers June 2 in New York City, and for 12,000 B. F. Goodrich Co. employes June 9 in Cincinnati. The URW has asked "substantial improvements" in pension terms, severance pay, life insurance, hospital and surgical insurance, and sickness and accident benefits.

Meany Appoints Panel In Judy Bond Dispute

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has appointed a three-man subcommittee of the Executive Council to investigate the activities of the United Garment Workers in a dispute involving the union and the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Federation Vice Presidents George M. Harrison, Paul L. Phillips and Paul Hall were named to look into the dispute and report back to the council. The request for an investigation by the ILGWU stems from the case involving the Judy Bond Co., a runaway blouse manufacturing firm previously under contract with the Ladies' Garment Workers, that signed an agreement with the UGW.

The council had earlier found that the ILGWU had "justification" in attempting to organize the Judy Bond workers despite the UGW contract without violating the AFL-CIO Internal Disputes Plan.

The council also received notification that a 1959 merger agreement between the United Papermakers & Paperworkers and the American Wire Weavers Protective Association was being terminated by mutual agreement. The Wire Weavers will resume its status as a national affiliate of the AFL-CIO.

Another AFL-CIO affiliate, the National Association of Master Mechanics & Foremen of U.S. Naval Shore Establishments, informed the council that it must regretfully withdraw from the federation because under the presidential executive order on labor-management relationships for government workers, members of the association fall into the management category.

Educational TV Support Urged on Trade Unions

Unions can ensure the development of education television to its greatest potential by becoming involved "in the early planning and in the continuing policy structure," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The council urged unions to follow the example of "many local and state labor bodies [that] have been quick to take advantage of educational television in their areas."

It also urged congressional elimination of the excise tax on new television sets equipped for all-channel reception as a spur to sales of sets capable of receiving educational TV programs. Congress last year adopted legislation requiring manufacturers of TV sets to equip them to receive both VHF (very high frequency) and UHF (ultra high frequency) programs. Educational TV for the most part uses UHF channels.

Noting that the AFL-CIO supported both the all-channel legislation and federal funds to assist in the development of educational TV, the council said the "most significant use" is in the areas of adult education and community service.

"Educational television is a medium which can help create better understanding of current social and economic problems, greater awareness of the demands of citizenship in our time, and deeper appreciation of the arts and of our cultural heritage."

Commercial television, the statement said, "has often done a commendable job in programming educational material, public service features and material of social importance." But, the council said, "such programs are a secondary concern of commercial television."

The AFL-CIO, the council added, feels it would be "a serious mistake" to regard educational TV "as a substitute for a teacher, or for use only in schools." It can be no more than a "supplemental tool for good teachers in adequate supply," the council said.

AFL-CIO Region XIV Moves Headquarters

Chicago—The office of AFL-CIO Region XIV here has been moved to Room 1025, 608 South Dearborn Street, Chicago 69695, Reg. Dir. Daniel J. Healy has announced. The new telephone number is HArrison 7-5908.

● Approved creation of a three-man subcommittee to investigate activities of the United Garment Workers in a dispute involving the union and the Ladies' Garment Workers. (Story page 2.)

● Named two council members—Vice Presidents Joseph A. Beirne and Al J. Hayes—to confer with Meany on proposals to be presented by the AFL-CIO to the platform committees of the Democratic and Republican national conventions.

● Approved $5,000 toward a fund to create a Harry S Truman chair in American history at Westminster College, Fulton, Mo., where Winston Churchill made his famed iron curtain speech. It voted also a $5,000 contribution to the Southern Regional Labor Council and $1,000 to the National Child Labor Committee.

● Set the next council meeting for Aug. 3 in Chicago.

● Announced a meeting of the AFL-CIO General Board Sept. 1 in Washington to consider endorsement of presidential candidates.

Meany named a two-man liaison committee to work with the group setting up the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts—Vice Presidents Richard F. Walsh and Herman D. Kenin.

The council held a special luncheon for three foreign labor leaders and heard reports from them during council sessions on the situations in their countries. The three were Pres. Ludwig Rosenberg of the West German Trade Union Federation; Bruno Storti, general secretary of the Italian Confederation of Labor Unions and Pres. Tran quoc Buu of the Vietnamese Conferation of Christian Labor.

Ludwig Rosenberg of the German Trade Union Federation (DGB) is at the left. On the other side of Meany are Gen. Sec. Bruno Storti of the Italian Confederation of Labor Unions (CISL) and Pres. Tran quoc Buu of the Vietnamese Confederation of Christian Labor (CVTC).

Council Calls on Western Allies To Maintain Strength, Vigilance

Neither the Communist world's troubles nor the "tactical changes" they have forced on Moscow should serve as an excuse for the West to relax its vigilance or reduce its strength, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in a statement on foreign affairs adopted at its meeting in Washington.

"We dare not tire in the struggle to prevent a Communist takeover of the world," the council declared. "The hour calls for greater unity and strength of the Atlantic Community (NATO) to promote freedom, social justice and lasting peace."

The unity and strength of NATO have provided, over the past 15 years, the world's "most effective deterrent" to aggression and war, the council noted. To this deterrent power, in recent months, have been added "serious economic difficulties" for the Soviet Union and the Chinese threat to its domination of world communism. The result, the council said in its statement, which is entitled "No Time to Let Our Guard Down," has been that the USSR has made no major move to aggravate international tension.

"Its ardor for aggressive policies has been particularly dampened by the failure of its Cuban missile adventure," the council said.

"It is these difficulties, rather than any renunciation of its aspirations to Communist world domination or abandonment of Communist ideology as an instrument of its foreign policy that have led the Soviet government to mark time."

The effort to relax relations with the West is, for the Communists, merely another means to the same end, the council declared, adding that Moscow and its followers in the world of the Reds "have not become artisans of peace and partisans of democracy."

Basic Goals Unchanged

"They continue to adhere firmly to the fundamental aims of communism — totalitarian dictatorship and world conquest," the council charged. "The Soviet rulers continue to oppose the reduction of armaments through effective international inspections. They continue to garrison captive countries in the heart of Europe, maintain the shameful wall in Berlin and deny the German people and the captive nations the right of self-determination. Overtly and covertly, the Kremlin continues to instigate and support wars of so-called liberation in Asia, Africa and Latin America and hate campaigns against our country as 'the gendarme of imperialist reaction.' "

Even while Russia seeks U. S. aid, the council declared, it is spending more than $1 million a day to keep Fidel Castro in power in Cuba and is financing and training Castro agents for subversion in Latin America, spreading hatred of the U. S. and sabotaging the Alliance for Progress program.

In spite of gestures the Soviet Union has made, Premier Khrushchev "stubbornly persists in all the old Soviet positions which are at the root of the cold war," the AFL-CIO officers asserted. Though "less abusive," he seeks to spread "illusions, confusion and division" among western democracies, the council said. His aim, it continued, is "to lull them into a false sense of security" so he can get the economic assistance the USSR "so urgently needs." It added:

A Call for Help

"Khrushchev wants the West to help him satisfy the consumer needs of the Soviet people while he continues to build up the Russian arsenal of missiles and nuclear weapons. He wants the free world to do for his dictatorship what the Communist system cannot do."

The council rejected as a "monstrous myth" the notion that the U.S. and its allies can promote world peace and freedom by helping Communist dictatorships "overcome the severe hardships and difficulties which their policies and practices have brought about."

It recalled that the U.S. gave more than $1 billion of aid to Communist Yugoslavia when it was threatened by the Soviet Union, but the nation did not "evolve into a democracy."

"Expanded western trade and the extension of long-term credits to the Communist regimes will not help them 'evolve towards democracy' or remove the sources of world tension," the council maintained.

"On the contrary, such help by the U.S. and Western Europe might well help the Communist regimes to emerge from their present difficulties strengthened for the next round of offensive actions against the free world. This would only aggravate the cold war."

The economic and political difficulties plaguing world communism, the council claimed, "provide a propitious moment" for the Allies "to initiate diplomatic, economic and political moves to eliminate the causes of world tension and to promote just and lasting peace."

"Their statesmen should insist that the Soviet and other Communist regimes stop their efforts to subvert democratic institutions and governments," the AFL-CIO statement said.

It called on Russia to end its opposition to self-determination in Germany, the Soviet satellites and annexed lands; to destroy the Berlin wall, to halt its support of guerrillas in Viet Nam and of Pathet Lao military forays in Laos, to cease encouragement of "terror and bloodshed" in Cyprus and the Middle East, to agree to international inspection of disarmament pacts and "stop sapping the authority of the United Nations."

"Such moves on their part," the council said, "would constitute vital contributions toward a world free from the perils of war and would entitle them to prompt and adequate aid from the U.S. and western Europe."

Voluntary Settlements Mark Internal Disputes

Mediation continued to play a key role in resolving complaints brought under the AFL-CIO Internal Disputes Plan, with voluntary settlements achieved in 61 percent of the cases handled in the over 28 months since the plant went into effect.

This was the highlight of a report by Pres. George Meany to the AFL-CIO Executive Council on the operation of the disputes plan set up in the federation's constitution at the 1961 convention.

Meany announced also that the council had noted the recent action of the Canadian Labor Congress in setting up a disputes plan in Canada similar to the AFL-CIO plan and voted to notify the CLC that the federation will no longer process internal disputes cases involving Canadian unions. These cases will, in the future, be handled through the CLC machinery.

From Jan. 1, 1962, to May 15, 1964, there were 300 complaints or claims filed for "justification" for action that would otherwise violate Article XXI, with 168 resolved through mediation. Twenty-eight cases are still in the mediation process.

A panel of impartial umpires has made determinations in 91 cases and turned in seven fact-finding reports. Of the 91 determinations, violations of Article XXI were found in 67 cases.

The Executive Council subcommittee created to hear appeals from the impartial umpires' determinations has received 30 cases and denied appeals in 25. One appeal was withdrawn, one was referred to the council and three are pending.

Of the 16 complaints of non-compliance with the determinations of the impartial umpires received by the subcommittee, compliance was achieved in 10 cases, non-compliance found in five and one case is pending.

Three unions found in non-compliance are now under sanctions required by Article XXI—the Journeymen Stonecutters (two cases), National Maritime Union (two cases) and the Air Line Pilots Association.

$1 Million Paid Screen Actors In '63 Benefits

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Actors Guild-Producers Welfare Plan paid a total of $1,016,577 to actors and their dependents during 1963, Chairman Dana Andrews of the board of trustees announced. Extra players received $209,327.

The disbursements raised to more than $3.3 million the amount paid out in life insurance, hospital and medical benefits in the first three years of the plan's operation.

Coverage afforded by the plan reached an all-time high in the last quarter of 1963 with 8,475 actors and 1,818 extras eligible. With spouses and children, more than 29,361 persons enjoyed protection.

The fund is financed entirely by the employers. Their contributions during 1963 amounted to $1,908,537 for actors and $168,027 for extra players.

Butchers Local Wins 2 Raises in 3 Months

Topeka, Kan.—Two pay raises within 90 days were won by Meat Cutters Local 576 here in a new contract that will bring wage scales to the Kansas City level on Aug. 2.

The new agreement, which covers both chain and independent retail food stores, spelled out a $5 weekly raise retroactive to Feb. 2, with additional gains on Aug. 2 ranging from $2.16 to $3.75 a week. Management also agreed to install the union's health and welfare program effective May 1, 1965, and a pension program effective July 1, 1965.

TWO MOBILE UNITS, fully equipped, were presented to the National Travelers Aid Association on behalf of the American labor movement at a ceremony on the circular drive in front of AFL-CIO headquarters. Pres. George Meany (left) turned over the keys to NTAA Pres. Paul L. Mullaney and Mrs. Savilla Millis Simons, NTAA general director. The units will enable the NTAA to expand from its traditional booths at airports and rail and bus stations, and will be put in service on the roads of New Jersey and California to assist travelers with problems.

'Paramount Task':

Brazil Urged to Give Full Rights to Unions

A "paramount task" of the new Castelo Branco administration in Brazil is to free the trade union movement of government domination imposed by the ousted Communist-oriented Goulart regime, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

"We strongly urge that no time be lost in making Brazilian labor completely free of government domination," the resolution said.

". . . The rights of the working people must be unequivocally recognized. Organized labor must have the right to participate fully in the nation's program for social and economic development."

The Executive Council aligned the AFL-CIO with the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) and the international trade secretariats "in pledging all-out effort and resources to help revitalize the Brazilian democratic labor movement and assure its progress on the path of freedom and independence as a truly representative organization of the interests of the workers."

At the same time the council noted the Branco administration's pledges to enact urgently needed social reforms, and specifically cited land reform. It pledged AFL-CIO support and collaboration to the free trade unions of Brazil in assisting the government to carry out "the long-overdue labor and social" changes.

In reviewing the recent civil-military revolution that swept Goulart out of office, the council described it as a demonstration of the people's determination "to end the grave threat to their constitution and the democratic processes."

"The Communists and the corrupt elements in the former government . . . were systematically exploiting the rapidly deteriorating economic situation," the council asserted.

"They were maneuvering deliberately to create an atmosphere of utter political chaos which would culminate in a putsch and the suppression of all forces opposed to them. In such a situation the Communists would control the legislative branch of the government through its executives and then rule by decree. This would . . . lay the foundation for a totalitarian regime."

Emphasizing that "the Goulart labor law had made the trade unions subservient to the government," the Executive Council pointed out that the General Workers Commando (CGT), "Goulart's de facto, extra-legal arm," was to play a prominent role in the projected putsch.

"Goulart's deliberate efforts to lend the CGT the prestige of his office was strictly opportunistic," the council charged.

It said that the CGT was financed by the National Confederation of Industrial Workers and the outlawed Communist Party of Brazil, "which provided its orientation." The government's domination of the trade union movement, it added, "weakened labor and made its organizations vulnerable to Communist penetration."

Reforms Essential

The Executive Council noted that the social reforms planned by the Branco government "are an absolute prerequisite for a healthy foundation for sound economic development in line with the spirit and aims of the Alliance for Progress."

It also welcomed the Branco regime's break with Castro Cuba as "another indication of its devotion to democracy" and its determination to push labor and social reforms, "while at the same time respecting the dignity of man."

Teenage Paper Boys Organize After Firings

Reading, Pa.—Labor leaders here are seeking how best to help a group of teenage boys who did what ought to be natural when they had a dispute with their employer—they asked the AFL-CIO for aid in forming a union.

The youngsters are newsboys who distribute the Reading Times and the Reading Eagle, dailies with a common publisher. Their leader is Ronald Haan, 17-year-old Reading High School junior whose discharge as a "little merchant" precipitated the growing protest movement.

Brothers Fired

Members of the Haan family had been serving the newspapers for 14 years until Ronald was fired last month. His brothers—Nolan, 15, and Kenneth, 13—were terminated at the same time. Reasons for the family-sized ouster were not given, but it appeared to grow out of Ronald's protests against practices in the papers' circulation department.

Ronald had learned about unions in schools, so he wrote AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany:

"Will you please send me some advice on how I can REALLY get this thing going?"

Meany's office got in touch with AFL-CIO Reg. Dir. Henry A. McFarland in Philadelphia, who sent AFL-CIO Rep. Ben Stahl to Reading. Young Haan, meantime, had sought aid from Reading trade unionists.

Through Sec.-Treas. Edward Haas of the Reading & Berks County AFL-CIO, he obtained use of the Labor Temple for a meeting attended not only by newsboys but by many of their parents and by executive board members of the local AFL-CIO and the Reading Building & Construction Trades Council.

The meeting served as an outlet for the boys' grievances against the publisher. Here were some of their questions:

Why do Philadelphia newsboys get one-third more per paper than those in Reading? Why do the boys have to post a minimum deposit of $70, with the employer collecting most of the interest? Why aren't newsboys insured against robbery instead of being held personnally responsible for loss of collections, as one boy was recently?

If newsboys are "independent businessmen," as the company claims, why can a portion of their routes be taken away from them after they had worked to build it up? And why should there be an automatic fine of 6 cents every time a subscriber complains?

Half the meeting leaped to its feet when Ronald asked for five or six boys to volunteer to serve as a continuing committee. They ended up by drawing lots democratically to see who would prepare demands and present them to the papers.

300 Sign Up

Meantime, like true union members, they've taken their case to the rest of the boys by appearing around the circulation department with signs bearing such messages as "Printers and Truckers Had to Organize to Get Better Treatment —You Can To" (there wasn't enough room for the second "o") and "Join the Newsboys Organization Now!" About 300 boys have signed up with the group.

The local labor movement is prepared to go a long way to help a group of boys who lean to collective bargaining to settle their grievances. The Young Men's Christian Association is interested in them, too, and will be represented at another meeting scheduled for the Labor Temple—along with parents and union officials.

Young Haan has intended to major in science and mathematics when he goes to college. Lately, however, his fellow-newsboys have been wondering if a different future might not be in store for him, for they greet him with cries of "Here comes our union leader!"

U.S. Labor Practices Described to Britons

Hull, Eng.—John C. Mitchell, a member of the Fair Employment Practices Committee of Auto Workers Local 1097, Rochester, N. Y., is lecturing on American labor practices to unions in the Hull area under the auspices of Hull University's Adult Education Division.

Mrs. Mitchell, a Democratic member of the board of supervisors in Rochester, is giving a series of talks on race relations in the U.S. to student and faculty groups.

UAW Slates Two Industry Conferences

Detroit — Conditions affecting 100,000 farm implement workers and 75,000 foundry workers in the U.S. and Canada will be discussed by delegates at separate industry conferences called by the Auto Workers.

Chicago Session Held

The first of a series of collective bargaining conferences in the farm implement field was called May 21 in Chicago for negotiators and bargaining committeemen of UAW corporation councils, and local unions due to bargain with the industry this year.

Delegates represented UAW production, maintenance, clerical and technical workers. The union's bargaining policies were to be implemented at separate later meetings of delegates from Harvester, Allis-Chalmers, Massey Ferguson, John Deere, Caterpillar and other companies, said UAW Vice Pres. Pat Greathouse.

Four UAW foundry subconferences will meet June 5-7 at Windsor to coordinate the union's health, safety and local union political action efforts in 1964.

Nelson Jack Edwards, director of the UAW foundry department, said conference delegates will "come to grips with the increasingly formidable health and safety problems" facing foundry workers whose working conditions "continually expose them to illnesses."

Edwards declared that many health hazards cannot be solved at the bargaining table. Needed is government action in the form of new and improved workmen's compensation benefits, and more realistic health and safety regulations, he said.

Central Body Cites 2 For Community Services

Columbus, O.—The fifth annual George Meany Award has been presented by the Community Services Committee of the Columbus & Franklin County AFL-CIO to Walter English.

The award, for devotion to the advancement of human welfare through the labor movement, was presented at the annual dinner of the local CSC. At the same time, the committee's Community Service Award was presented to Orville C. Jones.

Housing Bill 'Urgency' Stressed to Congress

The need for enactment of the Administration's housing and community development bill "grows daily more urgent," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in a statement calling for "prompt action" by Congress.

Passage of the program, urged by Pres. Johnson in a special message last January, "would serve the humanitarian purpose of providing decent homes for Americans and employment for workers," the council said. It would also serve "the good business purpose of improving the American economy."

The labor-endorsed legislation would expand the public housing program through both new construction and rehabilitation of older apartments purchased from private owners. It would also make additional housing available for the elderly and launch a new program of federal assistance in the planned development of suburban communities.

In House and Senate testimony, the AFL-CIO has expressed strong support for the program and urged its expansion.

The council statement noted that the present urban renewal program "is rapidly approaching the limit of its authorization" with a backlog being built up "which cannot be processed until the new bill is passed."

Communities undertaking slum clearance programs "need assurance that federal assistance will be available when needed," the council said, and added:

"We have, at one and the same time, millions of slum homes—both in urban and rural communities—; intolerably high levels of unemployment; tremendous unused productivity capacity and an ever-expanding rate of productivity.

"We can solve many of these problems if we spur our entire construction industry by providing federal programs for housing and community development. In turn, this would spur all of the industries producing and transporting building materials and the economy as a whole."

GM Auto Plant Set for Canada

Montreal, Que.—General Motors of Canada will begin construction immediately of an auto plant in suburban Ste. Therese, E. H. Walker, GM president, and Quebec Premier Jean Lesage announced jointly.

About 1,000 workers will have jobs when the new plant goes into production late in the summer of 1965, with employment expected to rise to 2,500 as output climbs toward its estimated peak of 100,000 vehicles a year.

No Rights Question Involved:

Meany Sees Possible Pattern In N. Y. Plumbers' Settlement

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany suggested that an agreement resolving a dispute over the hiring of non-union plumbers and charges of racial discrimination could provide a possible pattern for solution of similar problems in the future.

He declared at a news conference during the federation's Executive Council meeting that acceptance by Plumbers Local 2 of a settlement proposed by New York Mayor Robert F. Wagner eliminated any question that civil rights were involved in the two-week dispute.

Members of the local had walked off a city construction job when the contractor hired four non-union men—three Puerto Ricans and a Negro.

Main points of the settlement included:

- Agreement by the city that its Human Rights Commission and other city agencies will refer future applicants claiming to be qualified plumbers to the local having jurisdiction. These applications would be processed under the local's normal procedures.
- Agreement by the local that all such membership applications will be processed without regard to race, color or creed.
- Agreement by the city that none of its agencies will in the future encourage contractors to violate their collective bargaining agreements with local unions.

"This is a fair procedure," Meany said at his news conference, "and certainly a procedure I would recommend that all locals go along with" in such cases.

For the immediate settlement, Local 2 agreed in addition to give its standard qualifying examination to the four men at once, with impartial observers present, and to admit them to membership and qualify them for work if they passed, waiving other induction requirements.

Picketing by Demonstrators

The case arose when 41 Local 2 members walked off a Bronx construction site after the hiring of the non-union men. Charges were made that white union members were refusing to work with Negroes and Puerto Ricans, and civil rights demonstrators began picketing the work site and the local's offices.

Local 2 denied that any question of racial discrimination was involved and noted that its membership had included Negroes for many years. It insisted that straight trade union matters were at the heart of the dispute and that the hiring procedures set forth in its collective bargaining agreement had been violated.

The settlement was worked out in talks involving Wagner, Meany and the local union. The Congress of Racial Equality then removed the pickets and the union plumbers returned to work.

The four men at first refused to take the examinations, charging through their attorneys that testing by the local was a violation of the Taft-Hartley Act's prohibition against closed shop agreements.

They subsequently changed their minds and three of them took the written part of the test and failed. The fourth, a Puerto Rican, was unable to take the examination at the time.

Spanish speaking interpreters were present during the testing, and observers included a city plumbing inspector and representatives of the Human Rights Commission, CORE and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

An NAACP spokesman later expressed satisfaction that the test had been fair, but said the men had difficulty "translating the ability in their hands onto paper."

The men will be given another opportunity to take the examination in 90 days. Meantime, the NAACP indicated it will help them brush up on their technical knowledge through a training course.

Meany, who came into the labor movement as a member of Local 2 and still holds his card, recalled that he himself had failed the practical part of the qualifying examination when he first took it in 1915.

That occurred, he noted, when his father was president of the local and had appointed the examining board. He added that he passed the test six months later after gaining further experience.

Meany charged that the Human Rights Commission had kicked off the dispute by "deliberately" recruiting the four job applicants and forcing the contractor, the Astrove Plumbing & Heating Corp., to hire them.

He said the commission had been guilty of "coercion and duress" in threatening to force cancellation of Astrove's $1.4 million contract for work on the Bronx Terminal Market project unless the firm hired the men.

Asked about the charge that union supervision of the qualifying tests amounted to a closed shop, Meany observed that the law makes it illegal to have a closed shop agreement in a contract, but "there's absolutely nothing that compels people to work anywhere on any job at any time with people who are non-union."

He noted that Local 2 does not use a hiring hall or a job referral system, but does pass on the qualifications of its own members. If the charge that this procedure is illegal proves correct, he said, "it would upset the industrial relations picture from one end of the country to the other."

Contract Explained

A statement issued by Local 2 explained that its collective bargaining contract requires the employer to give hiring preference "to qualified and competent men based upon their length of employment in the geographical area of the union," the boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx.

At the time the four men were hired, the local said, it had 200 members seeking work in the area, and its opposition to the hiring would have been the same no matter what the race or nationality of the non-union men.

"We are proud of our union and its record," the statement continued. "It does not and never has discriminated against anyone because of race, creed, color or national origin. It has been our policy through the years to admit qualified applicants without regard to these factors."

It noted that more than 20 Negro journeymen are active members of the local and two are retired. Three Negroes currently are undergoing apprenticeships, one of whom was sponsored by another Negro member, it said.

Screening Agreement

The local also declared it has a policy of active cooperation with the biracial referral committee set up by labor and management in the city's construction industry last year to screen Negro and Puerto Rican workers who apply for journeyman or apprenticeship status in any craft.

The committee referred nine journeyman applicants to the local, three of whom have answered the union's inquiries into their past experience, the statement said. One of these already has passed his written examination and the others are in various stages of processing.

Four of five youths referred for apprenticeships were scheduled to be inducted this month along with four other non-white apprentices who came in through other avenues, the local said.

Wagner, in a statement, acknowledged that weeks prior to the Bronx market dispute, he had been aware that Local 2 was preparing to induct the eight non-white apprentices.

STRATEGY AND TACTICS of the civil rights movement were explained by Norman Hill, program director of CORE, at the annual joint meeting in Cleveland of labor educators from the trade unions and the universities. At left are Robert Repass of the labor education program at Michigan State University and AFL-CIO Education Dir. Lawrence Rogin; at right, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman.

Senate Pressed to End Filibuster on Rights Bill

bill, Dirksen enumerated the controversial ideas that have ultimately triumphed—the civil service merit system, women's suffrage, pure food and drug laws, the ban on child labor and the eight-hour day—because "the time of the idea had come." He then added:

"Civil rights—here is an idea whose time has come."

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.), Democratic floor leader for the bill, observed that some Republicans, who support the presidential aspirations of Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.), want the cloture vote held up until after the California primary. Goldwater is opposed to cloture and Humphrey told newsmen he "surmised" that "if Goldwater Republicans were to sign a cloture petition it might be construed as withdrawal of support from Goldwater."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council statement stressed that labor's position on the bill "is abundantly clear. We believe that the Civil Rights Act of 1964, in substantially the form by which it passed the House of Representatives, must be enacted."

Negroes, said the council, "have been waiting a full century for the Emancipation Proclamation to be translated into equal citizenship" and 10 years "for the educational opportunity the Supreme Court then decreed."

They have shown "patient faith," the AFL-CIO said, adding: "Their patience—and more—is exhausted."

The Executive Council reminded the Senate that "there are many other measures dammed up by the civil rights obstructionists, which must also be enacted. They, too, bear upon civil rights; for they have to do with the prosperity of the nation, with the war against poverty—the war which must be won before equal opportunity can be achieved."

An "awesome responsibility" rests on the Senate, the council said, "which transcends small minds and petty politics."

A majority of both parties realizes this, the Executive Council declared, adding:

"It is up to them to stop the talking. The Senate must vote, and it must vote now."

IAM, Seafarers Name Scholarship Winners

Eleven children of members of the Machinists and one member of the union have been awarded four-year college scholarships, IAM Pres. A. J. Hayes has announced. The Seafarers also announced names of five scholarship winners.

Each IAM award pays $1,000 a year for the full four years and may be used at any accredited college. The winners were chosen by a committee of educators from among 1,477 applicants in all parts of the country. Sons and daughters of IAM members and members themselves under 35 years of age are eligible.

One scholarship went to Allan Lahr, 32, who belongs to Lodge 68 in San Francisco and works as a machinist at the American Can Co. He has been attending the City College of San Francisco for the past two years with the help of his working wife, and hopes to become a mechanical engineer.

Other winners were Frances Allegra, East Boston, Mass.; Paula Boland, Donahue, Ia.; Autumn Coffman, East Stroudsburg, Pa.; John James, Houston, Tex.; Marylin Jensen, Fresno, Calif.; Mary Mulvihill, Rochester, N. Y.; Mary Parrott, Covington, Ky.; Stuart Rubinstein, Portland, Me.; James Rugowski, Manitowoc, Wis.; Margaret Simmons, Richland, Wash., and Susan Teale, Calgary, Alta.

The SIU awards—all going to the children of members—were four-year scholarships worth a total of $6,000 each. The victors were chosen on the basis of their scholastic records, extra-curricular activities and scores in standard College Entrance Examination Board tests, and were picked by a committee of educators from among SIU members and children of members.

One of the winners was Timothy Mosseau, 18, Alpena, Mich., who suffered the loss of his lower legs in a train accident in 1959.

Others were Lawrence Carleton, St. Clair, Mich.; Bruce Carroll, Jersey City, N. J.; Christine M. Kalke, Detroit, and Elaine M. Smith, Metairie, La.

Low-Interest Loans Sought for Alaskans

The Small Business Administration was urged by the AFL-CIO to make disaster loans to Alaska businessmen at the same interest rate as loans to foreign countries under the foreign aid program—three-fourths of 1 percent.

The AFL-CIO request came in a statement adopted by the federation's Executive Council calling for all possible government action to aid in the "early restoration of economic life in Alaska," badly impaired by the recent earthquake.

In addition to the $23.5 million appropriation recently approved by Congress, the council said "we look for constructive legislative recommendations to come from the Federal Reconstruction & Development Planning Commission for Alaska headed by Sen. Clinton Anderson of New Mexico."

Loans to Alaskan businessmen at the lowest possible rates by the Small Business Administration is essential, the council declared, adding:

"It is inconceivable to us that overseas loans to foreign countries under the U.S. foreign aid program should be made at an interest rate lower than the interest rate charged to American victims of a natural disaster within the U.S."

The council pointed out that the SBA, under the Disaster Loan Act, can make loans at any interest up to 3 percent with any appropriate delayed repayment terms.

Pulp-Sulphite Workers Reach Coast Settlement

Vancouver, B. C.—The Pacific Coast Wage Conference of the Pulp-Sulphite Workers has reached agreement with the owners of pulp and paper mills on a new contract evaluated at between 16 and 17 cents an hour.

It provides for a 5 percent general wage increase; an additional 5 cents for qualified mechanics, who constitute 20 percent of the work force; 2 cents on the night differential; funeral and jury duty pay; job analysis for revised jobs, and a millwrights' apprenticeship training program. The old base rate was $2.18 an hour.

Cloture – Now!

THE SENATE of the United States today [May 18] began its 58th day of debate on the civil rights bill.

We say to the Senate of the United States: Stop talking, start voting.

The Senate prides itself on being "the greatest deliberative body in the world." But by now every meaningful point has been made; every objection, whether as to principle or procedure, has been aired at length. Now the Senate is disgracing the democratic practice of deliberation.

The position of the AFL-CIO is abundantly clear. We believe that the Civil Rights Act of 1964, in substantially the form by which it passed the House of Representatives, must be enacted into law.

We believe the filibuster must be broken by cloture—cloture that limits debate on the bill and every pending amendment. We specifically oppose the concept of cloture on every title—a device which would only provide America with another 1,000 hours of meaningless talk.

NEGRO AMERICANS have been waiting a full century for the Emancipation Proclamation to be translated into equal citizenship. They have been waiting 10 years—since May 17, 1954—for the equal educational opportunity the Supreme Court then decreed. Their patient faith in the ultimate triumph of justice will illuminate the annals of American society for as long as mankind survives. Their patience—and ours—is exhausted.

Therefore, the Executive Council of the AFL-CIO calls upon the Senate to shun crippling compromise; to reject weakening and delaying amendments; to invoke cloture and to pass the bill now.

We remind the Senate that there are many other measures dammed up by the civil rights obstructionists, which must also be enacted. They, too, bear upon civil rights; for they have to do with prosperity of the nation, with the war against poverty—the war which must be won before equal opportunity can be achieved.

An awesome responsibility rests upon the Senate; one which it cannot avoid; one which transcends small minds and petty politics. The majority in the Senate—from both parties—understands and appreciates this fact. It is up to them to stop the talking.

The Senate must vote; and it must vote now, if this beloved country is to remain true to its heritage.

The Time Has Come

Lack of Balance Cited:

Economic Danger Signals Seen As Buying Power Trails Output

The following is excerpted from the statement on the national economy adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on May 19, 1964 at its meeting in Washington:

UNEMPLOYMENT has remained about 5.5 percent of the labor force in the last five months, despite the continuing expansion of economic activities and booming profits. In the face of rapid increases in both productivity and the labor force, the rise of sales and production has not been great enough to create the employment opportunities needed to reduce joblessness. Moreover, the anticipated expansion during the rest of this year under the impetus of the tax cut is not expected to reduce unemployment appreciably.

Automation is continuing to spread—reducing manpower requirements in many white collar occupations, as well as in production and maintenance types of employment. And the labor force is growing rapidly, with the influx of young people seeking their first jobs. The persistent high level of unemployment remains America's number one problem in 1964.

For the third consecutive year, however, after-tax corporate profits are continuing to rise twice as fast as the gross national product. In the first quarter of 1964, corporate profits, after taxes, were running about 42 percent above 1961. But annual labor income was only 16 percent greater than the 1961 level. Despite the obvious volatility of profits, these trends underscore the existence of a distinct and dangerous lack of balance in the economy.

Industry's productive capacity, which increased 4 percent last year, is expected to expand 5 percent in 1964 and by a similar amount next year. Who will buy the goods and services this growing, automated capacity can produce, if workers' buying power continues to lag?

Consumer markets, which account for about 70 percent of total national production, must expand along with the economy's growing ability to produce more goods and services more efficiently. Failure to maintain such balance results in unemployment, with roller-coaster ups and downs of business activities, unless weakness in consumer markets is offset by increased federal budget deficits. If the buying power of the workers' wages continues to lag behind the nation's rising productivity it will be increasingly difficult to wipe out the plague of high unemployment.

Lack of balance in the economy has been growing for many years. In the decade 1953-1963 the corporate cash-flow—after-tax profits plus depreciation allowances—rose 90 percent. In contrast, total personal income after taxes increased only 60 percent.

In the last five years, the cash-flow of non-financial corporations, after payment of rising dividends to stockholders, was nearly $9 billion greater than their investments in new plants and machines. The corporations are loaded with cash.

Part of these excess corporate funds have been invested in western Europe, contributing to the balance of payments deficit and often resulting in the export of American jobs. Another part of this hoarded cash has been used for stock manipulations, corporate mergers and retirement of outstanding stock. Last year, manufacturing and mining corporations retired more than twice as much outstanding stock as they issued in new stock.

HOWEVER, workers' buying has lagged behind the nation's rapidly rising productivity since the mid-1950s. Between 1956 and 1963, the real volume of production per manhour rose 24.4 percent in the total private economy—a yearly rate of 3.2 percent. But the buying power of all employes in the private economy per hour worked, including fringe benefits, increased only 17.1 percent—2.3 percent a year.

Obviously some major groups have fared even worse. In the last seven years, the buying power of the hourly earnings of factory workers rose a mere 11.8 percent; bituminous coal miners, only 3 percent; workers in wholesale trade, 12.4 percent and retail trade, 13.9 percent—none as much as 2 percent a year. Even after adding the real value of improvements in non-payroll fringe benefits, such as pensions, it is evident that a great and growing gap has been developing between the buying power of workers and the rapid rise of national productivity.

The American economy cannot reach healthy expansion and full employment with a top-heavy load of booming profits, soaring dividends and capital gains, while workers' buying power lags. Such unbalanced trends in the 1920s eroded the foundation of the economy and brought about the Great Depression of the 1930s. Balance is required between the economy's ability to produce and its ability to sell the rising output of increasingly automated industries.

Morgan Says:

What the Negro Wants Is IN—Now That the Door Is Unlocked

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

IF 10 YEARS AGO the President of the United States had issued an executive order commanding every federal agency to support and activate to the fullest degree the Supreme Court decision declaring segregated public schools unconstitutional, defiance of the law, the most thoughtful observers agree, would have been minimized and orderly progress encouraged if not assured.

Morgan

But no such order came and bigots and racists and demagogues moved into the vacuum and filled it with dissension which corroded our society with more acid of hate.

If after the presidential election of 1876, Democrat Samuel J. Tilden of New York had been declared the winner, as the facts now indicate he was, or if Republican Rutherford B. Hayes of Ohio had entered the White House on different terms than the deal which gave him the office by one electoral vote in the aftermath of the so-called "vote fraud scandal" of that disgraceful campaign, our history would have been vastly different.

For, as Harry Golden writes in his newest book, Mr. Kennedy and the Negroes, ". . . the North finally lost the Civil War because by this (Hayes) compromise the South won a free hand with its Negroes, which once again made us two countries."

And, in the iffiest but most tantalizing hindsight of all, if after Appomattox in 1865 thoughtful men of good will from both North and South could have met and agreed on a version of the history of the Civil War that was neither vindictive nor emasculated but candidly stated the basic facts, there might well have been no civil rights issue for reverse carpetbaggers like Alabama's Gov. Wallace or a handful of misguided Negro extremists to make irresponsible capital of today.

For the schoolbooks on both sides of the Mason-Dixon line have been teaching parochially prejudiced accounts of the war for a century and the Negroes in the spacious "separate but equal" status hardly got any education worthy of the name.

But the hard fact is that those hindsighted possibilities are bygones that never were and perhaps could not have been, given the characteristics of the key people involved and the ingredients of the circumstances surrounding them.

The harder fact is that 10 years after the benchmark Supreme Court decision on civil rights, the Negro is no longer content to rely on the white man and the white man's judgment on the tempo and the turn of his efforts to nail down the civil liberties without which he cannot enjoy his constitutional rights.

Encouraged by but impatient with the progress of the last decade, the Negro is waging the social revolution for first-class citizenship himself. This is the great central development of these 10 years.

A letter reached my desk from a Negro college student in Los Angeles who described himself as a "militant young black" who rejects the "strong but invalid attempt to 'keep me in my place.' . . .

"A REVOLUTION is at hand," he wrote; "a people are no longer asking but demanding their rights . . . The point is not (that) the majority has to like us . . . The point is freedom now for equal opportunities, educational and economic."

The mail brought another letter from a white native of New Orleans who now lives in Wichita, Kan. He said he was nervous, confused and sincerely concerned.

"We are told that it is up to each and every citizen to solve this problem," he wrote. "But what should we do?"

Neither passing laws nor demonstrations, he thinks, got to the basic problem of how to change the feelings in people's hearts.

"How do we bring this about? We can pray, as many have done, for divine guidance. We can try to persuade those who hate or who are indifferent. But is there something else?"

Perhaps there is: a deeper understanding of what the Negro wants. It is not your sister. It is not your worldly wealth or your home. He wants an end to what might be called U.S. domestic colonialism and he wants, paradoxically enough, that which is his by his birthright as an American citizen and which the rest of us do not have the power to give—his rights as provided by the constitution.

That is, basically, all. There may be, indeed there have been, excesses on the part of individuals and groups in reaching for these rights. But for every excessive act or demand on the part of Negro citizens there is an overwhelming pattern of cruelty and provocation on the part of extremists who would deny them their citizenship. This is not an excuse for wanton, irresponsible acts in impatient reprisal, but it would be well to remember this unbalanced set of facts when somebody asks again, "What will the Negro want next?"

What he wants is what most of us already have. This has led Golden to observe that the Negro is a unique revolutionary. He does not want to overturn existing American institutions. What he wants is in. There is a thought to dwell on 10 years after the Supreme Court unlocked the door.

Washington Reports:

Poverty's Cost to U. S. Greater Than Its Cure, Shriver Says

SARGENT SHRIVER, director of the President's task force in the anti-poverty program, warned that "the most expensive thing we can do is to do nothing" about the poor, because "the number of persons who are potential members of the poverty group is increasing." He talked about the Administration program on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations—more stations than those transmitting any other U.S. radio program.

Shriver pointed out that "public welfare payments have increased over the last five years at three times the rate of national productivity." The 9 million on assistance, he said "are a drag, like a weight on the back of the American economy."

"Every person we can take off the negative side, every person we can make productive who has been unproductive, makes it just that much easier for the whole economy to progress. We turn a person who is a consumer only into one who is a better consumer, one who is productive, who pays taxes instead of costing them—a full-fledged citizen in our economic life."

Shriver said first concentration in the Administration program is on youth, because "to save a person who is 16, 17 or 18 is to take that person out of poverty for the rest of his life."

A PROPOSED job corps, he said, is planned for these young persons "to make the illiterate literate, to make the unhealthy healthful, to teach skills, to show young people the importance of punctuality and reliability in holding a job."

"Some would be given part-time work," Shriver continued, "to prepare for holding a job or advancing within a certain type of employment, or to give them enough money and incentive to go back to high school or even to college.

"We also plan to have a special program for those who are now in college, but who would otherwise have to leave for financial reasons. We propose to give them part-time work so they can pay their own way. We hope to reach about 400,000 young men and women with these programs."

Shriver emphasized that the anti-poverty program must be based on an expanding economy.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

SEN. GOLDWATER COMPLAINS BITTERLY that a "stop-Goldwater" drive has started against him in California, and of course the Rockefeller-Lodge alliance is exactly that. The astonishing thing is that such a drive comes so late.

The Arizona senator's campaign has developed in this way: He has not won a single seriously contested primary but he has picked up very heavy delegate strength in southern state Republican conventions and in various other areas.

A Newsweek survey dated May 18 showed him with 370 certain first-ballot delegate votes, a likelihood of 222 more—that is, if he should win California's powerful 86-vote bloc in the June 2 primary.

This would give Goldwater 592 delegates as against only 97 for Rockefeller, 66 for Lodge, 60 for Pennsylvania's Gov. Scranton as a favorite son, 8 for former Vice Pres. Nixon. Goldwater would have needed only 63 more for the required 655 for nomination.

When he now bitterly charges a "gang-up" against him in California, he must also acknowledge that such delegate strength has been in no way sustained by his record with the voters.

His was the only name, among the serious candidates, on the Illinois ballot, yet the unofficial count gave him only 51 percent of the GOP voters against heavy write-ins for Lodge and others. And the official count showed he got only 47 percent. He ran poorly by any standards in New Hampshire and Indiana.

He is suffering now principally because of Oregon, where in the May 15 primary Gov. Rockefeller was first, Lodge was second, the Arizona senator a bad third. The California polls promptly reflected a shift showing that Rockefeller, not Goldwater, was gaining. If pro-Lodge voters in California move heavily to Rockefeller on June 2, the New York governor will win the state's 86 delegates—and Goldwater will look more like a "stopped" candidate than a first-ballot winner.

THE DISMAL PRESIDENTIAL "CANDIDACY" of Alabama's Gov. George C. Wallace ended its northern phase in Maryland, where the segregationist champion claimed an enormous moral victory in gaining 43 percent of the Democratic primary vote. It was the highest proportion he attracted in the three primaries he entered, including Indiana and Wisconsin.

But the so-called "white backlash" against the civil rights bill that Wallace tried to stir up and ride was non-evident in congressional races.

Maryland's seven members of the House seeking re-election—two Republicans and five Democrats—all voted for passage of the rights bill and all were renominated, without trouble. A right-wing Republican, assailing the rights bill, was smashed down in the heavily populated 6th District by incumbent Rep. Charles McC. Mathias, Jr., who voted for the bill; the two leading Democratic candidates running for nomination in the same district were both for it.

The "loser" in Maryland's primary, to some extent, appeared to be the state Democratic organization, which backed State Comptroller Louis L. Goldstein for a U.S. Senate nomination as well as backing Brewster as "stand-in" presidential candidate for Pres. Johnson against Wallace.

Gov. Millard Tawes' state administration had just raised taxes, and Tydings made this an issue. He beat Goldstein for the senatorial nomination by an enormous 277,000-152,000 margin, though Goldstein tried to disclaim responsibility for the tax boost. In all three non-southern states where Wallace ran, in fact, Democratic governors opposing him had just hiked taxes—though this may not have affected the presidential vote in Maryland.

No doubt Maryland like other states has many people who resent Negro demonstrations and represent a "white backlash" element. No doubt the new Tawes state public accommodations law provoked some votes for Wallace. But the evidence is clear that the Alabama governor's forays into northern states have changed no prospective votes on the rights bill in the Senate, will have no effect on the rights platform planks the major political parties adopt this summer.

SARGENT SHRIVER (left), director of the President's task force on the anti-poverty program, said the millions with insufficient income in this nation "are like a weight on the back of the American economy." Every person we can make productive "helps make the whole economy go forward more rapidly," he said. Shriver was interviewed on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People, by Harry W. Flannery (right).

How to Buy:

Cheap Health Insurance Plans Often Provide Scant Protection

By Sidney Margolius

RISING COSTS of hospital and medical care are leading moderate-income families—young as well as older people—to buy seemingly cheap health policies which actually provide little worthwhile insurance.

Deceptive practices of some insurance sellers were spotlighted by hospital administrators in recent hearings by the Senate Subcommittee on Frauds Affecting the Elderly. The deceivers sometimes use names similar to those of reputable companies; they advertise heavily, urging you to "Protect Yourself;" often they use the mails to invade states in which they are not licensed; sometimes they avoid paying any benefits at all, and when they do, the benefits often are pitifully inadequate.

Jack Owen, director of the New Jersey Hospital Association, told about one man who was hospitalized and told the admitting desk he had insurance in a large insurance company for complete hospitalization, and had paid the premiums for the past two years.

He thought he had insurance with the well-known Equitable Life Assurance Society of the U.S., but scrutiny of the policy revealed it was with a smaller company which also had the word "Equitable" in its name. It turned out that it was not a complete hospitalization policy, but limited payments to $15 a week. The patient's hospital bill came to $603, of which the insurance company paid exactly $27.

In another case, a patient had been paying $124 a year in premiums to a small company for what was claimed to be complete hospitalization insurance. When he had to be hospitalized, the insurance company was contacted but refused to respond either to the hospital or the patient. The patient's family finally paid the hospital bill without ever hearing from the insurance carrier.

Another hospital filed a claim in November 1963 on behalf of a patient. The claim still has not been acknowledged. Letters to the company have been returned and phone calls have gone unanswered although premiums still can be paid to the address.

Owen said such deceptive policies hit not only older people but younger ones; that in general it is lower-income people anxious for health protection who get caught by the insurance deceivers.

The hospitals are concerned because often patients believe the hospital is collecting from the insurance company and trying to collect from them, too, for the same bill.

"When an unscrupulous agent tells a prospective client he will have full hospitalization and then only pays $10 or $15, the patient doesn't understand why he received an additional bill," Owen said.

His group of hospitals has been having trouble with three companies in New Jersey, one in Michigan, one in Massachusetts, one in New York, another in Delaware. Others have been reported by other agencies, and Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N. J.), chairman of the subcommittee, reported receiving complaints from people who are sometimes "hopelessly confused" about policies. Often these policies have failed them when they most needed hospital or medical insurance, Williams noted.

ESPECIALLY revealing is the FTC's comment that while this company is licensed to do business in 20 states, as the result of its mail solicitation it has policyholders in many others. Consequently, the misrepresentations are not regulated by state law in states where the company is not licensed.

Several other mail sellers recently active in promoting seemingly cheap policies are domiciled in Missouri, Nebraska and Illinois.

But if seemingly cheap insurance sold by some of the mail-order and other fringe companies is so limited as to be almost useless, the more adequate policies offered older people by reputable companies are so costly as to be virtually financially impossible for the average retired person. Latest in the Senior 65 plans, (a pooled effort by major insurance companies), is "Western 65." Sacramento, (Calif.) City Councilman Richard H. Marriott, who also is a labor editor, reported that California unions have been disturbed about the way this plan has been represented.

This plan, which is the insurance industry's answer to demands for some degree of hospital insurance under Social Security, shows the impossibility of such plans for most oldsters. Its "comprehensive" medical and hospital policy costs $23 a month, or $46 for a couple. In comparison, half the older familes have incomes of under $2,600 a year. Thus, this policy would take about 22 percent of the total income of these senior citizens and they still would have to pay out of their pockets for dental and eye care, minor illnesses and that portion of their major illnesses not included in the 80 percent coverage of the policy.

Depending on which policy is selected, Western 65 pays up to $20 or $25 a day for up to 31 days for hospital care. In comparison, actual hospital charges in major California cities are about $32 a day for semi-private care. Hospital "extras" for serious illnesses often are much higher than the $200 allowed.

In general, the pooled "65" plans have been found to cost about $100 a year less for combined hospital-medical coverage than individual policies, but usually more for the same benefits than Blue Cross-Blue Shield.

A leading hospital administrator advised us that if you want prepayment, Blue Cross is still hard to beat despite recent rate rises. A major reason for the increases is that Blue Cross plans are covering more and more "extras."

From Soup to Nonsense:

Things Never Really Clear Up In Spite of Life's Little Lessons

By Jane Goodsell

LESSONS I've learned from life:

That everything from showing a baby to getting a rug back from the cleaner takes longer than I expect.

That Never-Fail Seven Minute Frosting can, too, fail.

That the teacher whom my 8-year-old describes as "a real old lady" will turn out to be several years my junior.

That firms which guarantee to refund your money gladly if you are not fully satisfied have a very strange way of behaving gladly.

That my children and my best friends' children will never be good friends.

That the toy submarine which appears to be three feet long in the picture on the cereal box will, when it arrives in the mail, prove to be the size of a razor blade.

That people never answer questions you ask them in a letter.

That yanking the end of your shoelace in hope that the knot will come untangled is a gamble that never works.

That it is easier to get into situations than it is to get out of them.

THAT SHOE STORES which announce "Sensational Savings in All Sizes and All Colors" don't have any blue kid pumps in my size.

That it is much kinder to whisper behind people's backs than to tell them to their faces.

That children never know any other kids who get better grades and smaller allowances than they do.

That mail marked "Personal" is almost as dull as the mail that arrives postage-due.

THIS WAS TYPICAL SCENE in Detroit schools as 9,600 teachers voted exclusive bargaining rights to the Detroit Teachers Local, casting 5,738 for the union, 3,848 for the Detroit Education Association. Left to right, at Goldberg elementary school, Teachers Doris Jefferies, Otis Stechishin, Tommy E. Flowers, Merle B. Peltier and Ella R. Cooke line up to vote, with Principal Maurice Lax and two observers watching—Evelyn L. Green of the union and Frances Moylan of the association.

For Safe, Effective Use:

FDA Booklet Tells Facts About Drugs

MEDICINES—what to do and what not to do with them—are the subject of a new publication issued by the Food & Drug Administration.

The booklet, "First Facts About Drugs," was written in response to many requests for basic information on drugs. FDA said its purpose is to provide the kind of knowledge needed for the safe and effective use of today's drugs, knowledge which most people acquire only through long experience.

The publication answers questions frequently asked about prescription drugs, over-the-counter drugs, "dope," barbituates, amphetamines ("pep pills" or "bennies"), and controls for drug safety. It includes "true or false" questions and a bibliography to add to its usefulness in the classroom.

"The story of modern drugs reads like a tale of magic, but it is all true," the booklet says. "An amazing improvement in health in the United States has been seen since 1900. Much of this progress can be attributed to modern drugs and improvements in medical practice.

"THE LIFE expectancy of the average person has been pushed upwards from 47 years in 1900 to 70 years today. More than 4 million Americans are alive today who would have died had the mortality rate remained the same as it was even in 1937."

Drugs, the new booklet advises, are powerful friends, but they can be misused. It advises on proper purchase, use and storage.

Following are some facts and warnings contained in the booklet:

Your body is a chemical factory. It manufactures powerful drugs such as hormones and enzymes. These regulate body processes, stimulate growth and aid digestion. Introducing other drugs into this chemical factory is a complex business which can have serious consequences.

A prescription is as personal as your name. It is designed for one individual alone and is based on his age, weight, condition of health and other factors, as well as the illness being treated.

Never take a prescription written for another person even if you think you have the same disease. Prescriptions weren't meant to be traded over the back fence or passed around the family.

Any drug may be poisonous if misused. Even aspirin causes about 100 deaths every year, mostly of small children. But many drugs are safe and effective for most people if used according to directions on the label.

Use over-the-counter drugs only for minor ailments that last a little while only. The pill-taker who prescribes for himself for a continuing illness could be suffering from a serious disease.

Read carefully and follow the label on every drug. Keep all medicines out of the reach of children, under lock and key if necessary. Never take a "pep" pill before an examination, a big game or driving.

"First Facts About Drugs" also speaks out against cosmetics that go overboard on promises and formulas which promise a slim, trim figure without dieting. "To reduce, you must consume fewer calories than you use up in daily living. It's as simple as that. Crash diets can break down your health."

Copies of the booklet may be obtained from the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D. C., at 15 cents each. A discount of 25 percent is available for purchases of 100 copies or more.

Revamped Structure Urged:

Federal Reserve Money Policy Held Threat to Job Expansion

The need for changes in the Federal Reserve System is underscored by reports that the "Fed" is considering a tighter money policy at a time when the tax cut and other government programs are geared at stimulating economic growth and cutting into persistently high unemployment.

That theme is developed in an article in the May issue of the AFL-CIO monthly magazine, the American Federationist, which declares that after "10 years of a rising trend of joblessness . . . the nation needs a positive, growth-generating money policy, not a fight against an imaginary 'inflation' which can slow down the economy and create a recession."

The article, "Gearing Money Policy to Economic Growth," appears as an Economic Trends feature of the Federationist, prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

It notes that Federal Reserve Board Chairman William McChesney Martin raised the prospect of tighter credit and higher interest rates to combat "inflation" even as Congress was winding up debate on the $11.5 billion tax cut designed to speed economic expansion.

The Federationist asserts that the FRB's fears of possible inflation have outweighted its fear of actual unemployment and have served to restrict the economy since 1953. It suggests that in 1957, for example, the recession was heightened by tighter money, which the Fed did not ease until March 1958, seven months after the recession started. And when the Fed tightened money in 1959—before the nation had completely recovered from the 1957-58 recession—it contributed to the causes of the 1960-61 slump, the analysis declares.

The "open market" operations of the reserve system could alone wipe out the economic push of the tax cut, it states, if the FRB follows the policy expounded by Chairman Martin—a policy of financing the federal deficit from the real "savings of the community" rather than through purchases of government securities by banking institutions and the Federal Open Market Committee.

The comment of one economist is cited that if through such a policy there is no increase in the money supply, "the government expenditure multiplier may be zero or negative." The tax cut, in other words, would give no push at all to the economy.

There is no sign on the horizon of inflation arising from shortages, the analysis continues.

"U. S. manpower and factory capacity in 1964, as in the recent past, are ample. Unemployment is the major domestic problem, not labor shortages. Failure to reach our productive potential, not pressure on plant capacity, is the problem of America's industrial system. America is short of jobs, not short of workers."

The conflicts between the government's economic policies and the money policies of its central banking system can be resolved only through changes that will assure coordination and make evident the public character of the Fed, the analysis declared. It urges:

- Setting the terms of the chairman and the vice chairman of the Federal Reserve Board of Governors to coincide with the term of the President who appoints them and thus "formalize some degree of basic harmony."
- Revision of the seven-member board to include representatives of various economic groups, including labor and consumers, and an end to domination of the Fed "by bankers, big businessmen and monetary technicians."
- Revision of the governing structure of the 12 Federal Reserve Banks and the Federal Advisory Council to provide the same broad representation.
- Abolition of the Federal Open Market Committee, made up of the seven board members and five of the 12 presidents of regional Federal Reserve Banks, and assignment to the board itself of its responsibilities in the areas of open market policies, rediscount rates and reserve requirements.
- Establishment of formal relationships between the Fed and other government agencies to assure coordination and end conflicting policies.
- Application of the provisions of the Employment Act of 1946 to the Fed as well as to the rest of government to carry out the purposes of the Act to "use all practicable means . . . to promote maximum employment, production and purchasing power."

"The Federal Reserve System," the Federationist article concludes, "must be changed to make it a truly public system and a regular part of the U.S. government. . . ."

Court Voids Restriction On Naturalized Citizens

The Supreme Court, in a landmark decision affecting the rights of naturalized Americans, has struck down a federal law cancelling their citizenship if they live in their native countries for three consecutive years.

The vote ruling the statute unconstitutional was 5 to 3.

The majority opinion, written by Justice William O. Douglas, declared that the law, enacted in 1940, gives naturalized citizens "second-class" status instead of the equality they are entitled to.

"We start from the premise," Douglas wrote, "that the rights of citizenship of the native-born and of the naturalized person are of the same dignity and are coextensive. The only difference drawn by the Constitution is that only the 'natural-born' citizen is eligible to be President."

The decision also was viewed as making unenforceable another part of the 1940 law, depriving naturalized Americans of their citizenship if they live anywhere abroad—not only the country of birth—for five years.

The case developed from a challenge brought by Mrs. Angelika L. Schneider, who was born in Germany and brought to this country before she was 5. She was educated in New York schools and graduated from Smith college in 1954. Two years later she married a young German lawyer, Dieter Schneider, who was studying here, and moved with him to Cologne. Three years later the government informed her she had lost her citizenship.

The government argued before the high court that Congress had a right to cancel the citizenship of persons like Mrs. Schneider to avoid conflicts or entanglements with other nations.

This position was rejected by the five-man majority, which included, in addition to Douglas, Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justices Hugo L. Black, Potter Stewart and Arthur J. Goldberg. A dissent by Justice Tom C. Clark was joined by Justices John Marshall Harlan and Byron R. White. Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., did not participate in the case.

Douglas wrote that "living abroad, whether the citizen be naturalized or native-born, is no badge of lack of allegiance and in no way evidences a voluntary renunciation of nationality and allegiance. It may indeed by compelled by family, business or other legitimate reasons."

State Dept. officials said thousands of persons who have lost their citizenship in recent years under the law may re-establish themselves as Americans by applying for passports at U.S. consulates abroad. Where expatriated Americans have died leaving children, the children would have been Americans themselves except for the law, and now are entitled to citizenship.

Labor Disputes 'Facts' On Food Industry Costs

"An objective study of the food industry from the farmer to the consumer" is "urgently needed," the AFL-CIO declared in a letter to the House Agriculture Committee.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller expressed the federation's support for an Administration bill to create a National Commission on Food Marketing. At the same time, he criticized portions of a recent House committee report which listed higher wages as one reason for a growing gap between farm prices and the retail price of food.

"There are no facts to support this charge that wages have raised costs, nor could there be," Biemiller wrote Committee Chairman Harold D. Cooley (D-N. C.).

"While it is true that wages of workers in food processing and merchandising have risen from the substandard levels of 1947," Biemiller said, "worker productivity, output per manhour, has gone up faster. As a consequence, unit labor costs per item sold—the only legitimate basis of measurement of the impact of labor costs on prices—have actually gone down."

Biemiller reminded Cooley that the AFL-CIO "has long supported legislation to help provide a better income for farmers." He cited labor's support for the recently-enacted cotton-wheat bill as an "example of our continued willingness to help achieve this goal."

He expressed the hope that the proposed commission will objectively study "the question of labor income and productivity in the processing, distribution and selling of food products."

Both the House Agriculture Committee and the Senate Commerce Committee have approved legislation to set up the proposed commission, although the House bill would limit it to a fact-finding study while the Senate bill would provide for legislative recommendations by the commission.

The proposed bipartisan commission would be composed of five members of the House, five from the Senate, and five appointed by the President from outside the federal government.

Witnesses Charge Farm Labor Exploitation

Farm workers, the rural poor and their advocates in labor and social welfare organizations have charged that the government is not administering or enforcing farm labor laws fairly.

Witnesses testifying before public hearings sponsored by the National Advisory Committee on Farm Labor presented these cases:

- That the U.S. Labor Dept. and California state agencies have supplied growers with Mexican nationals, certifying a domestic "labor shortage" and no adverse effect despite the existence of 400,000 unemployed in California.
- That the U.S. government has depressed farm labor wages and contributed to rural poverty by bringing in 13,000 British West Indians for Florida growers and postponing a 95-cents an hour minimum wage until the harvest was over.
- That a Mississippi woman sharecropper, paid $174 last year as her "half" for 23 bales of cotton worth $3,500, has never received welfare assistance.

The NACFL hearings attracted some 200 delegates to consider ways to help farmworkers, migrants and others of the 15 million rural poor climb out of poverty.

A. Philip Randolph, president of the Sleeping Car Porters and co-chairman of NACFL, told the conference that the farm worker needs old protections as much as new anti-poverty programs.

"No war on poverty can hope to achieve victory," Randolph declared, "unless it includes a campaign to extend to farm workers protections against unemployment and exploitation.

"At present, workers in agriculture have none of the three basic economic rights enjoyed by the majority of industrial workers: minimum wage, protection of the right to organize and bargain collectively and unemployment compensation. Expanding civil rights can only take on full meaning for these 'excluded Americans' when they have achieved these economic rights."

Peace Corps Dir. Sargent Shriver, named by Pres. Johnson to head the proposed anti-poverty program, explained how that program can operate to create opportunities for farm and rural families.

Arnold Mayer, legislative representative of the Meat Cutters, described the Florida case in a prepared statement. He said grower and political pressures led to the postponement of the 95-cent hourly minimum which the Labor Dept. said would have to be offered Americans before West Indians could be imported. This left the wage level at about 70 cents, he said, and stands as a "tawdry story" of government-created poverty.

Mrs. Anne Draper, a West Coast staff member of the Clothing Workers, testified for the California Citizens for Farm Labor. She compared figures on the use of Mexican nationals in April with past Aprils as proof that state and federal officials are making no visible effort to "phase out" the Mexican import program due to expire in December.

Strike Time Shows Sharp Drop in March

Lost time due to work stoppages in 1964's first quarter was substantially lower than for the same period a year ago, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. Lost time totaled 10 hundredths of 1 percent in the 1964 quarter as against 15 hundredths of 1 percent the year before.

The BLS also reported that all measures of work stoppage activity in March declined from February.

Mass Transit Approved by Rules Panel

The long-stalled mass transit bill, carrying a strong endorsement from Pres. Johnson, moved out of the House Rules Committee where it had been held up for more than a year. The committee vote was 8-4.

A companion bill passed the Senate Apr. 4, 1963 by a 52-41 vote after it was amended to include job and bargaining safeguards sought by labor, and the House Banking & Currency Committee reported its own bill the following week. The House bill does not contain labor safeguards and an amendment to include this protection will be proposed when the bill reaches the floor.

The measure would provide federal grants and loan guarantees to help metropolitan areas cope with mounting transit problems.

Training Set For Migrants In Michigan

A Manpower Development & Training Act program to inculcate 150 former migrant farm workers in Lansing, Mich., with skills in 10 occupations reporting manpower shortages has been announced by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

The students will be selected from a pool of predominantly Negro and Mexican-American workers between the ages of 19 and 60 who have settled in the Lansing area in recent years. Ninety percent must be heads of families. They will be given intensive testing, guidance and counseling, and will receive initial training in language-literacy, arithmetic and cultural understanding before instruction in specific skills. Job fields for which they will be trained include auto mechanic helper, cook, landscape laborer, greenskeeper, groundskeeper, formal waitter, maintenance worker, farm equipment mechanic, welder and machine operator.

The program is sponsored by the Michigan Catholic Conference in cooperation with the Dept. of Labor and the Dept. of Health, Welfare & Education. Assisting will be the Michigan Employment Security Commission, Lansing Community College, Michigan State University, the Michigan Dept. of Public Instruction and a 13-member Citizens' Advisory Committee.

Studebaker Yields on Health Fund

South Bend, Ind.—The Studebaker Corp., facing court action in a dispute with the Auto Workers over health insurance payments for 7,000 laid-off workers, has paid $111,000 to the union-management health security fund, the UAW has announced.

The union said Studebaker sent it a letter dated May 11 threatening to cut off company payments unless the UAW agreed to modify the terms of an agreement reached last Oct. 30.

The union replied that it would take "appropriate legal action" unless Studebaker kept its agreement. Payment was made four days later, according to Dir. Ray Berndt of the UAW's Studebaker Dept., who said 7,000 workers and their families are covered by the health fund.

Berndt said more than half of Studebaker's 7,000 employes are still jobless, five months after the firm shut down most of its South Bend operations and transferred auto production to its Hamilton, Ont., plant.

NEW HEADQUARTERS of National Maritime Union, a block-long, six-story building in New York, was dedicated in the presence of 5,000 members and their families and nearly 1,000 labor, government, industry and community leaders. It is named in honor of Pres. Joseph N. Curran, shown at podium. Speakers included AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, on platform with Mayor Robert F. Wagner of New York and Pres. David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Oregon High Court Rejects 'R-T-W' Title

Salem, Ore.—The Oregon Supreme Court has barred the use of the phrase "right-to-work" on an initiative petition for a state constitutional amendment outlawing the union shop.

The court found "merit" in labor's contention that "right-to-work" is a "false . . . misleading . . . prejudicial" description of a proposed measure which "does not provide or guarantee any employment for anyone."

Its decision came as the anti-union drive, rebuffed by Oklahoma voters in a May 5 election, veered to the Pacific Northwest. Under Oregon law, sponsors have until July 2 to secure 46,000 valid signatures needed to gain a place on the Oregon ballot in November for the proposed amendment.

The court, after hearing arguments from attorneys for the State AFL-CIO, rewrote the ballot title drawn up by State Atty. Gen. Robert Y. Thornton (D). The initiative petitions being circulated, the court said, must describe the proposition as a "constitutional amendment prohibiting union security contracts." A joint council of the unaffiliated Teamsters joined in the appeal to the state court.

Although proposals to ban the union shop were twice petitioned to referendum in neighboring Washington—and twice rejected by the voters—the issue has never reached the ballot stage in Oregon.

Occasional efforts to move a "work" bill through the legislature have been defeated, including a "back door" attempt in 1961 to camouflage the proposal as an amendment to a civil rights bill. Union legislative watchdogs spotted the maneuver, civil rights groups denounced it, and it was killed in committee.

'Specialists' Seen Turning to Unions

Montreal, Que.—Specialists often considered as in "management ranks" are moving into organized labor as automation takes over their jobs, the Rev. Emile Bouvier, director of the University of Sherbrooke's Political Economy Dept., told the Canadian Industrial Trainers' Association at a meeting here.

"Within five years we will see the unionizing of engineers, scholars, lawyers and administrators who will organize to protect their job security," he predicted.

Some corporations are discharging executives as young as 50 to make way for computer methods of management analysis, thus creating what he called "disguised unemployment" and "creeping insecurity."

President Sends Salute:

New Headquarters Dedicated by NMU

New York—Strong unions and a strong merchant marine were the dominant themes as nearly 1,000 community leaders and officials of labor, government and industry joined with 5,000 members of the National Maritime Union and their families to dedicate the union's new national headquarters building here.

The dedication of the unusual block-long, six-story steel and concrete structure on Manhattan's Seventh Avenue, between 12th and 13th Streets, also marked the 27th anniversary of the seamen's union. The ceremonies featured a greeting from Pres. Johnson, recorded for the occasion, and addresses by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Maritime Administrator Nicholas P. Johnson and Rep. Herbert C. Bonner (D-N.C.), who is chairman of the House Merchant Marine & Fisheries Committee. NMU Pres. Joseph Curran presided.

"Your union has sailed in the vanguard of the long voyage toward equality," Pres. Johnson noted in his recorded message. "The NMU is made up of seamen of all races, creeds and national backgrounds and they all sail together. You have much to be grateful for today, much to be proud of and so has your country."

The President noted the importance of a strong American merchant marine and the labor standards achieved by maritime unions.

"The men who sail our vessels must have assurance of living and working conditions and security in keeping with the progress of our time," he declared. "We are a competitive nation. We welcome competition (but) we do not accept as a basis for competition a lowering of standards so long and so hard in coming."

Meany Voices 'Delight'

Meany expressed "surprise and delight" in the NMU building's "bold approach" and used the occasion to stress the importance to organized labor of maintaining control of its own resources and operations.

"This building, built with your funds, is a tribute to union leadership and responsibility," he said. "What this building symbolizes is an answer to the critic who says labor is standing still. This shows we keep pace with modern times. Keep it that way. Maintain ownership and control of your own building. Maintain control of your hiring halls."

The ceremonies took place in the union's hiring halls, which occupy the entire ground floor of the building. Two circular hiring halls convert into a single huge auditorium extending nearly a full city block, by raising an intersecting wall—actually the shipping board on which job vacancies are listed. Through the use of steel columns imbedded in concrete at the outer edges and 90-ton steel cross beams, it was possible to make this huge arena without a single obstructing column.

"We wanted a building that would both serve our needs and be a real contribution to the community," Curran said. "We think this building does that. We think it tells the world how far seamen have come and what we mean to the well-being of the community."

The NMU headquarters was designed by Albert C. Ledner, a student of Frank Lloyd Wright. It was named for Curran by vote of the NMU membership last year.

Union Error On Profit Voids Election

An inaccurate statement about company profits, made in a union handbill the day before a representation vote, has resulted in a National Labor Relations Board order setting aside an election won by the Steelworkers last Feb. 19 and ordering a new ballot.

The Halsey W. Taylor Co. in Warren, O., complained that the union distributed a leaflet asking "What is the financial status of the Halsey Taylor Co.?" and giving this answer:

"The company has sales amounting to $3 million annually. Stockholders in 1962 received a total of $2.35 million."

NLRB Reg. Dir. Philip Fusco investigated and reported that the union got information that sales were in excess of $3 million annually and that the firm's "net worth (stockholder's equity) totaled $2.35 million on Dec. 31, 1962." This information was "erroneously interpreted" or transcribed in the handbill, said Fusco, adding that stockholders in 1962 actually received dividends amounting to "less than 2 percent of the amount which the leaflet implies they received."

The "erroneous" information said Fusco, "exceeded the permissive bounds of propaganda."

In UAW Incentive Plan Case:

Board Upholds Union's Right To Make Own Time Studies

By Eugene A. Kelly

The right of a union to make its own time studies of jobs covered by an incentive wage plan has been upheld by the National Labor Relations Board.

The board in a 3-1 decision ruled that refusal of the Fafnir Bearing Co. to let an expert time-study man make on-the-spot observations for the Auto Workers in the firm's plant at New Britain, Conn., was a violation of its legal duty to bargain in good faith.

The decision was hailed as a landmark in labor-management relations and a ruling of major importance to many unions with contracts covering incentive wage plans.

Unions seeking to enforce contracts with such plans have found it difficult to process grievances over production standards unless they can make their own time studies, said Bertram Gottlieb of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, who appeared as an expert witness for the UAW in the Fafnir case. The Fafnir ruling now spells out union rights in this area, he said.

Management had 10 days to comply with the order or give notice of its intent to appeal to the courts. The order was signed by NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and members John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown. A dissenting opinion was filed by member Boyd Leedom, who agreed with the trial examiner that management was not obliged to do more than give the union its own time study data.

UAW Local 133 said it needed to make its own studies to determine whether it had grounds for arbitrating four grievances over standard production rates set by management.

Having failed to settle the disputes in the first two steps of a grievance procedure provided by the UAW's contract with Fafnir, officials representing both sides met Feb. 7, 1963 in the third and final step before arbitration, the NLRB decision related.

Kermit K. Mead, director of the UAW time-study and engineering department, obtained the firm's time-study reports and questioned Fafnir representatives. The company witnesses "answered to the best of their ability," the board majority said, but in one instance were "unable to account for a 5 percent 'adjustment factor' which appeared in one of the time studies."

In this situation, Mead said, he was unable to advise the union whether the rates set for certain jobs were in conformity with the contract and therefore could not advise the union whether to arbitrate, the NLRB noted. Mead asked permission to perform his own studies by observation on the job but management refused, insisting instead on arbitration of the grievances.

The NLRB majority said it is "well settled" that an employer must upon request furnish "all information relevant" to the union's "intelligent performance of its functions." This obligation extends to information needed by the union to "police and administer existing agreements." Of this the majority wrote:

"We find . . . that the information which the union sought to obtain by means of time studies was not only relevant but also necessary" to enable the union to "make an intelligent decision whether to proceed to arbitration."

It is clear, the board declared, that it was within management's power to make plant facilities available for the proposed union study. The majority, differentiating the case from an appellate court's decision, in a 1953 case involving the Otis Elevator Co., found the information could not have been obtained from UAW members at the plant.

Union representatives in the case included Gottlieb, Mead and Merlin D. Bishop, subregional UAW director at Hartford, Conn. The Fafnir firm makes ball bearings for auto, aircraft and farm implement firms, among others.

Gottlieb had reported in "Labor's Right to Technical Data," a Collective Bargaining Report feature of the AFL-CIO American Federationist for October 1963, that management use of engineering systems affects wages and working conditions and therefore every aspect of such systems is legally subject to collective bargaining.

Despite a scarcity of NLRB decisions and court rulings on the subject, unions have the same legal basis for making their own time studies as for making requests for company data, the study pointed out. Also it advised unions to negotiate contract language spelling out these rights.

70,000 Win Pay Hikes In 3 ILGWU Pacts

with 15 cents earmarked for wages and 11 cents for improvement of fringe benefits. All major timework crafts will receive a flat $5 a week pay hike, with piece workers getting a 5.5 percent increase. The second week of vacation will be financed by an additional employer contribution of 2 percent of payrolls to the union's health and welfare fund, with another 1 percent to pay for substantial improvements in health benefit coverage.

The wage reopening clause was revised to eliminate the requirement that the cost of living must rise by a minimum of 5 percent, measured by the Consumer Price Index of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics, before the union can initiate action.

The skirt and sportswear workers, most of them members of Local 23, will receive wage increases of 5 percent on June 1 and an additional 2.5 percent on June 1, 1966. The average wage in about 500 shops is now $2.30 an hour, according to ILGWU Vice Pres. Shelley Appleton, manager of the local.

Holiday pay was boosted from $13.50 to $14.50 for operators on better-quality lines, from $12 to $13 in the lower-grade lines, and from $16.50 to $18 for pressers.

Flat pay raises of $6 weekly were negotiated for some 500 cutters, markers and graders, and increases of 6 percent, with a $6 weekly top, for about 500 pressers.

Overtime bonus rates for all crafts were raised by 10 cents an hour to $1.20 in the quality lines and $1.05 in the lower grades.

Local 105's new contract calls for a 6 percent wage increase for piece workers and a flat hike of $3.50 weekly for time workers. Minimum rates for craftsmen were raised from $3.50 to $5.75 a week. The agreement covers the employes of some 300 jobbers, manufacturers and contractors who belong to several employer associations.

Government Aid Seen Vital to Survival of Arts

An urgent plea for House action on a Senate-passed bill to stimulate the growth and development of the performing arts was voiced by Pres. Herman Kenin of the Musicians as he warned a Labor subcommittee that the arts and artists cannot survive except in a few major cities without "the helping hand of government."

Pointing out that Pres. Eisenhower and the late Pres. Kennedy had both given strong endorsement to creation of a Federal Council on the Arts, Kenin called it an "overdue acknowledgment" of government responsibility to expand "conservation of national resources to include talented human resources."

The "shrinking work opportunities" of professional musicians have reduced them to a "sorry economic status," he said, making it impossible for them to survive alone "as prideful and necessary elements" of our society.

With a new social order now emerging, music and other performing arts offer a vital contribution to the climate and quality of a mature civilization, Kenin declared.

He pointed out that the AFL-CIO Executive Council had endorsed the Senate-passed legislation, which is sponsored in the House by Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.), chairman of the subcommittee handling the bill.

The bill, which now includes a "modest" authorization of funds, might well "provide the catalyst, the 'seed money,' that will be multiplied many times by states, counties, municipalities and patrons to make the arts an economic reality," he said.

But a Senate-passed bill in 1956 was tabled in the House Education & Labor Committee, he reminded the subcommittee, and a committee-approved version of the Thompson bill died on the House floor in 1962 "when the Rules Committee neglected to protect [it] with a rule limiting debate."

Kennedy created a Federal Council on the Arts by executive order and the presently pending bill, Kenin said, would provide it with specific statutory authority and "miniscule" funds.

"We have put government into this arts business simply because it is not a business. It is not now—and never can be—a commercial venture capable of sustaining itself any more than are our public school systems, our libraries and our museums," he quoted from earlier testimony.

A SUMMER JOB found last year through the AFL-CIO summer employment program is helping Jemima Laryea of Nigeria continue her education in the United States. A laboratory technician, she is shown here as Dr. Joseph Zausner examines an X-ray plate at the Health Center of Building Service Employes Local 32B in New York. This year more than 900 applications have been received from African students seeking summer work, and more are anticipated.

Summer Jobs Sought For African Students

AFL-CIO unions have been urged to step up summer employment of African students in the United States, many of whom face difficulties in paying for their education.

In a letter to affiliates, Federation Pres. George Meany noted that through its summer employment program, instituted in 1961, the AFL-CIO has succeeded in placing an average of 400 African students from 17 countries each year in summer jobs ranging from bus boy to laboratory technician, secretary and research assistant.

There are more than 6,000 Africans studying in the United States, however, and this year some 900 applications for summer work already have been received by Maida Springer of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs, who is in charge of the program.

"We urge all AFL-CIO internationals to support, generously, this program, which has won us new friends and increased our knowledge of their homelands," Meany's letter said.

He noted that summer jobs filled under the program in past years have "meant much more than timely help to appreciative students who are likely to play a vital role in the democratic and economic development of their respective countries."

He cited a report from Mrs. Springer following her attendance at the Kenya independence celebration last December that "former students from African countries now holding important posts as diplomats, industrial relations officers and teachers confirm that their experience with the trade unions in the United States broadened their understanding of the dignity of work and the civic responsibility of the labor movement."

Meany said that where unions would like to take part in the program but lack adequate funds, the AFL-CIO would consider underwriting part of the pay for students placed on their staffs.

Examples of what the program has accomplished in past years include the hiring or placement of 60 students by Local 99 of the Ladies' Garment Workers in such jobs as shipping and tabulating, employment of several students in organizing work by Local 144 of the Building Service Employes and the placement of others as nurses aides and in hotels, hiring or placement of 30 to 50 students in clerical and shipping jobs by Dist. 65 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, and employment of many students on international union staffs to fill in during vacation periods.

Information on the qualifications and availability of student applicants may be obtained from Mrs. Springer.

Gil Brunner Named IAM Vice President

Members of the Machinists by referendum vote have elected Gil Brunner of Lodge 1377, Waukesha, Wis., a vice president to fill out the unexpired term of the late Vice Pres. Jesse C. McGlon.

IAM Pres. A. J. Hayes, after installing Brunner at a ceremony in union headquarters in Washington, assigned him to the union's northeastern territory, with headquarters in New York.

Hayes also announced that Vice Pres. Matthew DeMore, who had held the New York post, was being shifted to international headquarters in Washington as resident vice president. Vice Pres. George Watkins, the previous resident vice president, has been assigned to the southern territory, which McGlon had served, with headquarters in Atlanta, Ga.

Brunner, who is 57, was born in South Milwaukee, Wis., and learned the machinist's trade at Waukesha Motors. He worked in different parts of the state, returned to Waukesha, and joined IAM Lodge 1377 in 1934, being obligated to membership by Hayes, then a young organizer. He held a series of local and district posts and became a grand lodge representative in 1941. In recent years he has been working largely as a troubleshooter in the Middle West.

In Labor Testimony:

Quick Action Urged On Federal Pay Hike

Quick congressional approval of "comparability" pay raises for federal employes was urged by the AFL-CIO and the federation's Government Employes Council in testimony before the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee.

Spokesman for the 700,000-member Government Employes Council was Letter Carriers Pres. Jerome J. Keating, who was joined at the witness table by officers of seven other affiliated unions. Keating also presented a letter from AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urging "early action" on the legislation.

Falling Further Behind

Rank-and-file government workers "are falling further behind the economic parade with every passing month," Keating told the committee. He called on Congress "to redeem the promise it made" in the 1962 Salary Reform Act, which declared that federal pay scales should be kept comparable with rates in private industry, based on annual salary reviews.

"It is a rare experience," Keating told the Senate panel, for federal employe unions to have "the active support of the President of the United States, the Bureau of the Budget, the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Dept." in seeking pay raise legislation.

Biemiller said the AFL-CIO supports the "basic provisions" of the salary bill which has been approved by the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee and cleared by the Rules Committee for an early vote.

He said the AFL-CIO favors "larger increases" in pay for federal executives, members of Congress and the judiciary than are contained in the House committee bill. Federation Pres. George Meany was a member of the Randall Commission which recommended a substantial increase in executive salaries, Biemiller noted.

He also urged the Senate to correct an "inadvertent omission" in the House bill by including the director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service in the group of key executives whose salaries would be boosted to the $29,000 level.

The House bill, providing raises averaging about 5 percent for 1.7 million government workers, is similar to the measure defeated in March in a controversy over pay raises for members of Congress. The revised bill would raise congressional and top executive salaries $7,500 instead of the $10,000 in the original bill, and defer the congressional raise until next January, when a new Congress takes office.

Keating reminded the committee, headed by Sen. Olin D. Johnston (D-S. C.), that the pay legislation, based on 1963 recommendations from the Administration "already is one year late."

Federal and postal employes, Keating said, "need this pay increase" and "by their performance, they have earned it."

Furniture Workers' Convention Endorses Continued Unity Talks

New York—Delegates to the Furniture Workers convention here endorsed continued merger negotiations with other unions in the industry and authorized UFWA officers to call a special convention to ratify merger proposals if an agreement can be reached.

The resolution, adopted without opposition, followed a report from Pres. Morris Pizer of "fruitful" informal discussions with the Upholsterers and increased cooperation between the two unions in bargaining and organizing.

Pizer, president of the 40,000-member union since 1948, and Fred Fulford, secretary-treasurer since 1950, were re-elected unanimously to new two-year terms.

Delegates approved, by close to a 2-1 margin, a 25-cent per capita increase, of which 10 cents is earmarked for the UFWA's district councils. The new monthly rate will be $1.35 for unions with a business agent and $1.60 for unions without a local staff.

Before acting on a broad-ranging legislative program, the convention heard national issues discussed by various speakers including AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Industrial Union Dept. Pres. Walter P. Reuther and COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan.

The convention voted a strong endorsement of Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson for the Democratic nomination and election to a full term, declaring that the nation needs "his steady, compassionate and resourceful leadership."

Johnson, the resolution said, "has placed the strength and high prestige of his office behind the historic struggle for equal rights" and "with unbounded energy, has set to work to diminish the corrosive and wearying poverty that daily haunts the lives of a fifth of all Americans."

Meany told the delegates that the "great, unfilled need" in the nation is for "full employment at good wages for all who are able and willing to work."

Labor is asking the 35-hour week, he stressed, to provide jobs for the unemployed and not because the 40-hour week is unduly burdensome. On the economy's ability to adjust to a shorter workweek, he pointed out that the arguments against a cut in hours today are the same used in every past reduction of the workweek —and proved groundless.

In other major addresses:

- Wirtz said the only answer to the problems of automation is "to find new jobs for the workers the machines displace; there isn't any other answer." The Secretary invited questions from delegates and took part in a lively, 30-minute exchange of views.
- Reuther told the convention that organizing the unorganized is only "half the job" of the trade union movement. Of "equal importance," he stressed, is the need "to unionize the organized."

It isn't enough, Reuther said, "to have a trade union card in your wallet—you have to have unionism in your heart and understand why you belong to a union."

- Barkan reported on the lessons of the recent Oklahoma "right-to-work" campaign, where a small labor movement did an effective job of political education and organization.

The key to the victory, in which Oklahoma voters rejected "right-to-work" in a statewide referendum, was the alliance forged by labor, Negro, farm and senior citizen groups, Barkan stressed.

Fulford presented Barkan with a $3,000 check, carrying the union over its quota in its COPE dollar drive campaign, and 40 UFWA locals received COPE awards.

Along with the two general officers, the convention unanimously re-elected three regional vice presidents, Michael DeCicco of New York, Sam Sloan of Chicago and Fred Stefan of San Francisco, and one newcomer to the executive committee, Carl Scarbrough, Memphis, Tenn.

Organizing Stressed At ACWA Convention

New York—The 50th anniversary convention of the Clothing Workers approved a program calling for stepped-up organization, education and legislative activity.

They also voted a 25-cent increase in the monthly per capita tax—from $1.25 to $1.50—to wipe out an operating deficit and finance the union's new and expanded programs, including union label and consumer education campaigns.

The union's two general officers, Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky and Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum, were nominated without opposition to start the union on its second half-century. The union's officers, nominated at conventions, are elected through a referendum.

Also nominated were 22 incumbent vice presidents, including Exec. Vice Pres. Hyman Blumberg, and 20 candidates for one vacancy on the board.

Veteran Officers

Potofsky, president of the union since the death of Sidney Hillman in 1946, has been an ACWA officer since 1916. Rosenblum has served on the union's executive board since its founding convention in 1914.

The convention, which opened at the New York World's Fair with major addresses by Pres. Johnson and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, heard other prominent public and union leaders during its five days of business sessions. The list included Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther, Exec. Dir. Whitney M. Young, Jr., of the National Urban League, and Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson, Pres. Johnson's special assistant for consumer affairs and a former legislative representative of the ACWA.

In major resolutions, the convention:

- Pledged "a constant campaign" to organize the union's jurisdiction.
- Hailed the work of the union's health centers and medical programs and recommended expansion to other areas.
- Voted stepped-up promotion of the union label.
- Adopted a broad-ranging legislative program including a shorter workweek, a higher minimum wage, civil rights and civil liberties legislation, enactment of social security health care for the aged, aid to education, congressional rules reforms and anti-poverty programs.
- Urged stricter control of apparel imports, and saw a need for "new guidelines to chart the search for peace."
- Stressed the importance of the 1964 elections and strongly urged every local and joint board to carry out register-and-vote drives.

Wirtz praised the ACWA for having contributed to the building of a free trade union movement "out of a potent blend of practical common sense and sturdy idealism."

He told the delegates that while "it is too often assumed that poverty results only from denial of work opportunity, the truth of the matter is that too much of it comes from cruelly low wages."

Reuther told the delegates that the nation's "basic problem" is that we know how to create abundance but haven't learned to "manage abundance by sharing it."

He warned that this "serious imbalance" was the cause of the depression of the 1930's.

California Primary Poll Puts Rockefeller Ahead

mary season — made controversial solely by hit-and-run raids of Alabama's segregationist Gov. George C. Wallace in three selected states —neared its end May 19 when Maryland Democrats handed Sen. Daniel B. Brewster, the state's "stand-in" for Pres. Johnson, a 265,713-to-211,123 victory over Wallace.

The Oregon election gave Rockefeller his first victory in a contested primary and instantly projected him as a potential winner in California, where only he and Goldwater are on the ballot and write-in votes for other candidates are not permitted.

In nearly complete unofficial returns, Rockefeller had 92,142 votes, Lodge was second with 77,334 and Goldwater ran third with 49,197—barely more than Nixon's 47,078. Counting 8,162 for Sen. Margaret Chase Smith and 4,456 for Pennsylvania's Gov. William W. Scranton.

Oregon was the only state in which the names of all six generally mentioned GOP candidates were printed on the primary ballot. Rockefeller, who was shown in advance polls as running second to Lodge, apparently benefited from a late surge of support. He got 33 percent of the Republican total; Goldwater about one-sixth.

Lodge managers in California promptly urged the ambassador's supporters to vote for Rockefeller in that primary, saying that Lodge could expect more "second-choice" support from the governor's prospective delegates than from Goldwater's. Goldwater, calling the Oregon results a victory for the "radical left," also charged a gang-up in California to "stop" him.

In Maryland, Brewster acknowledged that he had made a mistake in underrating the Wallace challenge until after both Wisconsin and Indiana primaries, but he carried the election with more than 53 percent of the vote against slightly less than 43 percent for Wallace, the balance going to two minor candidates. Wallace, as he had done earlier after Indiana and Wisconsin, claimed a "moral" victory. Brewster said, "We made the fight and we won."

Virginia County Ordered To Open Closed Schools

Engravers, ALA Meet On Merger

By Saul Miller

Minneapolis—The birth of a new graphic arts union—the 60,000-member Lithographers & Photoengravers Intl. Union—was nearing completion here amid hopes that it would pave the way for labor unity in the printing industry.

More than 300 delegates of the AFL-CIO Photo Engravers and of the Lithographers were involved in a section-by-section examination of a constitution to govern the merged organization. Approval of the detailed document, drafted by a 50-man committee equally representing both unions, was expected on May 29, after which it will be submitted to a referendum of the membership of both unions.

Before the delegates went into separate sessions on the constitution, they met jointly and heard a message from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, read by Federation Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, applauding "the statesmanship of your leaders and the wisdom of your rank and file" in setting up the merger.

Praising the sessions to unite "two proud and strong crafts into a single organization," Meany pointed out that the purpose of merger is clear:

"It is to do a better job for the men and women that you delegates are privileged to represent. It was for that purpose that the AFL and CIO united—to do a better job for the wage earners, to do a better job for working people, to do a better job for America."

Schnitzler told the joint session that while merger may not solve all the problems that the unions faced separately, the new organization will be able to deal more effectively with these problems. He predicted a "new era" of progress for the LPIU and a new, strong union capable of dealing with the problems facing the trade union movement—political action, unemployment, poverty, "right-to-work" laws and anti-union attitudes.

Hall, Brown Speak

IPEU Pres. William J. Hall and ALA Pres. Kenneth J. Brown spoke to the joint session against a backdrop of signs denoting the merger atmosphere, with Hall declaring that the historic sessions would set an example for other unions in the printing industry to follow in working out mergers, of creating more harmony among graphic arts unions and bringing about "one big happy family." The dramatic events of Minneapolis, he said, will be noted with "keen interest" in the trade union movement. He characterized the draft constitution as a "tremendous document" that would allow the new organization to function effectively.

State Labor Hails High Court Ruling

By David L. Perlman

The Supreme Court has ordered the reopening of public schools in Virginia's Prince Edward County and warned that the slow pace of school desegregation generally would no longer be accepted.

It directed "quick and effective" action to reopen the county's schools, abandoned five years ago to avoid compliance with court-ordered desegregation. If necessary, the Supreme Court said, a district court could frame an order directing county officials to levy taxes "to reopen, operate and maintain without racial discrimination a public school system . . . like that operated in other counties in Virginia."

The Virginia State AFL-CIO hailed the decision as a vindication of its strong stand for free and equal public education throughout the state.

Labor's only regret, State AFL-CIO Pres. Harold B. Boyd said, is that "there will be some children who never will have the opportunity to make up their five years of lost education."

Boyd said both the state and county should now make a special effort to improve, as well as keep open, the school system.

At each session of the legislature, Boyd said, the state labor federation has sought reopening of the schools and convention resolutions have called for enactment of statewide compulsory school laws and denounced closing of public schools for any purpose.

At last year's convention, delegates contributed funds to help pay the expenses of members of New York and Philadelphia locals of the Teachers who came to Prince Edward County to conduct special summer classes for the "locked-out" Negro children.

The Supreme Court's decision, written by Justice Hugo L. Black, was unanimous in holding that the school closing and county contribu-

Dividends Soar Above 1963 Rate

Cash dividend payments for the first four months of 1964 have risen almost 10 percent above the levels of 1963, the Commerce Dept. has reported, and both corporation profits and management executive salaries are booming.

The increase in cash dividends for the first four months of 1964 runs clear across the board, the Commerce Dept. said, with manufacturing and nonmanufacturing sectors of the economy contributing almost equally to the rise.

$5.3 Billion Paid

Total cash dividends paid by corporations issuing public reports rose to nearly $5.3 billion in the January-April 1964 period as against slightly more than $4.8 billion in the corresponding period last year.

The Dept. of Commerce also announced that corporation profits hit an alltime record high for the first quarter of this year both before and after taxes. The corporation profit figure is so impressive that earlier Budget Bureau estimates for the full year were described by the department

Congress Steps Up Pace:

Senate Sets Stage For Cloture Move

Congress quickened its legislative pace as Senate Democratic and Republican leaders set the stage for a civil rights showdown and three major Administration bills moved impressively ahead in the House.

In a first step towards an expected mid-June cloture vote, the Senate's bipartisan leadership joined in introducing a substitute bill incorporating modifications designed to win the two-thirds support necessary to choke off the southern filibuster, now in its third month.

The Senate has "now reached the point where there must be action," Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) declared as he introduced the leadership's modified civil rights package. Its co-sponsors are Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.), Democratic Whip Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.), and GOP Whip Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.).

In the House, meanwhile, there were these key developments:

- The Administration's anti-poverty bill—a presidential "must"—won solid Democratic support as it cleared the House Education & Labor Committee on a 19-12 party line vote.
- With strong bipartisan support, the House approved a five-year extension of the Hill-Burton Hospital Construction Act, carrying a $1.4 billion authorization. It includes for the first time money earmarked specifically for modernization of older hospitals, as well as new construction, although the amount is less than the Administration and the AFL-CIO had urged.
- The House Foreign Affairs Committee, in a striking demonstration of confidence in the President, for the first time in its history approved every dollar the Administration had requested for the foreign aid program. The $3.5 billion request, including an additional $125 million later added for South Vietnam had been described by the President as a "realistic" figure. The AFL-CIO had urged a higher amount during committee hearings.

Deleted from the bill was an Administration request for broad firing authority to oust employes without regard to civil service regulations. The AFL-CIO and affiliated unions representing federal employes had strongly protested this proposal.

In the House Education & Labor Committee, northern and southern

Senate Unit Approves Public Works Extension

The Senate Public Works Committee voted approval of a bill authorizing $1.5 billion in new funds to keep alive the accelerated public works program.

A subcommittee headed by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.) had previously voted to recommend the additional money, which would be provided under a bill sponsored by McNamara. The subcommittee held hearings last December and March.

A companion bill in the House, providing $900 million in new funds, was reported last year by the Public Works Committee, but it cleared by a narrow 16-15 majority and has remained stuck in the Rules Committee.

Under the Accelerated Public Works Act of 1962, the President was permitted to make grants to speed up construction of two categories of projects—federal projects previously authorized but not yet allocated specific appropriated money, and state and

Supreme Court Rejects Boycott Damage Award

The Supreme Court has reversed a federal court decision awarding $33,000 in compensatory and punitive damages against a union in an Ohio case of secondary boycott. It affirmed only a small part of the total damage award—for $1,600—which the court held was justified under the illegal boycott penalties of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The lower court had awarded the larger sum in damages under Ohio state common law, and its judgment was upheld by the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

The Supreme Court reversed the lower courts under the "preemption" doctrine, holding that Congress had clearly defined the types of secondary activity it wished to prohibit and clearly provided that an employer was entitled to recover only "actual compensatory damages" suffered in case of a violation in which there was merely peaceful persuasion and picketing.

The case involved the unaffiliated Teamsters Union and the Lester Morton Trucking Co. of Toledo. The high court upheld the $1,600 awarded the company on the basis of activity by the union to persuade employes of three other firms to force their employers to cease doing business with Morton.

In the case of another firm, however, the union was found to have FORMAL OPENING of the AFL-CIO Union Industries Show in Louisville shows AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler at the microphone with officers of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. and distinguished guests on the platform with him. The week-long show attracted, as usual, thousands of visitors lured by exhibits of union-made products and union services.

Johnson Hails Exhibit:

Union Label Show Seen by Thousands

Louisville, Ky.—The 19th annual Union Industries Show—the biggest trade union show on earth—thrilled thousands of visitors from the Kentucky-Indiana area who viewed the goods and services free labor and free management contribute to a better society.

Pres. Johnson, in a message read at the opening day ceremonies by Under Sec. of Labor John F. Hanning, called it "a clear demonstration of the success of the American free enterprise system."

AFL-CIO Sponsorship

The show, held May 22-27 in the massive new Kentucky Fair & Exposition Center here, was sponsored by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

The crowds saw 425 individual exhibits set up by the federation affiliates and private firms operating under trade union contracts. Visitors received some $80,000 in gifts, prizes and souvenirs.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, at the opening day ceremonies, pointed out that the Union Industries Show teaches a basic lesson of the American way of life in a colorful, dramatic and entertaining way.

"The exhibits in this auditorium," he said, "exemplify labor and management working together—working together to furnish high-quality goods and services at fair prices, working together to assure fair wages on one hand and reasonable profits on the other."

While there may be built-in disagreements between management and workers, Schnitzler said, they can be resolved as long as there is mutual respect and good faith on both sides.

There are undeniable benefits from union-made goods, the AFL-CIO official added.

Better Goods, Services

"We say that union label goods are quality goods," he said. "We base our whole case on that principle. True enough, we also say that the union label is a guarantee of fair wages and working conditions. That is important, especially to union members. But we have to go farther than that to make a case to the non-union consumer. We have to say that union label goods give better value, dollar for dollar. We have to say that union services are better services."

Among those who welcomed the show to Louisville this year were former Gov. Bert Combs, representing Gov. Edward T. Breathitt; Louisville Mayor William O. Cowger, Kentucky Sec. of State Thelma Stovall, State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Sam Ezelle and Eugene Land, president of the Louisville Central Labor Council.

From the traditional ribbon-cutting ceremony to the final day, the show had all of the excitement, education and color of past exhibitions. Young and old marveled at the exhibits, took their chances on valuable prizes and filled their union shopping bags, given out by the Retail Clerks and the Ladies' Garment Workers with choice free items.

Carnival & Classroom

The Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers offered a complete electric kitchen installed in the home of the lucky winner. The Glass Bottle Blowers gave away a glass boat. . . . The Meat Cutters not only gave away hundreds of pounds of beef and poultry, but also fascinated visitors with sheep shearing. . . . The United Textile Workers presented bolts of cloth to the St. Joseph Orphanage. . . . The Bricklayers' apprenticeship contest captured much attention. . . . The Amalgamated Clothing Workers gave out free suits and shirts to lucky winners . . . The Hotel & Restaurant Employes, in addition to other activities, gave away a spinet piano. . . . The Chemical Workers put on a magic show. . . . The American Bakery & Confectionery Workers baked and gave away free cakes.

Altogether it was the excitement of a carnival coupled with the education of a classroom.

High Court Reverses Damages in Boycott

urged the management of a Morton customer—not the employes of that customer—to cease doing business with Morton. The lower court awarded $9,000 to Morton for this activity, awarded another $9,000 for loss of a contract by Morton during a strike because the firm had insufficient drivers available, and slapped $15,000 in punitive damages on top of this.

Intent of Congress

The Supreme Court, in its unanimous decision, said through Justice Potter Stewart that the Taft-Hartley Act both by language and in legislative history spelled out "with great particularity" the type of peaceful secondary-boycott activity. Congress sought to prohibit.

It prohibited a union from secondary-boycott activity aimed at employes of an outside firm, designed to persuade them to coerce their employer to take sides in a union's battle with its primary target. But it did not prohibit a union from asking the outside employer himself for assistance, Stewart's opinion noted.

Congress thus left an appeal for assistance to an employer as legitimate weapon of union self-help. To award damages against a union under state law, over and above damages available under the Taft-Hartley Act itself, "would be to frustrate the congressional determination . . . and upset the balance of power between union and management expressed in our national labor policy," the opinion said.

State law is "displaced" by the Taft-Hartley Act "in private damage actions based on peaceful union secondary activities," the court ruled.

Justice Arthur J. Goldberg in a concurring opinion noted that his agreement with the decision did not "indicate approval" of two earlier court rulings, involving non-peaceful picketing, cited in Stewart's opinion.

Meany Sees Loss In Death of Nehru

American labor joins with the Indian labor movement in mourning the death of Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in messages of sympathy to the Indian National Trade Union Congress and Hind Mazdoor Sabha, national labor centers.

Saluting Nehru as "dynamic leader of your great democracy," Meany called his death "a great loss to all liberty-loving people" and added:

"Millions of American workers in the AFL-CIO will more than ever help the people of India build a strong and prosperous democracy capable of assuring their national security and territorial integrity and serving in the front ranks of democratic nations fighting for a world free from the perils of poverty, dictatorship and war."

AFL-CIO Sets Safety Parley On June 22

An all-day conference on safety has been called for June 22 in Washington, D. C., by the AFL-CIO Committee on Safety & Occupational Health. Beginning at 9:30 a. m., it will meet in the Mayflower Hotel.

The AFL-CIO safety conference will immediately precede the June 23-25 ninth biennial session of the President's Conference on Occupational Safety, to which the White House has invited several hundred unionists.

In the one-day AFL-CIO conference, proposed revisions of safety and health standards under the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act will be discussed. Also on the agenda are labor's program for protection of workers from the widening industrial hazards of ionizing radiation, noise-control practices and joint labor-management safety programs.

Advance registration of union representatives planning to attend the AFL-CIO June 22 conference should be sent to Executive Sec. John D. Connors, AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, 815 Sixteenth St., N. W., Washington, D. C. 20006.

Job Safeguards Asked At Atomic Installations

The AFL-CIO has urged Congress' Joint Committee on Atomic Energy to provide more adequate safeguards for workers at Hanford, Wash., and other atomic installations where government operations are being reduced or turned over to private industry.

A proposed new section of the Atomic Energy Act on disposal of property fails to provide adequate protections for workers who may be adversely affected "if certain activities now carried on at Hanford by the Atomic Energy Commission are turned over to private business operation," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said in a letter to Chairman John O. Pastore (D-R. I.) and other members of the joint committee.

Metal Trades Protest

The Hanford Atomic Metal Trades Council voiced its opposition to the proposed new section in a May 18 telegram, Biemiller said. He added:

"The labor movement most strongly supports the proposed five-year extension of the commission's patent licensing authority which would otherwise lapse this year.

"We also support the clarifying amendments to Sec. 170 of the 1954 act, the Price-Anderson indemnity provisions. These provisions would be extended to cover production and utilization facilities, including licensed facilities receiving an AEC constructon permit pror to Aug. 1, 1967, even if the actual operating license is issued by the commission after that date."

Sen. Pastore's committee is considering an annual "omnibus" bill of amendments to the Atomic Energy Act.

Schnitzler Hits Open Shop Ordinances

Louisville—Enactment of local ordinances banning union shop contracts in nine small Kentucky communities came under sharp attack at the Union Industries Show here.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William P. Schnitzler, at opening day ceremonies, spoke of the benefits of good labor-management relations.

Formula of Compulsion

"There is no sure-fire formula for building that kind of relationship," he said. "But there is a sure-fire formula for preventing it—and that is the compulsory open shop so falsely called 'right-to-work'."

Schnitzler praised Louisville Mayor William O. Cowger (R), who was on the platform at the time, for his recently-issued statement that if the Louisville Board of Aldermen passed such an ordinance he would veto it.

Sam Ezelle, secretary-treasurer of the State AFL-CIO, also applauded Cowger's stand.

Former Gov. Bert Combs, representing Gov. Edward Breathitt, said that progress had been made in the past in the state "without any so-called 'right-to-work' laws."

The State AFL-CIO has sued in Barren Circuit Court to challenge the legality of the ordinance passed in Glasgow. Ordinances have also been passed in Shelbyville, Scottsville, London, Morganfield, Harlan, Greensburg, Cave City and Crofton.

Not a 'Labor Dispute':

Court Upholds ILA Boycott Of Ships in Cuba Trade

The right of the Longshoremen to boycott foreign ships carrying grain to Castro's Cuba has been upheld by the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals as not subject to disapproval by the National Labor Relations Board and "a recognized part of the freedom constitutionally guaranteed" by the 1st Amendment.

The court, in its 2-1 decision held that the Longshoremen's Association was not engaged in a "labor dispute" when its Baltimore local boycotted the British flag freighter Tulse Hill last January. The NLRB's regulatory powers are limited to the area of labor disputes, and it lacks jurisdiction when a union's actions are "political in nature," the court declared.

Even if the NLRB had jurisdiction, the majority continued, the ILA was guilty of no "threat, coercion or restraint" aimed at forcing affected maritime firms from doing business with each other and "the board erred in finding an unfair labor practice" on the part of the ILA.

The court reasoned:

"One may disagree with the soundness of ILA's reasons for persistently refusing to work on a ship which has offended its policy" on Cuban trade.

"But it is not within our province or that of the . . . [NLRB] to require the men to engage in work they find obnoxious because the ship has traffiked with a political regime they consider loathsome," the majority ruled.

ILA Policy Set

The factual background of the case was outlined by the court in Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff's opinion.

On Oct. 8, 1962, when the crisis over the discovery of Soviet missiles in Cuba was at its height, the ILA announced publicly that it would not load or unload cargoes of any nature "in ships of any owner whose vessels are used in trade with Cuba."

Four months later, when the U.S. government issued a memorandum prohibiting foreign-flag vessels that had traded with Cuba from carrying U.S. government-financed cargoes, the Maritime Administration prepared a "blacklist" of vessels which had been used in Cuban trade. On the list was the "Tulse Hill," flying the British flag, manned by a foreign crew and owned by Ocean Shipping Service Ltd., a Bermuda corporation.

The ILA circulated a "fact sheet" in December 1963 saying "our Cuban boycott is still in effect" and urging members to "report any of these ships that enter your port. . . . By no means work them."

Off U.S. List

Later the Tulse Hill was removed from the Maritime Administration blacklist when its owners agreed that no other vessels under their control would be employed in trading with Cuba, but the ship remained on the ILA list.

The Tulse Hill's owners notified the Maryland Ship Ceiling Co., Inc., that the ship would reach Baltimore Jan. 21, 1964, and the manager of Maryland Ship telephoned ILA Local 1355 to ask that five gangs of carpenters be notified to report for work fitting the vessel for a grain cargo. The union refused to refer workers to the Tulse Hill but continued to work other vessels for Maryland Ship.

The owners of the Tulse Hill filed a complaint in the Baltimore City Circuit Court, which dismissed it, and the company next filed unfair labor practice charges with the NLRB.

While the case was pending the NLRB petitioned in federal district court for an injunction, which was granted, but a stay of execution was allowed by the appellate court while the board expedited its processes. On Apr. 10, 1964, the board entered a cease-and-desist order and sought enforcement by the circuit court.

The court based its reversal of the NLRB on this definition of a labor dispute: "The term 'labor dispute' includes any controversy concerning terms, tenure or conditions of employment" or "the representation" of persons seeking to negotiate terms of employment. There can be no jurisdiction, the majority ruled, where the complaint is not related to such a dispute.

It added: "Not every activity of a labor organization, not even every controversy in which it may become involved, is a labor dispute within the statutory meaning. The union activity here pertains to a general political question, in which ILA shares an interest with all citizens. It is not seeking to alter any employment conditions."

Sobeloff's majority opinion noted that boycotts by workers or consumers against a foreign regime they find obnoxious are "not uncommon."

Precedents Cited

Such demonstrations have been made against "Hitler's Nazi system" and against various Communist governments, the court pointed out.

It went on: "The 1st amendment affords protection not merely to the voicing of abstract opinions upon public issues. It also protects implementing conduct which is in the nature of advocacy."

Union members, they concluded, "need not mount a platform to voice their moral revulsion against Castro; if they deem it more appropriate . . . to express their sentiments by refusing to assist a vessel that trades with him, they are at liberty to do so."

"Nothing in the labor law speaks to the contrary," the majority ruled.

Sobeloff was joined in the decision by Judge J. Spencer Bell. Judge Albert V. Bryan dissented in two sentences, saying the case "fits snugly the design of the National Labor Relations Act, unequivocally putting jurisdiction of it in the board," and "I would enforce the order" of the NLRB.

East St. Louis Walkout Wins Pact for Teachers

East St. Louis, Ill.—The first strike of public school teachers in local history has produced the first written agreement ever won by the young Teachers' union here—an agreement by the School Board to increase wages by $306,000 next school year for 715 teachers, attendance officers and supervisors.

More than 500 members of Teachers Local 1220 stayed away from school four days until the board agreed to sign a contract—provided it is referred to not as a contract but as a "memorandum of understanding."

It was, said an Illinois Federation of Teachers statement, a "total victory" for the union and its members, most of them on their first picket line. The victory was won despite all the efforts to break the strike by 200 non-union teachers who walked through the lines at many of the city's 35 school buildings, union leaders said.

The walkout started May 18 after the School Board met the union's request for increases of $300 to $900 a year with an offer of $200 across the board—"take it or leave it, strike or no strike." The picket lines held firm through May 21, with only 10 teachers deserting the union ranks and all but 4,500 of the schools' 21,000 pupils remaining home.

Settlement Reached

The night of May 21, Pres. Robert Hackmann of the local Chamber of Commerce called a meeting of the contract negotiators at the offices of the Union Electric Co., where Hackmann is general manager. Ten hours later the settlement had been reached, and all classes resumed at 10 a.m., May 22.

The agreement provides wage increases of $250 a year for teachers without a college degree, $400 for those with a bachelor's degree, $550 for those with a master's degree, and $700 for teachers who complete 30 semester hours of work toward the doctoral degree.

The new salary schedule starts at $4,250 a year and rises in $200 yearly steps to a maximum of $7,900 for those with the highest study credits. The new 11-year schedule is a step in the direction of the American Federation of Teachers goal—$6,000 to $14,000 within eight years for those with a bachelor's degree, said Local 1220 Pres. Clyde Reynolds.

The new pact also provides that no other school employe will lose a job because of the wage hikes; no teacher or pupil shall be penalized or rewarded for participating or failing to participate; and all examinations for pupils will be rescheduled if necessary.

Board members headed by the Rev. William Lahey, Episcopal clergyman, agreed to this union proviso: that teachers who missed class shall work an extra four days if necessary after the scheduled June 5 closing date and that non-strikers may volunteer to serve after that date but will not be paid for such extra service. No one who stayed out will lose pay, it was also agreed.

NLRB Affirms Ruling On Insurance Unit

The National Labor Relations Board, spelling out its reasons for agreeing to hold elections among insurance agents in smaller than state-wide units, again has ordered the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. to bargain with the Insurance Workers.

The order was the latest of some 20 findings that Metropolitan and other firms are required by law to bargain with the union after it has won representation elections.

At issue is the refusal of major firms to accept NLRB rulings that any unit smaller than state-wide is an appropriate bargaining unit. Two such refusals have been carried to the U.S. Supreme Court, where review has been asked.

Meanwhile the union has won bargaining rights for several thousand new members but their status will remain unsettled until the top court disposes of the industry's challenge to the NLRB. Many will not become full dues-paying members until that time, said IWIU Sec.-Treas. William A. Gillen.

In the latest case, three board members ruled that elections may be held in units limited to the Metropolitan district office at New London, Conn., plus a detached office at Westerly, R. I., and the district office at Meriden, Conn. Each district office, the board found, is a "separate administrative entity" operating as a complete, self-contained autonomous unit.

Rail Unions Negotiate Job Security If Pennsylvania, N.Y. Central Merge

Eighteen railroad unions have reached agreement with the Pennsylvania and New York Central railroads on a job-protection pact to take effect in the event the two railroads win approval of a pending merger proposal.

The unions, affiliated with the Railway Labor Executives' Association, described the agreement as one that will provide long-lasting job guarantees and other protective features. Its signing, they said, does not remove their objections to the merger itself.

In an announcement of the agreement, Pres. G. E. Leighty of the Railroad Telegraphers, chairman of the RLEA, said a major objection to the proposed merger was lack of adequate job protection for employes and that the new pact overcomes this specific objection.

In another development, a federal arbitration panel settled three disputes involving firemen and enginemen laid off under an earlier decision of the arbiters. Two gave management a freer hand, one upheld the union position.

The board ruled that railroads can eliminate low-seniority men in the 13 states with "full crew" laws and replace them with higher seniority men whose jobs are eliminated in other states.

The board settled an allied dispute by ruling that management may terminate the services of low-seniority firemen in road or yard service, or extra men who work irregularly, and fill the vacancies with higher-seniority men.

A third ruling was that firemen with two to 10 years' seniority who choose severance pay instead of a comparable job must be paid an amount equal to 50 percent of their earnings in the previous two years—an increase from the $2,400 maximum the roads wanted to pay bringing the ceiling to as much as $10,000.

Highlights of the agreement reached by the RLEA with the Pennsylvania and the New York Central:

- In the event of merger, the new road will take all present employes of the Pennsylvania and Central into its employ.
- No present employe of either road "shall be deprived of employment or placed in a worse position" with respect to wages and conditions at any time.
- There shall be no reduction in force unless the merged company's business declines more than 5 percent in a 30-day period. In such an event, the force reduction in any craft shall not exceed 1 percent for each 1 percent decline from the 5 percent "floor."
- Advance notice of any such reduction shall be given under union agreements and when business rises, employes must be recalled in the same ratio within 15 days.

In addition to the agreement, the parties signed five "memoranda of understanding." They involve job and wage information which managements must furnish on union request; moving expenses up to $500, and lump sum separation allowances for those who choose to quit a job rather than accept a transfer.

Schnitzler Urges Strengthening Of Labor, Negro 'Grand Alliance'

Cleveland—The "grand alliance" between the labor movement and the Negro community must be preserved and strengthened for the advantage of both groups, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told the Negro-American Labor Council at its meeting here.

"We operate as a team" in the fight for civil rights "and it's going to be a winning team," said Schnitzler, who is chairman of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee. If it should fail, he warned, "America will fail."

Working together, Schnitzler stressed, "we are going to put an end to the . . . half-hidden, unacknowledged, shamefaced segregation and discrimination in the North" as well as the "open, deliberate" discrimination in the South.

Even that victory, he said, won't solve the problem "unless equal opportunity is also full opportunity." He added:

"We cannot build a better America through integrated unemployment, integrated poverty or integrated ignorance. . . . There is no real future in a program for sharing the misery. What we need in this country is a full, rich, secure life for every citizen."

Schnitzler cited as an example of the "two-way street" of Negro-union cooperation the successful "uphill battle" to defeat a so-called "right-to-work" amendment in Oklahoma.

Oklahoma Negroes, he said, voted 20-1 against "right-to-work," listening to such leaders as A. Philip Randolph, vice president of the AFL-CIO and president of the Negro-American Labor Council. If the Negro votes, mostly cast by persons who weren't union members, had gone the other way, Oklahoma would be a "right-to-work" state, Schnitzler noted.

There is a "fringe of bigots" in the labor movement, Schnitzler acknowledged. "Because of that," he added, "you have in the Negro community a radical fringe that says the whole labor movement ought to be torn apart."

Both groups, he stressed, are "fringes—and not fringe benefits."

The fact that some white union members "still cling to ancient prejudices" doesn't mean, Schnitzler said, that there is a difference between union members and civil rights groups "that cannot be bridged. What it means is that all of us must work harder at our common task."

Schnitzler noted that an industrial Indiana county which voted for Alabama's Gov. Wallace in the presidential primary also nominated in the same election a Negro candidate and a white leader of the integration movement.

Even after passage of civil rights legislation, "neither Birmingham, nor Cambridge, nor Cleveland will magically be transformed into harmonious, integrated communities, governed solely by considerations of humanity and justice," Schnitzler pointed out.

The task of the Negro-labor alliance "will be just beginning," he stressed.

"You know, as union members, that all workers, regardless of race, creed or national origin, need a union," Schnitzler said.

"You know, as union members, that the labor movement—despite its pockets of prejudice—has fought for equal opportunity and equal rights, on and off the job.

"You know that employers have been the greatest single obstacle to that objective," he added.

There may not always be "immediate agreement on strategy and tactics," Schnitzler said, but as in a union negotiating committee "the differences are settled . . . and a common program is followed."

Dividends, Profits Show Sharp Rise Over 1963

as having "erred strongly on the low side."

Earlier, the Dept. of Labor had reported the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment stood at 5.4 percent in April, unchanged from the March and February figures.

The net profit first-quarter figure after taxes ran at a seasonally adjusted rate of $31.1 billion, a whopping 22 percent higher than profits in the corresponding period in 1963. The indication is that the Budget Bureau has been compelled to revise upward its estimates of government revenues as a result of the zoom in profits and revise downward its estimates of the prospective federal budget deficit.

The annual survey of executive salaries by the authoritative magazine Business Week reported that "robust profits" had "added more zip to the upswing in executive compensation that has marked the 1960s."

Basic salaries were boosted by "almost 60 percent of the companies" covered in Business Week's survey—"at an average rate of about 15 percent."

In addition, the magazine reported, "hefty bonuses pushed totals still higher." Compensation to executives was slashed by fewer than 8 percent of the companies filing information with the Securities & Exchange Commission.

Companies turning in "healthy" 1963 profits "rewarded top management with fat salary increases and fatter bonuses," the magazine said. Among these, some automobile company executives "paced the field," but even in the iron and steel industry, "which had spotty profits," some companies raised executive pay.

The "top auto brass took home more pay than any other group," Business Week reported, for the fifth year in a row. General Motors Chairman Frederic G. Donner "added $11,000 to last year's pretax salary and bonus of $543,975," and he has contingent credits payable if stock options are not exercised lifting him to a potential $800,000-plus figure as "the highest paid executive" among the companies surveyed.

The sensational rise in corporation profits for the first quarter of the year—a gain of $2.5 billion from the fourth quarter of 1963—was in contrast to a third-quarter to fourth-quarter 1963 rise of $1 billion, the Commerce Dept. reported.

The tax liability of corporations dropped by $900 million from the fourth quarter of 1963. The actual extent of the tax-cut benefits to business were revealed in a comparison of the 1964 first quarter and 1963 first quarter figures. The tax obligations of corporations rose by $2 billion, but after-tax profits jumped a spectacular $5.7 billion.

The corporation profit advance reflected not only the effects of tax reduction, AFL-CIO economists observed, but also a widening of profit margins and declining unit costs of labor.

'Workable Adjustments' Needed:

Disaster Foreseen in 'Blind' Automation

Philadelphia—Unless the United States rapidly develops social and economic adjustments and adaptations, "the blind forward plunge of the technological revolution can lead to disaster," AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger warned during a discussion of the impact of automation at the 15th annual convention of the American Institute of Industrial Engineers.

To achieve a healthy economic expansion and full employment, he pointed out, the nation must act to create a balance between ability to produce and ability to consume the products of an automated industry.

Need for Bargaining

Labor and industry, Goldfinger said, have an obligation to develop "workable adjustments" to technological advances through collective bargaining at the level of the plant, the company or the labor market. These, he said, should include advance notice of "radical technological changes, retraining of workers in the new skills that will be needed, and relocation assistance to workers and their families."

"But we must recognize that labor and management alone, at the plant level, cannot solve broad national social problems," he warned. "Federal government efforts—nationwide programs—are needed."

The "tremendous challenge" of providing more than 80,000 new jobs a week for the rest of this decade to meet the demand, Goldfinger said, calls for "a series of bold measures—now."

Among these he listed:

- Expansion of job-creating public works.
- Extension of the federal minimum wage law "to millions of low-wage workers" and an increase in the minimum "to strengthen consumer markets for the sale of the growing volume of goods and services that can be produced."
- "Significant move toward reducing hours of work—to increase job opportunities."
- "A national manpower policy . . . as well as a program of financial relocation allowances to assist unemployed workers and their families to move to areas of job opportunities."
- Modernization of "our woefully inadequate programs of assistance for the unemployed, the aged and the disabled," as well as development of "an effective social system to meet the costs of proper medical care."

Goldfinger pointed out that because of the speed with which the technological revolution is spreading, measures required at present may be "altogether inadequate" in the 1970s. To examine problems as they develop and to recommend measures to solve them, he maintained, a national commission on technological change is needed.

"Vast changes" in "the very nature of work itself," he said, have to be met "by similarly vast economic and social changes" to provide adequate adjustments for people and communities.

"And after thousands of years of struggle with scarcity—since the beginning of the human race—America must now learn," he said, "to live with the potential abundance made possible by the new technology."

Fast Ruling Due on Vote At Kingsport

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia has agreed to speed up the process of deciding if the National Labor Relations Board may open and count ballots cast by strikers and strikebreakers at the Kingsport, Tenn., plant of the Kingsport Press.

The court denied a company request for a temporary restraining order to prevent the NLRB from counting the ballots but agreed to expedite the case. The judges directed the court clerk to set a date for oral arguments on the appeal as soon as possible.

Five unions struck the plant Mar. 11, 1963, in a contract dispute—the Bookbinders, Machinists, Pressman, Typographers and Stereotypers.

The board held a representation election last Mar. 10 and impounded the ballots to give union and management lawyers time to argue about whether the election should have been held.

Essay Contest Winners Tour Capital

STATE WINNERS of Ability Counts essay contest sponsored by the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped were taken on a tour of Washington, laid a wreath at Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, Arlington Cemetery.

BROUGHT TO WASHINGTON for annual meeting of committee by their state AFL-CIO bodies, winners visited Mount Vernon, George Washington's home, stopped at tomb of his nephew, Bushrod.

ON BEHALF of prize winners, LaVoy and Miss Frawley placed a wreath at the grave of late Pres. John F. Kennedy in Arlington Cemetery. They are seen with the officer beyond the open gate.

THE YOUNG VISITORS, from secondary schools all over the country, were impressed by Mount Vernon, which they inspected thoroughly. Their tour was made possible by the IBEW, which in addition entertained them at a luncheon in the Senate dining room in the U.S. Capitol.

The Boomers

DIVIDENDS ARE BOOMING, profits are booming, the salaries and bonus arrangements of management executives are booming. The picture would be extremely satisfying—except for the nagging doubt provoked by the fact that all this affluence and boom are accompanied by a high level of joblessness. A 5.4 percent rate of joblessness unchanged for the past three months despite lifts and encouragements in some areas, despite the recently effective tax cut.

To restate the nagging doubt is to risk seeming to carp at what used to be called prosperity. But of course there is no prosperity for those who have no jobs but only a technique of getting by.

They get by on the basis of unemployment insurance that replaces about one-third the normal income, provided the worker is eligible for jobless compensation to begin with. And when the maximum payment period under state laws runs out, they get by on the bounty of relatives, or borrowing, or on general assistance.

We have a clear-cut problem to face. The whole country is booming—but there are not enough jobs to employ our potential workers. It is no answer to say that "everybody" could have a job if the potential workers were well-educated enough and well-trained enough to move into the areas of high skills where job opportunities allegedly are going unfilled.

The fact is that workers automated out of jobs, tractored off the farms, driven into the faceless anonymity of the millions of the unemployed, were not in the past well-educated and well-trained for the skills required today. Our youth are not being well-educated enough and well-trained enough now.

The fact is that our economy, booming though it is, has not yet begun to create sufficient new job opportunities to meet the needs of the millions of young people coming to age in this decade.

THERE IS SOMETHING ludicrous, under these circumstances, in the political philosophy—and it exists—that the cure for joblessness is better education, but that we must not legislate a massive injection of federal funds to improve the quality of education in the elementary and secondary schools.

For a great many American children and teenagers, the elementary and secondary schools are the only chance our school system will ever get. Somehow Congress after Congress has proved itself incapable of providing the needed infusion of federal funds.

Fifteen years ago, in 1949, the Senate passed a school-aid bill with the help of the late Republican Sen. Taft of Ohio, but the House and Senate have never been able to approve such a bill at the same time and send it to the White House for signature.

THE ACTUAL RATE of joblessness is considerably above the 5.4 or 5.5 percent rate officially reported year after year, and it is so acknowledged. It may be as high as 8 percent or more. There is the element of part-time work—short workweeks and periods of work-and-layoff. There is the element of a shutdown in a community's major enterprise that makes job applications meaningless.

A great deal more is needed for a healthy economy than rosy corporation profit figures, dividends and jack-rabbiting executive salaries and bonuses. It is the business of a modern democracy to make sure that all its citizens have equality of opportunity—and the right to earn a living was certified in the Employment Act of 1946.

The peril lies in our getting accustomed to this 5.4 percent rate of unemployment as somehow endurable because things otherwise are booming. It is not permanently endurable; it is cancerous.

Room With a View

In Land-Water Conservation Bill:

Permanent Revenue Plan Urged For Federal Recreation Areas

The following is excerpted from a recent address by Rep. Wayne N. Aspinall (D-Colo.) to the Women's National Democratic Club on the Land and Water Conservation Fund Bill.

BACK IN THE 1890s and the early 1900s when the conservation movement was getting strongly under way, when giants like Theodore Roosevelt and Gifford Pinchot and others were with us, it was such things as parks, forests, water power, and irrigation that constituted the focal points of the conservation movement.

This movement was not in favor of locking up our great stores of natural resources and of natural beauty and simply putting them in a deep freeze. It was a movement against waste and despoliation, a movement in favor of wise use. And while wise use may in some cases mean a single use (our national parks, for instance), it will in more cases mean multiple use—our national forests and our flood control and irrigation reservoirs, for instance. But it will not mean, except in the rarest of rare cases, a policy of no use, a policy of preserving simply for the sake of preserving.

The use of the outdoors for recreation at the time the conservation movement got started was a minor part of the story. Certainly people wanted to enjoy the outdoors, but the outdoors was all around them except in a few of our larger cities, and little thought needed to be given to its accessibility, its adequacy, or its cost. Today such thought must be given. The outdoors today for most of us city-dwellers is far, far away. It is getting scarcer and scarcer. It costs time and money to get to it. And it is costing more and more to preserve and restore it. These, in the final analysis, are the reasons for the Land and Water Conservation Fund bill.

We are no longer in a position to dedicate unlimited areas of the public lands to recreation and other conservation purposes. The 1.8 billion acres that the United States acquired by cessions from the original 13 states and by treaties over the years between the Louisiana Purchase in 1803 and the Alaska Purchase in 1867 has shrunk to 711 million acres and of these only 484 million are not already given over to one federal function or another. Moreover, 309 million of these remaining 484 are in Alaska. This leaves about 175 million in what our Alaskan fellow-citizens like to refer to as the "lower 48" and particularly in about a dozen of these 48. Large as even this figure of 175 million acres may seem, the pressures on it for all sorts of developments—military bases, city growth, oil field developments, grazing, and so on and on—is tremendous and, in many cases, meritorious.

There is a romantic view in some quarters, fostered by our history and by our inability or unwillingness to keep our eyes open to the trends of the last half century, that says that the "outdoors" is and always has been and ought always to be free. This is nonsense.

The Land and Water Conservation Fund bill proposes three permanent sources of money:

1—That portion of the present so-called gasoline tax which is derived from fuels used in motorboats. This will yield about $25 million a year.

2—Proceeds from the sale of surplus government real estate. This will probably yield about $50 million a year.

3—Proceeds from admission and user fees collected from those who make recreational use of our national parks, national forests, and other installations. It has been estimated that this, after it is fully under way, may yield $60 to $70 million a year.

The bill, moreover, offers a bargain to the American people. It authorizes an automobile sticker which will admit the owner and all his passengers into virtually every federal recreation area in the country for a maximum of $7 a year. For those who do not wish to buy an auto sticker, the bill provides for admission fees to individual recreational areas. We anticipate that these may range, depending on the area and the types of recreation it affords and the amount of federal investment in it, from 25 cents to a dollar or two.

The yield from all fees and from various types of user fees may add up to $60 or $70 million dollars a year. This will not even begin to cover the cost to the taxpayers of the recreational opportunities the United States now furnishes. It will, for instance, be only about half of our appropriations to the National Park Service alone.

More than half of the money that will be appropriated from the fund will go to the states to be used to match state funds available for planning their recreational development, for land acquisition, and for development. Two-fifths of the funds available to the states—two-fifths, that is, of a potential total of $90 million a year—will be available for distribution equally among all 50 of them and three-fifths will be allotted on the basis of need, with primary attention to their populations, the use of outdoor recreation facilities by residents of other states, and the extent of federal outdoor recreation programs within the state.

Morgan Says:

Modern Political Battles Make Even Baboons Look Civilized

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

LAST FEBRUARY, a pretty, blond and pony-tailed British biologist named Jane Goodall arrived in Washington after a 3½-year stay in the ape country of East Africa and announced what may have seemed to some to be a startling discovery: chimpanzees regard human beings as inferior creatures—in the same class as baboons. I submit, however, that this is not an odd but an inevitable scientific finding and that in all probability the chimpanzees made their observations of people during an election year. There are times during a political campaign when the politicians and the public manage to make even the baboons look superior.

Morgan

What a trial we are to ourselves; how savagely animalistic we can become as we pursue what is supposed to be the civilized process of selecting the officials by whom we consent to be governed. Throwing Christians to the lions in pagan Rome was a humane and inspiring exercise by comparison with some of the sporting events featured in a modern political contest.

Reputations are clawed to death, verbal genocide is practiced against entire segments of the American society in attempts to exterminate the opposition. In the end the winning candidate is so exhausted and the electorate so embittered or benumbed or both that everybody sinks into a comatose condition until the next seasonal siege of balloting begins and the contentious process is cranked up all over again.

In the lull between presidential primaries, an observer turns wistfully to Miss Goodall's description of life with the chimpanzees in the jungles of Tanganyika. She noted that they had devised a complex society of their own which includes a long period of care for the young and "close family ties." She discovered their talents of ingenious improvisation, such as fashioning drinking cups out of crumpled leaves. With an interesting fastidiousness for grooming and cleanliness, they even use leaves as napkins to wipe their sticky hands after eating. Chimps can, the scientist found, influence each other's behavior by vocal calls. They have a variety of these, including, she said, a kind of "panting hoot."

Ah, well, maybe they're just a mild holler away from our system after all. In any case the panting hoots of politicians can be heard trying to influence the behavior of voters, this time in most strident volume in the state of California. The Oregon campaign wasn't so vicious as it might have been. The state has a tradition of moderation in political judgment and the extremist fringe, though its squeaks were audible intermittently before the primary, was not taken seriously and was not an issue despite the fact that somebody spent a good deal of money on postage to send a number of candidates running for delegate to the Republican convention bundles of hate letters by registered mail containing scurrilous attacks on New York's Gov. Rockefeller.

BUT THE BEHEMOTH of the 1964 primary battles, Rockefeller vs. Sen. Goldwater in California, will strain the tempers and indeed the very sanity of the voters. Not only is the senator's bid for the presidential nomination riding heavily on the outcome—he is likely to be unstoppable at San Francisco in July if he wins the primary, his hopes mortally wounded if he loses—but every important right-wing extremist outfit from the Dixiecrats to the John Birch Society, overtly or covertly, will be involved in the campaign.

Furthermore, as far as they are concerned, it isn't simply a Goldwater-Rockefeller battle; it is in addition a thrust by the radical right to get a foothold in the California Republican party with the ultimate objective of controlling it.

Let us not, however, blame all our political problems on the lunatic fringe. An observer covering primaries across the country can't help wondering sometimes if the ballot were not devised by subversives. Oregonians in the Portland area got not only their so-called bedsheet ballot but five others besides requiring decisions on such things as a $300,000 item to build a pachyderm house for the bull elephant in Portland's zoo. They voted that down.

This is not too much time to spend on making democracy work but the trouble is the end product is often so discouraging. The United States Senate at the moment is still wallowing in a sordid quarrel over what, if anything, to do about its questionable morals as reflected in the Bobby Baker hearings. And it would be hard to devise a more depressing spectacle at this stage of history than the sly demagogic pitch of Alabama's Gov. Wallace for votes in the Maryland primary on the basis of white supremacy. It makes you hanker for the solitude of Miss Goodall's jungle and her discerning chimps. Such escapism won't do, of course, so you settle for Winston Churchill's observation that democracy is the worst possible form of government except all the others—including, I suppose one must add, Animal Farm.

Washington Reports:

Senate Food Stamp Approval Pushed By McCarthy, Aiken

SEN. EUGENE J. McCARTHY (D-Minn.) and Sen. George D. Aiken (R-Vt.), both members of the Senate Agriculture Committee, called for passage of the food stamp bill as soon as civil rights has been acted upon. They were interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

The food stamp measure, passed by the House, would permit communities to use the program to help persons on relief obtain more balanced and nutritious diets, instead of the corn meal, flour and powdered products now distributed. The stamps, which would be purchased by welfare recipients, might be cashed in grocery stores for almost any foods, except soft drinks and luxury frozen foods, intoxicating liquors, tobacco or imported items.

McCarthy reported that the program is now operated as a pilot project in 40 counties and three large cities in 22 states. He said 180,000 persons are now participating, and that "studies have shown that those who take part do improve their diets. Something over 80 percent of the increases were accounted for by purchase of livestock products, fruits and vegetables."

Both senators agreed that the food stamp program aids not only the recipients, but producers and business as well.

AIKEN ESTIMATED that proposed legislation would help provide better diets for 25 million persons. He said he expects the Agriculture Committee to take up the bill early in June. McCarthy predicted that after a day or two of hearings the Senate would approve the bill overwhelmingly.

"We have had considerable surpluses of grain in this country for years," Aiken pointed out. "When people consume grain through this program they will do away with much of this surplus, which is expensive to store, and rather embarrassing at times. Milk, eggs, meat, fruits, vegetables and oils and fats would be added to this diet. It is not estimated that the consumption of bread will be affected."

McCarthy said that the food stamp program can be an important part of the "war on poverty" since "the fundamental objective is to provide food for those who are suffering from malnutrition and under-nutrition, and who, because of poverty, are unable to purchase needed food for themselves and their children. Strengthening the farm economy is important, but secondary to aiding the needy."

by Willard Shelton

THE CALIFORNIA REPUBLICAN CAMPAIGN showed Sen. Goldwater of Arizona not very gracefully on the defensive a few days in advance of the June 2 primary. It was an extraordinary picture the senator deliberately arranged for an audience at Shasta Junior College to see—a pose with an arrow tucked under his arm from the rear to suggest he had been shot in the back and this was the kind of treatment he had been getting in the past few weeks.

He made the statement and posed the picture the day Dwight D. Eisenhower broke his momentous silence and set down his viewpoints, for his newspaper outlets, on the qualifications needed in the Republican Party's nominee.

The arrow Sen. Goldwater held under his arm may not have been specifically intended to intimate that he felt he had been "shot in the back" by the Eisenhower statement. Indeed, since nothing counts in politics except the vote of the voters in the polling booths, it would be most unwise to draw the inference.

The California primary returns will settle the issue of how the state's GOP delegation will vote for a Republican nominee on the first ballot in the party's nominating convention barely six weeks away. Goldwater partisans—and indeed the senator himself—expressed the formal viewpoint that he was covered by the former President's description of the proper qualifications for a nominee.

Almost no one else thought so—specifically not Gov. Rockefeller of New York, who was bidding directly against Goldwater for the 86 California convention delegates. Not the backers of Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, nor the late-emerging California supporters of an astute potential dark horse, Gov. William W. Scranton of Pennsylvania. And not the watchful backers of former Vice Pres. Nixon.

Sen. Goldwater was severely wounded in a wing by Republican voters of Oregon in the May 15 primary in which they gave Rockefeller a persuasive victory, gave Lodge second place, put the senator from Arizona in a bad third place. The picture in California changed instantly, or perhaps coincidentally.

Voters were reported by the polling services to be switching to Rockefeller. The majority of California Republican legislators were recorded as anticipating a Rockefeller victory. The Arizona senator has a large bag of delegates for the first ballot in the GOP convention and may play a role, of undetermined importance, in the tone of the platform and other matters whether or not he wins the nomination.

He cannot claim he has run well, anywhere, in the popular vote in Republican primaries. Even in Nebraska, where only his name was on the ballot, a majority of GOP voters took the trouble to write in the names of other candidates.

GEN. EISENHOWER'S statement on the qualifications of the 1964 Republican nominee has its elements of hilarity entirely apart from the carefully-phrased declaration that he has no intention of naming names and picking a candidate.

He thinks the GOP nominee should be a man of firmness—but not impulsiveness—in foreign policy (Goldwater berated Pres. Johnson for not sending the marines to Cuba to turn on the water and advocates use of minor-type atomic bombs in North Vietnam to solve our problems in Southeast Asia).

The General says he believes that we have to keep government "close to the people," and Goldwater's campaigners says this fits their man.

The odd elements in Gen. Eisenhower's statement emerge in his description of what he says his own administration produced.

One of the "examples" he cited was legislation in behalf of so-called depressed areas. Mr. Eisenhower in fact vetoed two bills —in 1958 and in 1960—to set up a federal program of assistance to distressed areas. The bill was passed by Congress a third time in 1961 and was the first measure signed into law, as a public program, by the late Pres. Kennedy.

Another example of "positive" Republicanism revealed in his administration, Mr. Eisenhower indicated, was expansion of coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act. There wasn't any "expansion of coverage" and protection of broader classifications of workers in the minimum wage law in his eight years. In 1955 the hourly wage was boosted from 75 cents to $1 despite Mr. Eisenhower's effort to keep the increase to 90 cents, but coverage was not expanded.

THE FOOD STAMP PLAN must be the Senate's first order of business after it has disposed of civil rights, Sen. Eugene McCarthy (D-Minn.), left, and Sen. George D. Aiken (R-Vt.) agreed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

How to Buy:

Wasteful Buying Costs More As Food Prices Continue Rise

By Sidney Margolius

RISING FOOD PRICES are a cause of real concern this spring. The Dun & Bradstreet wholesale food price index in one recent week scored its largest advance since last January, and is now at its highest point of the year.

Working families tend to use cold cuts and frankfurters frequently, especially in warm weather and for lunch boxes, in the belief that these meats are cheap and can help them cut food costs. This is a myth. A comparison of recent prices by this writer shows that in terms of protein value—which is the important value you buy in meat — bologna, franks, etc., actually are among the most costly.

You would think they would be cheap, since they are processed at the factory with resultant savings in handling and transportation. But a funny thing happens on the way to the market. While prices of fresh meats normally fluctuate according to supplies, packers and retailers tend to maintain their prices for processed meat rigidly.

Another reason why bologna, frankfurters and other cold cuts prove to be expensive protein, is that their protein value is relatively low. They seem to be all meat and no waste, but actually, have a high percentage of water and sometimes fillers and binders such as cereals. Packaging practices also may fool you.

We have worked out the cost of 100 grams of protein of a number of meats and other protein foods such as eggs and cheese. The 100 grams is about the amount that a family of four or five might consume in a meal. Prices may vary locally, from store to store and seasonally. Too, specials or leaders can affect the relative position of some items.

Note especially the difference in price between cold cuts bought sliced and by the chunk or piece —a difference sometimes of as much as 23c a pound. As we've advised before, you can make money just slicing. Some special types of bologna, salami, etc., sell for as much as $1.10 a pound. Note, too, that when there is a difference of more than 12c a pound, as there usually is, chuck steak with bone in is a better buy than boneless chuck.

Hamburger turns out to be the best buy in red meats. Even though ordinary hamburger has more fat than chopped chuck, the low price at which stores often feature it makes it a better buy.

THERE ARE TWO MAJOR money lessons to be drawn. One is to do your own cooking. Note, for example, the difference in cost between boiled sliced ham and smoked ham even with the bone. The other is to use home-cooked meats and other proteins for sandwiches and lunch boxes rather than cold cuts.

Because of the high protein cost of bacon, canned luncheon meat, home-cooked ham or almost any other breakfast meat gives higher-quality nutrition for less money.

Other big values in protein, usable for main dishes as well as lunch boxes, are poultry, cheddar cheese, canned tuna and eggs. These also happen to be the outstanding food buys this June. Calories per pound, for growing children and active adults, too are a food value if you don't pay a high premium. Otherwise, calories are available from many low-cost foods and there's no need to pay a protein price for fats and carbohydrates.

June is a month to find exceptional values in dresses. Cold weather this spring hit dress manufacturers hard, to the extent that there was practically no season, labor union officials in the garment industry confide. Manufacturers have had to cut prices drastically.

The federation, through COPE's register-and-vote drive, is cooperating with the foundation and other public-spirited organizations to stress the obligation of citizens to exercise their rights and fulfill their duties at the ballot box.

21% on 'Bare Existence':

'Average' Income Up But Poverty Persists

The average American city-dweller is living more comfortably on an income of almost $6,700 a year but the U.S. still has a "substantial proportion" of low-income families able to "eke out only the barest existence," the U.S. Dept. of Labor has reported.

An estimated 54 percent of city and suburban families had incomes between $3,000 and $7,500 but 21 percent earned less than $3,000 according to a report on consumer incomes for 1960-1961 by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

In the low-income group, 2.4 percent were under $1,000, 8.7 percent between $1,000 and $2,000, 9.9 percent from $2,000 to $3,000.

The study, based on data provided by 9,500 families out of 14,000 contacted by BLS interviewers, was made public by BLS Assistant Commissioner Arnold Chase, who called it "a story of affluence vs. poverty, homeowners vs. renters, working wives vs. stay-at-homes, central city vs. suburban—in other words, of average Americans."

It showed that, since 1950:

- Average income before taxes rose by 58 percent, after taxes by 51 percent.
- On the basis of real income, the average increase was 22 percent.
- Families increased their spending for consumer goods and services by 42 percent. They put more money into personal insurance, social security and retirement funds, gave more gifts and contributions and—mainly those with incomes over $5,000 a year—saved a little.

As income rose, families did not raise their food and clothing purchases proportionately but channeled more into autos, better housing, medical care and other items.

After adjustment for price increases, actual spending per family for food went down from nearly 30 cents per dollar in 1950 to 24 cents in 1960-61. The share for shelter increased from 15.5 to 18.5 cents, and for auto purchase and operation from 11.5 to 13 cents.

But poor families spent 59 cents out of every dollar for food and shelter, as against 41 cents for families with incomes above $4,000. Low-income families spent more for medical care than for clothing, yet they spent only a third as much for medical care as the above-$4,000 group.

The average head of a low-income family was 63, and had an average of 8 years of schooling.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Toddler Set Destined For Fame, Any Grandparent Will Tell You

By Jane Goodsell

HAS THE HUMAN RACE stopped evolving? No, it has not. I'm happy to report that the new generation of babies shows a marked improvement over the rest of us. The toddler set is destined for greatness. Well, anyway, all the toddlers I hear about are destined for greatness, and my informants are people who ought to know. I've been listening to grandparents.

Take little Tommy, for instance. He's only five years old, but that child is clearly destined to be a scientist. Tommy's grandfather is absolutely thunderstruck by that boy's interest in things mechanical. The little lad is so full of scientific curiosity that he takes everything apart to see how it works.

With pardonable pride, his grandfather told me that Tommy not only removed all the knobs from the TV set, but he so thoroughly dismantled his grandmother's cuckoo clock that it took a professional clock repairman three weeks to put it back together again. Obviously, that youngster is headed straight for a Nobel prize.

Or take little Jennifer. At the age of three, she shows unmistakable signs of becoming a concert pianist. She's never had a lesson in her life, not one. Yet on a visit to her grandmother's house, Jennifer spend her every waking moment playing the piano. Oh, not the loud, crashing way most children bang on the piano, not at all. Jennifer has a delicacy of touch that is positively astonishing

To see her sitting there in rapt absorption, her little fingers fluttering over the keyboard and a positively ethereal expression on her face—well, of course, her grandmother admits that she might be just a teensy, weensy bit prejudiced, but still, anyone would be impressed.

Michael is a different type entirely. Michael is destined to be an All-American fullback. He's only six months old, but you should see the shoulders on that kid! And the way he can grip a ball! And talk about lung power! It won't be too many years before that lad is charging 90 yards down the field for a touchdown!

SUSAN'S GRANDMOTHER disapproves of grandparents who brag about their grandchildren but, nevertheless, she has to admit that Susan is something special. She's only six months old, but she's already talking! With her very own ears, her grandmother heard Susan ask for a drink of water, just as plain could be. She held out her hands and said, "Wa-wa!" Now maybe you'll think the child didn't know what she was saying, but obviously this wasn't the case because when her Grammy brought her a drink of water, Susan smiled and said, "Da-da!" Now isn't that something! Imagine a child that age saying, "Thank-you"!

On the other hand, there's nothing precocious about little Sara. She's just a perfectly normal child, as natural and unspoiled as she can be. There's just one thing her grandmother can't help mentioning: Sara has an uncanny resemblance to Shirley Temple—when Shirley was Sara's age, of course. And the amazing thing is that Sara, like Shirley, is a born mimic. Why, you ought to hear her sing the songs from "Bye, Bye, Birdie." She knows practically every one of them by heart. Just picked them up.

Considering the shape the world is in, it's consoling to know that the next generation is so full of gifts and promise.

"That does it, Hooper, we'll file bankruptcy papers at once!"

$1.5 Billion Extension:

Senate Group Clears Added Public Works

local projects previously authorized but again lacking specifically appropriated funds.

To be eligible for APW funds, an area was required to be suffering from an unemployment rate of 6 percent or higher in nine of the preceding 12 months or to be classified as a "redevelopment area" under strict standards.

The federal share of financing for a state or local project can run between 50 and 75 percent, but each state is required to increase its own capital outlays by approximately the amount of the federal grant to ensure that its own projects are carried forward as previously planned.

Jobs Running Out

The AFL-CIO in testimony before committees of both houses has warned that the $880 million appropriated under the 1962 program has "all been committed" and that unless new funds are authorized and appropriated the 200,000 jobs created for otherwise jobless construction workers will run out as projects are completed.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany reminded the House Public Works Committee last October that the federation supported a "single-shot" accelerated public works program in 1962 only with the specific "proviso" that the program should be extended "if the national unemployment rate continued to exceed 5 percent."

"Unfortunately, unemployment still exceeds that rate," and "all evidence indicates that it will continue to exceed it during the year that lies ahead," he testified.

"Unemployment remains our No. 1 economic problem," and it would be a "tragedy" if the special works program, "which creates public improvements of lasting worth" in addition to creating jobs, "were allowed to die," he declared.

2 Million on Part-Time

The official figures on joblessness, Meany pointed out, "understate the real extent of the problem." In addition to the large number of people "officially reported as unemployed, there are more than 2 million compelled to work only part-time because full-time jobs are not available," he said.

Citing Prof. Charles Killingsworth of Michigan State University, Meany told the House committee that a "true measure" of available working time lost through joblessness and underemployment would run at 8.8 percent instead of the officially cited 5.5 percent.

The ending of the accelerated public works program, he re-emphasized, "would be a tragedy."

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller in testimony before the McNamara Senate subcommittee re-emphasized the value of the now-expiring program as "a most effective weapon for creating jobs—good jobs on needed public facilities of permanent worth."

Without additional money, he said, "the 200,000 jobs [the program] is currently providing will vanish," and he said, "this must not happen."

The record shows, he said, that after the $880 million provided by Congress for the initial program had been committed, states and communities continued to seek funds in substantial amounts, so that the "backlog" as of January 1963 exceeded the amount originally made available.

The $880 million appropriated is paying half the cost of nearly 8,000 projects in more than 3,000 communities where unemployment is "most severe," Biemiller observed. The projects "are not only putting people to work; they are also helping to create the basis for future economic growth and well-being," he added.

On completion, the projects "will have generated 220,000 years of work in on-site employment and in the production of materials and supplies," he continued. The facilities made possible by the program "will establish permanent jobs" beyond the construction jobs, he pointed out.

Bigger Program Urged

The AFL-CIO would prefer a $2 billion new authorization for accelerated public works—half a billion more than that proposed in the McNamara bill, Biemiller urged.

"A federal effort of this magnitude, plus the supplemental state and local matching funds, would stimulate almost $4 billion in construction projects, at the right time and in the right places," he said.

This outlay, according to Dept. of Labor studies, would "directly create about 400,000 badly-needed jobs in on-site construction and the production and distribution of materials and equipment" and "another 200,000 to 400,000 indirectly."

"These are jobs America badly needs," he said. "What we are talking about is one avenue toward the implementation, at long last, of the Employment Act of 1946."

Housing For Elderly Still Short of Needs

More than four times as many federally-aided housing units were available to the elderly at the end of 1963, or were being prepared for them, than at the end of 1960, but no more than a modest dent has been made in the demand, according to a report to Housing Administrator Robert C. Weaver.

A total of 133,211 units built with some form of federal assistance had been erected, were under construction or were in planning at the end of last year, the report said. Nearly 50,000 units had been completed or were authorized in 1963 alone, it added.

The report also pointed out that nearly 3.2 million elderly families—nearly half of all elderly families—have incomes of less than $3,000 a year; that about the same number of elderly individuals who had no families or relatives have incomes of less than $2,000, and that the 1960 census classified as deficient, more than 2.7 million dwelling units where the head of the household was 65 or older.

Three programs of aid to housing for the elderly are open—public housing, with 83,760 units occupied or under contract; direct long-term, low-interest loans to private nonprofit corporations, consumer cooperatives and public agencies for rental, 14,126 units; and FHA-insured mortgages for rental housing owned by a public body, a nonprofit organization or a profit-motivated sponsor, 35,325 units.

Pres. Johnson has asked Congress to extend both the public housing and direct loan programs for the elderly as part of housing and community development legislation.

THESE FOUR SCENES OF MEN AT WORK are samples, from the single state of Pennsylvania, of the useful local projects made possible by the Accelerated Public Works Act of 1962. From the top down, men are working on a hospital addition in Pottsville that will employ 100 at peak construction; then a sewage treatment plant at Tamaqua, employing 50; next an addition to and remodeling of Mercy Hospital in the namesake home town of Pennsylvania's Gov. William W. Scranton (R), to employ a maximum of 60; at the bottom, a sewer system for Orwigsburg, where 45 will be employed. Overall cost of these four projects will be $7,383,000, toward which the federal government is contributing $3,887,000. States and localities put up the rest of the money in matching funds. All four of the construction jobs shown are under union contract.

$5,000 in Aid Sent Southern Rights Group

The AFL-CIO's check for $5,000, voted, as a contribution to the Southern Regional Council by the Executive Council on May 20, has been transmitted by Federation Pres. George Meany in a letter expressing the hope that the "long and friendly association" between labor and the Southern Council will be "maintained and expanded."

"We in the AFL-CIO," Meany wrote, "are trying to step up our own activities that will contribute to achieving first-class citizenship and equal opportunities for all Americans."

His letter enclosing the check was sent to two Southern Regional Council board members, former U.S. Sen. Frank P. Graham, one-time president of the University of North Carolina, and Pres. Benjamin E. Mays of Morehouse College.

The Southern Regional Council, made up of southerners drawn from both major races and from all major religious faiths in the 13-state region it covers, has been committed since 1951 to the aim of an unsegregated society.

It provides consultative services to private and official agencies involved in the problems of desegregation, carries on research, works with the press, radio and television, and serves as a clearing-house and coordinator for other agencies concerned with southern problems.

The council, one of its reports states, "seeks to be a practical organization, aiming at working solutions rather than spectacular pronouncements." It offers "no panaceas," the report continues, but tries to offer "a method in which representative citizens, white and Negro," can come together "in equal dignity to find the best ways to move ahead."

"NO HIDING PLACE," prize-winning television drama originally shown on the East Side, West Side program, has been acquired by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education as a 50-minute film, available for showing at union meetings at a $7.50 rental. It shows the reaction of a suburban community to the first Negro couple to buy a home there—and the effort of "blockbusters" to exploit prejudice and fears. Actor George Scott, right, is featured in the film and stars in the television series.

Wirtz Spurs Leadership In Job Equality Fight

Chicago—"Aggressive leadership by labor, industry and community representatives and equality in education and training are essential to equal job opportunities," Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz said here.

Wirtz was the principal speaker at a one-day conference for more than 1,000 community leaders from Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, Iowa and Minnesota sponsored by the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity. He also presided at a panel discussion on "the role of unions."

Summarizing the workshop session, he said progress has been made in unions, but more work remains, and passage of the civil rights bill will be a beginning in the fight to end bias—not a goal to achieve and then relax.

As vice chairman of the President's Committee, he brought the same message to the parley's luncheon session, declaring that the attack on discrimination contained in the civil rights bill "will be only a beachhead on the shores of disadvantage."

"I suggest that so far as equal employment opportunity is concerned," Wirtz said, "civil rights will become real only as there is developed a three-point program of civil responsibilities:"

- "There must be more total opportunity created, more jobs. Fair unemployment is no good; the goal is fair employment as part of full employment.
- "Equal employment opportunity will be meaningless except as there is real equality of educational and training opportunity.
- "Local equal opportunity programs must be developed within every disadvantaged community. They must be by the members of that community, and they must include the rebuilding of the whole structure of life and attitudes in that community."

Wirtz said employers, labor unions and the community as a whole have an obligation to counteract the inequality which has developed in connection with various education and training programs, including apprenticeship programs.

Members of the panel on "the role of unions" were Thomas J. Nayder, secretary-treasurer, Chicago Building Trades Council; Robert E. Hess, executive vice president, Minnesota AFL-CIO; William G. Caples, vice president, Inland Steel Co.; James H. Keml, president, Building Service Employes Local 189 and executive board member of the Chicago AFL-CIO, and John E. Cullerton, director, Illinois Dept. of Labor.

The panel of labor spokesmen agreed that achievement of equal job opportunity is a major responsibility of union leadership at all levels.

Other speakers included Illinois Gov. Otto Kerner (D); Mayor Richard J. Daley (D) of Chicago; and Hobart Taylor, Jr., executive vice chairman of the President's Committee.

Congress Speeds Pace; Rights Showdown Nears

Democrats, after extensive closed door caucusing, closed ranks to approve a one-year program carrying a $962.5 million price tag.

Its chief ingredients include a job corps for youths 16 through 21 with both conservation camps and residential training centers, a work-training program for unemployed youth, work-study grants to help college students finance their education and a large-scale program of federal grants for community anti-poverty programs.

It also provides a small-scale "domestic Peace Corps," a 5,000-member volunteer group to assist in anti-poverty programs.

The committee, at the request of the AFL-CIO and its Building & Construction Trades Dept., included a requirement that federally-assisted community construction projects be covered by the Davis-Bacon Act's prevailing wage provisions. Other committee changes to the bill opened the youth programs to women as well as men, and authorized grants to improve conditions of migrant farm laborers and set up day-care centers for their children.

In other House action, the Ways & Means Committee approved Administration bills temporarily raising the national debt ceiling and renewing for one year $1.9 billion of excise taxes.

As the backlog of House-passed bills continued to pile up in the Senate, leaders began talking in more detailed terms of the date final action could be expected on civil rights.

Democrats spoke hopefully of the second week in June; Dirksen told newsmen it is "a reasonable guess" that a cloture petition would be acted on in the week of June 15.

Sen. Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.), floor leader of the southern bloc, tore angrily into Dirksen and Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy who, with his key aides, was instrumental in reshaping a number of Dirksen's original group of proposed amendments to the bill.

Russell told Dirksen that his support of the civil rights bill "has killed off a rapidly growing Republican Party in the South, at least so far as his party's prospects in the presidential campaign are concerned. He may not have defeated any Republican representative from the South. They know on which side of the street to walk on this issue. But if he has not killed the chances that any Republican presidential candidate might have had in carrying any southern state in November, I am badly deceived."

Earlier Humphrey told the Senate that the leadership's package of amendments can be amended on the floor if a majority so decides. "But let us soon come to the time where votes will be possible," he added, "where the Senate can begin to legislate instead of procrastinate."

Labor Body Rejects CofC Affiliation

Kitchener, Ont.—The Kitchener-Waterloo Labor Council of the Canadian Labor Congress has voted unanimously to reject an invitation to join the Kitchener Chamber of Commerce.

The council cited "basic differences in objectives and beliefs" which, it said, "made it impossible" to link itself with the CofC.

In Virginia Case:

High Court Orders School Reopening

tions to the support of private, segregated schools for whites was unconstitutional. Two justices, Tom C. Clark and John M. Harlan, dissented as to the steps federal courts might take to compel the reopening of the schools.

Case Harks to 1954

The court noted that Prince Edward school children were among a group of Virginia Negroes whose complaint that school segregation denied them equal protection of the laws was upheld by the Supreme Court in its landmark 1954 decision.

Tracing the "continued, persistent efforts to circumvent" this decision, the Supreme Court noted caustically that by this time the original plaintiffs "have doubtless all passed high school age."

While the Supreme Court 10 years ago mandated school desegregation with "all deliberate speed," the opinion said, "there has been entirely too much deliberation and not enough speed in enforcing the constitutional rights" of Negro school children.

Most white students in the county have been attending private segregated schools initially supported by state and county tuition grants and county tax rebates. Negro children and some whites were without formal education until this year, when a privately-financed free school association, established with assistance from Attorney Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, began operating an emergency educational program on a non-segregated basis.

In 1962, U.S. Dist. Judge Oren R. Lewis ordered Prince Edward County to reopen its public schools. His order was upset by a 2-1 decision of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals which ruled that only the Virginia state supreme court has the power to consider the "uncertain and unsettled" questions regarding the obligations to maintain a public school system throughout the state.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the appellate court, upheld Judge Lewis and sent the case back to him with instructions to see to it that Prince Edward school children get "their constitutional rights to an education equal to that afforded by the public schools in the other parts of Virginia."

In a separate case, the Supreme Court sent back for further lower court hearings a challenge to Atlanta's "grade-a-year" school desegregation plan. While acknowledging "Atlanta's commendable effort to effect desegregation," the court said the pace of desegregation should be considered in light of the long period which has elapsed since the 1954 decision.

N.Y. Teachers to Tutor Mississippi Children

New York—Twenty-five teachers in New York schools have volunteered to teach in Mississippi this summer to give remedial and enriched instruction to culturally deprived children, principally 10th and 11th grade pupils.

Seventy-five other teachers, all volunteers, will be sought in a campaign by the United Federation of Teachers here. By the end of June, the union hopes to have books, teaching aids, and $300 in expense money for each volunteer.

The union—Local 2 of the Teachers—joined the "Freedom School" crusade on the invitation of a Mississippi group called the Council of Federated Organizations. Council members are active in the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Congress of Racial Equality and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

The Freedom School concept will be carried out on two levels, according to UFT Pres. Charles Cogen and Chairman Richard Parrish of the union's human relations committee. One will consist of boarding schools where 150 to 200 pupils may live on campus, and the other of a mobile school visiting smaller communities around the state.

The program will be aimed at helping the average or poor-but-promising student who needs remedial work in reading, composition and mathematics; and the better-than-average student who needs a broader, more intensive education.

Cogen noted that Mississippi ranks 50th and last among the states in per capita expenditures for education. He added that 70 percent of Negroes over 25 have four years or less of schooling, and 93 percent of Negro high schools in the state are not accredited for college admission of their graduates.

UFT members here pioneered the Freedom School concept by teaching last summer in Farmerville, Va., and other Prince Edward County schools. Negro children there had received no schooling since 1959, when county officials cut off the funds in a dispute just decided by the Supreme Court.

Louis Levine Honored by 800 in N.Y.

New York—Nearly 15 years of service to the sick, the handicapped, the underprivileged and the troubled among workers and their families was honored when labor and community leaders paid tribute at a dinner to Louis L. Levine, director of Community Services & Rehabilitation for the New York City AFL-CIO.

Eight hundred men and women joined to laud him for his devotion to the cause of trade unionism and of humanity generally. He was presented with citations by the local AFL-CIO, its Community Services Committee, the Greater New York Fund, Comeback, Inc., and from trade union counsellors he had helped train.

Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the central labor council praised him for the "tremendous" job he has done, saying he had "enriched" the labor movement by his contributions in the areas of rehabilitation and social services.

Other speakers included Chairman Michael Sampson of the local Community Services Committee, who presided; Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers, and Mary Switzer, director of the Vocational Rehabilitation Administration.

At Packinghouse Convention:

Helstein Asks Halt To Plant Closings

Kansas City, Mo.—A strongly-worded notice to the meat packing industry to halt the march of plant shut-downs, voiced by Pres. Ralph Helstein, brought a cheering endorsement from some 600 delegates to the biennial convention of the Packinghouse Workers.

With the union confronted frequently during recent years by loss of plants and jobs, Helstein voiced hope that "the word would go forth from this convention" to industry "that the threat of plant close-down is no longer a useful instrument in the collective bargaining process."

The UPWA president added: "We will no longer negotiate contracts that permit plants to close down and not operate, either in present or replaced form, for the duration of the contract."

How seriously the shutdowns have affected employment in the industry was evidenced in a report that while the union had gained more than 5,000 new members in two years, total membership had nevertheless declined slightly.

Poverty, Civil Rights Stressed

Helstein's speech concentrated heavily on the union's need to involve itself deeply in the national war on poverty, and to continue to place itself squarely in the struggle to gain basic civil rights for minorities.

The union's pioneering record in the civil rights field "is not enough," the delegates were told, and they were urged to take an active and constant role of leadership in close alliance with Negro organizations in the rights area.

Two of the convention speakers were Bayard Rustin, coordinator of last summer's civil rights demonstration in Washington, and Michael Harrington, author of "The Other America" and consultant to Sargent Shriver on plans for attacking the poverty problem.

Rustin defended civil rights demonstrations, saying that "from the beginning of our history most progressive actions began in the streets and not in the legislatures." He cited as an example the wave of sitdown strikes that helped speed enactment of the Wagner Act.

The civil rights leader declared "We need white, black and brown men to recognize that there is no freedom, no dignity, unless they have a job to support themselves and their families." He said the government should assume responsibility for putting men back to work "since private industry can't or won't do the job."

Harrington on Poverty

A similar note was sounded by Harrington, who said, "Poverty will never be abolished until we implement the Employment Act of 1946." He described the "social cost" of poverty as "billions of dollars just to keep people alive and miserable."

He noted that the government has described poverty income as anything below a $3,020 a year level. "Yet by law we ordain a minimum wage that would earn a man only $2,500 a year," Harrington pointed out. If poverty is to be ended, he went on, "there must be an investment of money, energy and imagination."

Mrs. Mary Keyserling, newly appointed head of the U.S. Women's Bureau, told the convention that opportunities for employment of women are limited in too many industries or occupations.

The rate of economic growth, she said, has been moving too slowly, and needed legislation has not been passed. Mrs. Keyserling pointed out that nearly 13 million women workers are exempted from coverage by federal or state laws.

COURSE OF AUTOMATION in three basic industries—textiles, construction and machine tools—was described by Dr. Donald Schon, director of the Commerce Dept's Institute for Applied Technology, at one session of a meeting of research personnel of AFL-CIO unions, sponsored by the federation's Dept. of Research. Department Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger presided.

Lithographers, Photoengravers Approach Completion of Merger

Brown said the merger would enable the new union to meet the challenges of technological change, organization and collective bargaining. He noted that the New York local of ALA with about 8,000 members was not present at the merger convention. "We would rather have them with us and the door is still open, but we will proceed without them," he said.

The absence of the New York delegates, he added, is not in the best interests of the membership in New York.

Merger Benefits Cited

One of the great benefits of merger, Brown declared, will be to bring the Lithographers back into the AFL-CIO. The ALA had disaffiliated in 1958. The new union will be affiliated with the federation. The proposed merger received the support of the AFL-CIO Executive Council in August 1963 and was followed by approval of a merger agreement by the IPEU and the ALA at regular conventions. The memberships of both unions backed the agreement in referendums setting up the merger convention.

The Lithographers union was founded in 1882 and has 40,000 members. The IPEU was organized in 1900 and has 20,000 members. The merger, when finally approved by membership referendum—expected in time for formal proclamation of the new union on Labor Day, Sept. 7—will be the first in the graphic arts industry since 1900 when four craft unions in the lithographic field united.

Before tackling the constitution at the merger convention, the memberships of both unions had approved a merger agreement which laid out the broad outlines of the new organization and how it shall be created and function. The constitution spells out in great detail the actual structure and operating methods of the new organization.

In draft form, the constitution provides for a 10-year period in which both organizations have defined strengths and representation. During the first decade, the president of the new organization will come from the Lithographers and the executive vice president from the Photo Engravers. Under the merger agreement, at the effective date of the constitution the incumbent president of the ALA—Brown—will become president of the LPIU and the incumbent president of the IPEU—Hall—will become executive vice president.

The secretary-treasurer of the ALA will become recording and financial secretary of the new union and the secretary-treasurer of the IPEU will become treasurer. There will be four vice presidents from the ALA and two from the IPEU to be elected at their separate sessions here.

The new union's 25-member international council will have the 10 incumbents of the ALA and five from the IPEU to be elected at the sessions here, plus the officers. The votes of the individual members are weighted to provide for a 15-15 balance.

The draft constitution asserts jurisdiction for the new union over all forms of platemaking, including lithography, offset, gravure, photoengraving, intaglio. The ALA also includes lithographic pressmen.

Policies within the merged organization would be subject to membership referendum on election of officers, amendments to the constitution or issues proposed by petition of the membership.

The president's annual salary will be $20,000 with $17,000 for the executive vice president. The draft constitution provides for annual pay increases for each officer equal to the percentage pay increase in major bargaining contracts.

Under the draft constitution all existing locals of the two unions will be locals of the merged organization. Merger on the local level is to be accomplished as soon as practicable and shall be based on membership approval of the locals either at a local membership meeting or by referendum.

The new union will have biennial conventions, with the first one slated for August 1965. Headquarters of the LPIU will initially be in New York City.

Toy Workers' Record Cited In Bias Fight

New York—The Doll & Toy Workers may be proud of their record for seeing to it that "discrimination in employment or any other area of union activity has been unknown" since the union was chartered by the former AFL 12 years ago, delegates were told at their convention here.

An officers' report emphasized also that, in spite of job losses due to automated machinery and foreign imports, the IUDTW has gained several thousand members since the last convention in 1960.

Among 21 resolutions up for convention action was one, unanimously approved, calling for vigorous opposition to political extremism. Noting that many Americans are attracted by political candidates who "offer quick but extreme remedies" for economic evils, it stated the union's unqualified opposition to any candidate "who attempts to win votes" with extremist views conflicting with the basic views of organized labor.

Pres. Harry O. Damino reported that hundreds of toy industry jobs have been lost because of competition from products made in substandard labor areas, some made by American firms with overseas plants, selling for a fraction of their cost in this country.

It is his union's aim, he asserted, to help the labor movement bring labor standards abroad to a higher level more in keeping with U.S. standards.

Uranium Subsidy Ended by Canada

Ottawa, Ont.—Definite ending on July 1 of the federal government's one-year, $25 million uranium stockpiling program has been announced by Acting Trade Minister Harry Hays. An estimated 2,000 jobs will be wiped out.

Ohio AFL-CIO Convention Backs Hospital Care, Anti-Poverty Drive

Cleveland—Pres. Johnson received the unanimous support of the Ohio AFL-CIO convention in his campaign against poverty.

In a letter read to the 2,000 delegates by Secy.-Treas. Robert D. Bollard of the state central body, the President appealed to the Ohio unionists "to enlist with us in the war on poverty which we have launched."

The letter was presented to Bollard by Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Anthony J. Celebrezze. The secretary in a later address to the convention called for the passage of health insurance for the aged under social security as one means of helping the Administration in its efforts to wipe out poverty.

Legislation Backed

The delegates responded by unanimously adopting resolutions pledging the Ohio AFL-CIO to "support legislation designed to alleviate poverty in the United States" and calling for passage of the King-Anderson bill to provide social security old-age hospital care.

The President's letter also declared that "the time has come to stop just talking about civil rights and to act to put the full protection of the law behind the rights God gave every human being. The pending civil rights bill will be a major step toward achieving that ideal."

I. W. Abel, secretary-treasurer of the Steelworkers, told the delegates that "in the midst of affluence, we have the worst poverty and greatest slums that a society can produce."

The Steelworkers' official warned of increased political activity by big business and called upon labor to do more on the political front or "relive the past of broken unions and bread lines."

John W. Livingston, director of organization for the AFL-CIO, urged the delegates to step up their organization of workers. He said the number of unorganized workers in the nation had increased by 4 million in the last eight years and noted that while 40 percent of Ohio's workers were organized in 1956, the percentage now is down to 38. The state still ranks fourth in the number of organized workers, he said.

The convention adopted resolutions calling for the 35-hour week, retirement under social security at age 60 and the right to picket on public property. The latter resolution was aimed at the refusal of Ohio Turnpike Chairman James O. Shocknessy to permit peaceful picketing of turnpike restaurants.

Speakers on Issues

On the agenda for the remainder of the convention was "State Issues Day," when a series of speakers was to discuss state finances, mental health, reapportionment, fair housing, unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation. Emil Mazey, secretary-treasurer of the Auto Workers, and George L-P Weaver, assistant secretary of labor for international affairs, were scheduled to speak.

Debs Foundation Establishes Fund

Terre Haute, Ind.—Directors of the Eugene V. Debs Foundation voted to change the bylaws to provide for the establishment of a $250,000 endowment fund, the income to be used for the upkeep of the Debs home here and to finance educational activities.

The directors appropriated $5,000 from the foundation's treasury and received gifts of $1,000 each from the Meat Cutters, through Patrick E. Gorman, secretary-treasurer of the union and president of the foundation, and from Auto Workers Region 3, through Dir. Ray Berndt, a foundation vice president.

Trustees of the endowment fund are Berndt; Alexander Bookstaver, head of the AFL-CIO investment advisory, and Tilford E. Dudley, director of the AFL-CIO speakers' bureau.

Since 'One Man, One Vote' Ruling:

Major Headway Marks Drive For Equal Districting of House

Labor-supported campaigns to redistrict the House to ensure that congressional districts will be approximately equal in population have made significant headway since the Supreme Court last February, in a Georgia case, spelled out a "one man, one vote" doctrine.

One man's vote—if he is a city or suburban dweller—may not be worth as much as that of his country cousin in this November's congressional elections in all states. But court decisions indicate that by 1966 elections the most glaring inequities will have been corrected, and some have already been remedied.

Not Truly Representative

The AFL-CIO in its November 1963 convention called for "equality at the ballot box" for urban voters and urged establishment of congressional districts "of reasonably equal population and of compact boundaries." As presently constituted, the convention said, "the U.S. House of Representatives fails to be truly representative of the people, in violation of the clear intent of the Constitution."

An AFL-CIO News survey showed that three states have acted—Georgia, Connecticut and Colorado—and a fourth, Michigan, is in the process of redistricting. Federal courts in five other states, while permitting 1964 elections to be held on the basis of existing districts, have mandated electoral reform and court suits in a number of other states are pending.

Here is a list of the legislative and court redistricting actions:

Georgia—The Supreme Court's landmark 6-3 decision in this case held that the intent of the Constitution is that "as nearly as is practicable, one man's vote in a congressional election is to be worth as much as another's."

Georgia's congressional districts, which the court held "grossly" discriminatory, ranged from 272,000 in a rural area to 824,000 for the district encompassing the Atlanta metropolitan area.

Within a week of the decision, the state legislature adopted what the Georgia AFL-CIO termed a "good" redistricting bill consolidating two rural districts and dividing the Atlanta area into two—one primarily in the city proper, the other largely suburban.

Connecticut—A special session of the legislature set up six districts, ranging in population from 404,000 to 482,000, to replace the five districts of 319,000 to 690,000 which had been unchanged since 1911, and the one at-large seat created in 1931.

The State AFL-CIO said it has "congratulated the leaders of both parties for their successful agreement on a congressional redistricting formula which met the requirements of equal representation and preserved an equitable political balance in the overall state picture."

Colorado—Of several redistricting plans considered by the GOP legislature, the one adopted was "not the worst," the State AFL-CIO comments. But while it equalized the population, the legislature also moved an influx of Republican votes into the western district represented by Democrat Wayne N. Aspinall.

Michigan—With populations ranging from 177,000 to 690,000, inequities had long been obvious, but a solution proved hard to obtain from the Republican-controlled legislature. The legislature in 1963 adopted a plan which would have resulted in districts ranging in population from 306,000 to 490,000. A three-judge federal court last March ruled that this system did not meet constitutional standards and ordered the state's 19 House members elected at large unless an acceptable redistricting were enacted.

Both houses of the legislature, largely along party lines, have now passed a bill which a State AFL-CIO representative said meets the "one man, one vote" criteria, but was "designed to create as much political mischief as possible."

One effect will be to put four incumbent Detroit area congressmen into two congressional districts. Still uncertain, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, was the effect on the primary election schedule.

Federal courts have ruled that existing congressional districts in Texas, Maryland, Kansas and Alabama do not meet constitutional standards, but have stayed enforcement orders until after the November elections.

Lower Court Upheld

The stays followed a Supreme Court decision upholding a lower court decision that Texas must redistrict but instructing the lower court to consider the situation "in view of the imminence of the forthcoming election" and the early primary date in the state. Likewise, a federal court in Idaho put off a decision on a redistricting suit until after the election.

No firm guidelines have come from the Supreme Court on maximum degree of population discrepancies which might be permitted by the Constitution. The autoritative weekly, Congressional Quarterly, has estimated that an "ideal apportionment," overall, would increase both suburban and city representation in the House. Suburban areas would pick up an additional 10 seats and cities over 50,000 would gain an estimated six seats, mostly in the South, it stated.

Court Remaps Legislature In Wisconsin

Milwaukee — Wisconsin AFL-CIO leaders have hailed the action of the state supreme court in reapportioning the state's 33 senatorial and 100 assembly districts as the culmination of a long fight by labor for such action.

George Hall, Wisconsin AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer and chairman of the Legislative Committee, pointed out that labor for many years has been in the forefront of the battle to bring about redistricting "to restore the principle that one man's vote is equal to any other's."

Hall lauded Wisconsin Gov. John W. Reynolds (D) for his "untiring fight" to bring about reapportionment.

The state court's action followed a stalemate in the Republican-dominated legislature, which had sought to block any equitable redistricting. Bills of the GOP were vetoed by Reynolds and bills introduced by Democrats failed to pass.

At this point the court stepped in and took action. It was the first time in history that a Wisconsin high court performed a function that the state constitution requires the legislature to do. The court is also that first state court in the U.S. to redistrict a legislature.

Hall said: "This victory is particularly sweet to us as redistricting on a fair and equitable bases has been one of our most sought-for goals."

He pointed out that the redistricting gave urban areas more seats and that workers would be more equitably represented.

WILLIAM PACA Award of the Italian Confederation of Workers' Unions is presented to Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.) by Bruno Storti, left, confederation secretary-general. The award, named for only Declaration of Independence signer of Italian descent, hailed Bolling as a fighter "for liberty and justice for all men everywhere" in the Paca tradition.

Miami Mayor Loses Bid for Governorship

Mayor Robert King High of Miami, backed by liberals and labor, was beaten for Democratic nomination for governor by Mayor Haydon Burns of Jacksonville in Florida's May 26 primary, but promptly announced he would run again in 1966, when a special two-year term for governor expires and the state returns to a four-year term.

In Florida's Republican primary, Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) suffered a setback when a slate of convention delegates pledged to him was defeated by a substantially unpledged slate headed by GOP state Chairman Tom Fairfield Brown.

In Oklahoma's runoff Democratic primary the same day, U.S. Sen. J. Howard Edmondson and Rep. Victor Wickersham of the 6th Congressional District were knocked out of office.

Oklahoma's voters in a referendum made a last-ditch effort to maintain rural control of at least one branch of the state legislature by approving a reapportionment plan that bases the state senate largely on area rather than population. Decisions approving a generally similar system in Maryland and other states are now pending on appeal in the U.S. Supreme Court.

Former Louisville Mayor

In Kentucky, Democrats chose former Louisville Mayor Charles Farnsley to run against incumbent Republican Rep. M. G. Snyder in the 3rd Congressional District. Snyder, a right-wing spokesman, won in an upset two years ago.

In the Florida race for governor, the segregationist Burns beat High handily by an unofficial vote of 634,346 to 460,363, but High's showing was considered impressive in view of the fact that he was a surprise victor for the runoff primary against four other widely known candidates. It was his first statewide race. A moderate on civil rights, an advocate of a $1.25 state minimum wage law, he is also the first serious candidate for governor from the southern part of the state.

The Goldwater-pledged Republican delegate slate headed by Rep. William C. Cramer had open backing from the senator himself, and victory for the slate headed by the party's state chairmen, Brown, was a direct blow to his presidential candidacy. Brown said the delegates will "represent Florida the best we can" and expressed disenchantment with the Arizona senator's campaign.

Elliott Roosevelt, son of the late Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt, was elected Florida's Democratic national committeeman.

Winner of Democratic nomination for the Senate in Oklahoma was State Sen. Fred Harris, who beat Edmondson 273,992 to 175,941. Edmondson resigned as governor and accepted appointment to the Senate after the death of the late Sen. Robert S. Kerr. Harris, who had substantial labor backing, will run in November against Republican Bud Wilkinson, former football coach, for the remaining two years of Kerr's term. Jed Johnson, Jr., son of a former member of the House, beat Wickersham for the congressional nomination.

Gain in Union Membership Reverses Trend

A small gain in union membership in 1962 "may foreshadow a change" from the decline that has continued since 1958, a new Labor Dept. survey has reported.

Total union membership in 1962 was 16,586,000, compared with 16,303,000 in 1961—a gain of 283,000, according to an article in the department's Monthly Labor Review in which H. James Neary, of the Division of Industrial & Labor Relations in the Bureau of Labor Statistics, summarized the results of the survey.

Not only did actual union membership grow, the summary showed, but the number of union members as a percentage of the total working force showed a slight rise—from 22 percent in 1961 to 22.2 percent in 1962.

AFL-CIO unions accounted for 263,000 of the increase. Membership of AFL-CIO unions in 1962, the study showed, was 14,835,389 compared with 14,571,892 in 1961.

The survey reported the department's biennial examination of union membership. Most of the information it obtained came in the form of replies to a questionnaire mailed to all AFL-CIO affiliates and to unaffiliated unions that are interstate in scope. In a few cases the department derived its information from other sources it regards as authoritative.

"While membership in private industry declined by 541,000 in manufacturing and 86,000 in nonmanufacturing between 1960 and 1962," Neary wrote, "a significant increase (154,000 members) was achieved in government service. Most of this increase was in the federal service, reflecting both the combination of a long-term trend and, more significantly, the stimulation of a 1962 Executive Order giving official recognition to federal workers' right to organize. Since the bureau asked for an annual average dues-paying membership figure for 1962, the full effect of the Executive Order was not yet evident."

Neary recalled that union membership grew steadily between 1936 and 1956 to a peak of 17.5 million members and has dropped off since then except for a rise of 48,000 between 1958 and 1959. The total decline has been about 900,000.

'Trend Seems . . . Reversed'

"In 1962, U.S. membership was slightly below the 1955 level and the downward trend seems to have been reversed when totals climbed over those of 1961 by [nearly] 300,000," Neary wrote.

Since 1956, the survey showed, there have been "sharp losses" in union members in manufacturing industries, a "modest decline" in nonmanufacturing, and a "slow but persistent rise" in public employment.

Contributing to the 541,000 drop in union membership in manufacturing since 1960, the summary said, "were losses of 308,000 and 136,000 in metals and transportation equipment, respectively."

White collar membership at 2,285,000 in 1962 showed little change from 1956 and although it represented a 93,000 gain over the previous year, the summary says, "it must be viewed against an organizable potential of about 22 million" such workers.

"Moreover," the study adds, "about two-fifths of this gain is accounted for by two unions of federal employes surveyed for the first time. Thus, as in previous years, the evidence—rough as it is—points to a near standstill in union organization in the white collar field."

Labor Backs Substitute Bill As Rights Showdown Nears

Cloture Vote Set In Long Filibuster

By David L. Perlman

The Senate is expected to vote June 9 on a petition due to be filed by Democratic and Republican leaders to cut off debate on the civil rights bill and end—on its 74th day—the longest continuous filibuster in the nation's legislative annals.

If two-thirds of senators present and voting impose cloture, final passage of the civil rights bill is assured. The second key vote then would come on approval of a bipartisan substitute bill, acceptable to civil rights groups and the Administration.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wrote Senate Democratic and Republican leaders that labor believes the bipartisan substitute measure "will establish a workable civil rights program, providing no further amendments are adopted which would weaken it."

Urging the Senate "to vote for cloture, and to proceed to a prompt legislative resolution to this great moral issue," Meany declared:

"Unless debate is terminated, and the Senate allowed to work its will, the viability of the democratic process is in jeopardy.

'A Willful Minority'

"The civil rights of all Americans," he stressed, "should not be made the pawn of a willful minority."

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) and Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) announced that they would file their cloture petition June 6, which under the rules would bring an automatic vote one hour after the Senate convenes on June 9.

"To put it briefly," Mansfield said, "it's time to fish or cut bait."

Romney Calls Guard In Strike

Hillsdale, Mich.—Fear of violence still gripped this small Michigan community as imported strikebreakers reopened the struck Essex Wire Corp. plant under the protection of National Guard machine guns and bayonets.

The town's hopes for settlement of the bitter three-month-old strike were briefly rekindled last week when Gov. George W. Romney (R) sent in state troops to close the plant after clashes between armed strikebreakers and picketing members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers reached a new peak.

When Romney issued his original order, IUE Pres. James B. Carey quickly pledged the governor the union's "complete cooperation."

But the spark of peace sputtered and died when Romney rescinded his shutdown order and boosted the Guard force from 230 men to more than 1,000 in a city that has a population of 7,700. Labor-management talks

'Giant Step,' Says Senator:

California Boosts Goldwater Hopes

By Willard Shelton

Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona moved within clear striking distance of a first-ballot or second-ballot Republican presidential nomination by defeating New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller in California's key GOP primary.

The prospect thus unfolded of a showdown fight between a Republican self-described conservative and the liberally oriented Pres. Johnson in the Nov. 3 general election.

Goldwater's margin of victory was narrow—approximately 64,000 of more than 2.1 million Republican votes cast, or 51.4 percent of the total—but it came in the face of an apparent popularity drop that threw him into a late uphill battle to regain his strength.

He has won no primaries convincingly before, losing in New Hampshire and Oregon, getting less than half the GOP votes in Illinois and Nebraska against concededly weak opposition, but the California contest was considered a major battleground. His final-week campaign performance was rated by observers as effective.

Republican conservatives, who have argued that the party's "eastern power elite" had dictated the nomination of "me-too" candidates from 1940 through 1960 and that devoted party regulars therefore "sat on their hands" and "stayed home" on election day, appeared on the verge of getting a chance to test their theory that only a conservative can win.

Goldwater himself phrased the

'White Paper' Rebuts Digest ARA Article

Reader's Digest has been accused of "misleading and incorrect" statements in an article about activities of the Area Redevelopment Administration by ARA Administrator William L. Two weeks later Batt had received no reply from DeWitt Wallace, Digest editor to whom he addressed his May 18 letter enclosing a documented repudiation of specific charges.

The documented repudiation, referred to in ARA circles as a formal "white paper," charged

Labor Fights TV 'Smears' In Mississippi

The Mississippi AFL-CIO has urged the Federal Communications Commission to deny renewal of the broadcast license of a Jackson television station it says has served as a propaganda arm of right-wing extremist groups and attempted to smear the state's trade union movement.

Charges against Station WLBT were filed with the FCC by the state labor federation and its president, Claude Ramsay. The action was overwhelmingly endorsed by delegates to the recent State AFL-CIO convention.

The petition charged that the WLBT station manager, Fred L. Beard, employed the local John Birch Society coordinator as director of public service programming and used the station as "the semi-official organ of the John Birch Society, the White Citizens Council and other right-wing organizations."

Extremist commentators sought out by the station, the AFL-CIO said, used such language as "our lying, thieving federal government."

Court Defiance Cited

Beard, himself, the petition charged, has "editorially and personally" used the station to urge Mississippi citizens to disobey and resist the laws of the United States and decrees of federal courts. While Beard is entitled to express his opinions, the state federation said, the station should not be

Political Defense Fund Voted in Pennsylvania

Pittsburgh—The Pennsylvania AFL-CIO unanimously voted a boost in the per capita tax to create a special defense fund for political education.

The state central body's 4th constitutional convention voted to raise the per capita from 4 cents to 7 cents per member per month, effective July 1.

The resolution established the fund to be used for "voter registration of all union members and their families and all other citizens in our communities; realistic and effective get-out-the-vote activity, and a continuing education campaign on the issues."

The convention acted on the per capita boost to meet what it termed a "critical threat of 'right-to-work'" and to rally the labor movement to fight the "concerted Gov. William W. Scranton-Chamber of Commerce onslaught" which recently put through labor opposed unemployment compensation amendments.

In a news conference May 27, Scranton said he was opposed to a state "work" law and would veto such a bill if the legislature should pass it.

Several state AFL-CIO bodies in the South have voted over the past few years to raise per capita taxes for political education purposes, but Pennsylvania is the first northern industrial state to take such action.

Telegraphers, Western Union Agree on Pact

The Commercial Telegraphers, mobilized for a walkout at Western Union Telegraph Co. offices in major cities, won a new two-year contract for 24,000 employes in a settlement reached 30 minutes before a June 1 deadline.

The new pact, subject to a nationwide secret-ballot referendum of affected CTU members, provides wage boosts of 6 cents an hour this year, 7 cents more next June 1, or $9 this year for monthly rated employes, $11 next year; four-week vacations effective next year for 20 years' service or more; an increase in vehicle allowances to 70 cents an hour, up from 64 cents, for auto messengers; and other improvements.

An important gain, according to CTU Pres. E. L. Hageman, was management's agreement to reduce the amount of money deducted under the Western Union pension plan from a half to a third of any social security benefit received by pensioners. This applies to present and future pensioners, said Hageman, with some benefiting by up to $20 monthly.

The union represents all groups of employes from messengers through clerks, operators and technicians. It won a contract clause providing better treatment for employes who win a promotion. Under the new pact, walking and bicycle messengers will get 5 cents more an hour this year after one year of service, 5 cents more next June 1.

Not affected by the settlement are 4,500 Western Union employes in New York City, who are represented by an unaffiliated union.

A CHECK FOR $10,000 is presented by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson for use toward restoration of the Lincoln Room in Blair House, famous Washington residence diagonally across the street from the White House which for many years has been used for housing distinguished foreign visitors in Washington on state visits. Mrs. Johnson in accepting the gift, voted by the Executive Council last month, commented that it was "especially appropriate" that the trade union movement should participate in restoration of the Lincoln Room, named after the Civil War President because he frequently conferred there with his postmaster general, Montgomery Blair.

ARA Paper Answers Reader's Digest Attack

the authors of the Digest article—Digest staff writer Charles Stevenson and Eugene Methren—with numerous distortions of fact. Typical examples cited:

Charge: ARA had put up money for construction of an access road to a ski area at Sandpoint, Ida., "despite Idaho Health Dept. warnings that this could contaminate the municipal watershed" and that the town's water supply, in fact, was ultimately condemned.

ARA reply: Dr. T. O. Carver of the Idaho Health Dept. certifies that the water supply at Sandpoint has not been condemned and that the Health Dept. has not within the last two or three years warned the community about health hazards or contemplated condemnation.

Company Joins Rebuttal

Charge: That ARA made a loan to Technical Tape Corp. which resulted in the firm's moving a gift-wrapping division from Beacon, N. Y., to Carbondale, Ill., where ARA had helped the community transform a warehouse into a factory building. Thus the government "induced an industry to expand in one depressed area at the expense of another," the article declared.

ARA reply: Technical Tape, according to a sworn statement, from its president, Paul Cohen, did not even consider Beacon for its gift-wrapping operation because of lack of space, and employment at Beacon increased from 85 in 1961 to 358 in 1964. The firm's other operations in New York and New Jersey have added 20 percent to its 1961 employment, and the 428 persons working in Carbondale "represent new additional jobs and payroll for the company and the community."

Charge: Rice County, Kan., is an example of a prosperous region classified by ARA as a "depressed area."

ARA reply: Rice County during the Eisenhower Administration participated in a development program under the Dept. of Agriculture, and Congress directed that such areas be placed under ARA. The county itself, furthermore, filed a development program to make itself eligible for ARA activities.

'Gift' Really a Loan

Charge: ARA is "dressing up" an eastern Oklahoma area as a "palatial" state-owned resort without its "costing the state a penny."

ARA reply: The agency lent a state agency $9 million repayable with interest, which can hardly be described as "not costing the state a penny." The area has high unemployment rates—ranging between 8.4 percent and 18.7 percent (national average 5.4 percent for the last three months)—and the tourist facility is expected to provide about 1,500 jobs at the resort center and in tourist service enterprises.

The convention asserted that "the defeat which we suffered in the defense of unemployed workers" did not occur in the legislature, but "was fashioned at the polls . . . when the present legislature was elected."

"It follows," the resolution continued, "that the major contribution in the victory or defeat of 'right-to-work' in Pennsylvania will take place initially at the polls on Nov. 3, 1964. Of almost equal importance will be the success or failure—statewide or locally—to develop support in the broad community among the various groups which are or which should be interested in promoting the victory of free collective bargaining and union security over 'right-to-work' legislation."

Scranton was assailed in a separate political action resolution.

The Scranton program, it said, is "regressive." The resolution continued: "We have seen in rapid succession the imposition of the highest sales tax in the country upon its citizenry, the virtual emasculation of a none too vigorous civil service system, and an attack upon . . . the state prevailing wage act."

The convention acknowledged that Scranton had "done battle with" the Goldwater forces in the state, but said he had "refused to disassociate himself from Goldwater ideologies."

The State AFL-CIO vowed "to undertake in all ways possible and with all energies and resources available to it an immediate program which will qualify all of its members and their families as voters" and to "cooperate fully with the AFL-CIO national program for registration of all eligible citizens and to get out the largest possible vote."

The convention voted after hearing National COPE Dir. Al Barkan warn that "right-to-work" is not going to be defeated on the picket line or at the collective bargaining table, but "you are going to lick it in one place, and that is the ballot box."

Carl A. McPeak, AFL-CIO special representative on state legislation, described labor's recent victorious fight against "right-to-work" in Oklahoma, in which he assisted, and stressed the importance of worker registration and voting.

Assistant Sec. of Commerce Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., discussed the war on poverty in Appalachia, which he directs, and read a message in which Pres. Johnson said "the time has come to stop talking" about civil rights and to "write legislation to protect the right of all citizens in all parts of the country."

Other speakers included Pres. David J. McDonald of the Steelworkers; Msgr. Charles Owen Rice of Washington, Pa., veteran labor priest, and Dr. George W. Taylor of Philadelphia, noted arbitrator who was presented with the State AFL-CIO's Good Citizen of the Year Award by Pres. Harry Boyer.

Among other actions the convention called for the recognition of May 29, birthday of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy, as a day for rededication to "the vital, everlastingly sacred human goals" for which he lived and died.

AFSCME District Fills Post Vacated by Wurf

New York—Calogero (Charlie) Taibi, assistant director of District Council 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employes, has been elected executive director to fill out the unexpired term of Jerry Wurf, who was elected president.

Wire Plant Reopens:

Guardsmen Called In Michigan Strike

which had been resumed following the plant closing have again bogged down and community resentment against the company is running high.

Most of the town is on the side of IUE Local 810, which struck the plant Feb. 28. The strike followed three months of fruitless negotiation on a new contract after the local won an NLRB election last November and replaced the Teamsters as bargaining agents for 180 production workers.

It was out-of-state importation of armed "security guards" and strikebreakers, and the violence that followed in their wake, that put the final stamp of community disapproval on a company which reportedly was resented earlier for its lack of civic concern and participation.

Guards 'Trigger-Happy'

Resentment has also turned in the direction of Romney. Early in May a citizens committee took to Romney a petition signed by 700 Hillsdale residents urging that he either order the armed guards removed or close the plant. The committee described the guards as "trigger-happy" and showing "complete irresponsibility and disregard for public safety, even for the safety of school children and smaller ones at play."

Romney turned down the request, asserting he had no authority to act.

He did act last week after one picket was slashed by a strikebreaker and other unionists narrowly escaped injury from a shotgun blast aimed at them by a plant guard. Previously, pickets had been run over by strikebreakers' cars, cut by hurled pieces of glass and injured in a wild free-for-all in which axes and hammers were principal weapons. Sheriff Ralph Gilbert's car was stoned by company guards.

Townspeople wanted the plant to stay closed until the strike was settled. The reopening came after the company threatened court action and newspaper editorials complained that the shutdown was aiding the union. Romney's action, just short of martial law, was taken under his "public emergency" powers.

With the plant reopened, Romney extended National Guard control to all of Hillsdale County and imposed a 10 p.m. to 6 a.m. curfew. He said the broadened order was necessary because "threats to public life and property are more serious than realized" and that hired strikebreakers were driving to the plant from distant areas. The plant is about 90 miles southwest of Detroit.

Romney criticized the conduct of both union and management in the dispute, but levelled his sharpest attack against Essex Wire Pres. Walter Probst, who fought both the plant closing and resumption of negotiations.

This marks the first time since the Auto Workers 1937 sitdown strike in Flint that National Guardsmen have been called out in a labor dispute in Michigan.

The use of imported strikebreakers—many of them ex-convicts—points up the basic weakness of Michigan's recent law dealing with strikebreakers. The statute prohibits the importation of "professional" strikebreakers; all at Essex Wire claim amateur standing. Many have come here from Indiana and some have been imported from as far away as West Virginia.

Reporters Barred

Romney has barred newsmen from the vicinity of the factory and limited union pickets to five. Guards have been disarmed and the work force is reported to number 40 strikebreakers.

Home of Hillsdale College, this has been a compartively peaceful community until now, with only the pranks of college boys to liven up things on occasion. Some townspeople doubt it will ever be the same again. IUE negotiator George Gould charges that Essex Wire management "has no intention of bargaining but rather is bent on wrecking the union."

Said one Hillsdale clergyman of the company: "It begins to look very much to me as though they've been taking pages from the Kohler strike and playing it page by page."

Sanctions Invoked Against Switchmen

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has notified all affiliates that the Switchmen's Union of North America has been found to be in non-compliance with the decisions of an impartial umpire under the AFL-CIO's internal disputes procedures and is therefore subject to sanctions under the federation's constitution.

The finding was reached by a subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council consisting of Meany and Vice Presidents Joseph A. Beirne and Karl F. Feller. Meany said it followed refusal by the Switchmen's Union "to withdraw from its efforts to supplant the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen as the collective bargaining representative of the yardmen of the Georgia Railroad."

The impartial umpire had found this action to be a violation of Art. XXI of the AFL-CIO Constitution. An appeal from the umpire's decision was denied by the Executive Council subcommittee.

In his notification to affiliates, Meany said that the Switchmen's Union, effective May 27, 1964, would be subject to the following provisions of Section 15 of Art. XXI:

"1—The non-complying affiliate shall not be entitled to file any complaint or appear in a complaining capacity in any proceeding under this article until such non-compliance is remedied or excused as provided in Section 16.

"2—The federation shall, upon request, supply every appropriate assistance and aid to any organization resisting the action determined to be in violation of this article.

"3—The federation shall appropriately publicize the fact that the affiliate is not in compliance with the constitution.

"4—No affiliate shall support or render assistance to the action determined to be in violation of this article."

The Switchmen's Union is the fourth AFL-CIO affiliate currently in non-compliance with an impartial umpire's decision. The other unions remaining in non-compliance are the National Maritime Union, the Journeymen Stonecutters Association and the Air Line Pilots Association.

Stressed by Convention:

UPWA to Demand Greater Job Security

Kansas City, Mo.—Proposals for greater employment security will lead the list of demands to be presented to major meat companies later this summer by the Packinghouse Workers, delegates to the 14th constitutional convention made clear.

Other contract terms to be proposed include a shorter workweek, a wage increase, overtime at double the regular rate, or at triple rates if there are employes in the department on layoff. The 600 delegates also endorsed a proposal by Pres. Ralph Helstein and called for a prohibition on plant closings without at least one year's notice and an opportunity given for work at replacement plants.

"Ruthlessly and openly the threat of plant closing has been used to foster a climate of fear in which to present demands that our membership relinquish contract rights and protections gained," the convention charged.

"The willingness of the packers to attempt to profit from this insecurity" was branded by UPWA as "contemptible."

The convention gave its support to a resolution endorsing the Dept. of Agriculture's action in holding beef imports from Australia and New Zealand to 1962-63 levels despite pressure from cattle growers to cut the imports. It was stressed that the increase in import volume of beef has come as an offset to declining domestic production of lower quality beef.

Jobs at Stake

Without a rise in imports of less choice meat grades, used in making sausage or hamburger, several thousand packinghouse jobs would have been eliminated, the resolution said.

Acknowledging that two-way foreign trade is vital, the union called for adequate provisions to protect those who lose their jobs as a result of increased imports.

All the union's officers were re-elected unanimously for two-year terms. Re-elected with Helstein were Sec.-Treas. G. R. Hathaway and Vice Presidents Russell R. Lasley and Fred Dowling. The union's nine district directors, who serve as executive board members, were also re-elected without contests.

Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman urged unions and farmers to forget mutual fears of technological progress in a joint search for new economic prosperity. He told the convention that farmers' concern that improved technologies would depress farm prices were similar to workers' worries that automation will destroy jobs.

Freeman conceded that the fears were "real enough, for we have seen farms and jobs disappear." But fear of technology "should not paralyze our minds and our will so that we fail to grasp that we can be the master of abundance and not its servant," Freeman went on.

"Agriculture is the cotter key holding 16 million non-farm jobs in place," the secretary said, "jobs producing what the farmer needs and processing and distributing what he grows."

The delegates applauded a filmed greeting to the convention from Pres. Johnson which urged support of his economic programs, especially the anti-poverty program and the quest for peace.

New York Teachers Elect Albert Shanker

New York—Members of the United Federation of Teachers, voting in a city-wide referendum, have chosen Albert Shanker as their next president. He won from Ben Mazen, 7,247-4,143.

Shanker will succeed Charles Cogen, whom he served as assistant to the president. Cogen led the union—Local 2 of the Teachers—during its successful fight for a first contract covering 43,000 city school teachers.

OVER 300 DELEGATES, both Photo Engravers and Lithographers, met in the opening joint session of the historic merger convention before going into separate sessions to approve a constitution for the new Lithographers & Photoengravers Intl. Union. Final approval of the constitution of the merged organization will be via a membership referendum with proclamation of the new 60,000-member union scheduled for Labor Day 1964.

Engravers, ALA Delegates Vote Constitution for New Union

Minneapolis—The first merger of graphic arts unions in nearly 50 years was unanimously approved by delegates representing the Lithographers and the Photo Engravers at a special convention here.

Final approval of the proposed constitution which will govern the new 60,000-member Lithographers & Photoengravers Intl. Union came a full day earlier than had been scheduled.

Several months of work on the document by committees representing locals of both ALA and IPEU were climaxed by a week-long meeting in advance of the convention by a 50-man constitution committee made up of officers of 25 of the largest locals in each of the unions. The delegates, who met in separate conventions until their final joint session, found nothing to differ with on concepts and only rare instances where a further merger clarification of language was required.

Approval of the constitution during a July-August referendum of the members of both unions will lead to the formal proclamation on Labor Day, Sept. 7, of the existence of the Lithographers & Photoengravers Intl. Union.

Pres. Johnson, conveying his "warmest congratulations upon this merger of two strong, democratic unions" termed it "an indication of the affirmative and progressive leadership of the two unions and of the enlightened attitudes of your memberships."

In his message, sent to the convention by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, the President declared: "Your organization, speaking with a single voice, will now represent a stronger force, not only within your industry, but also on behalf of the President's war against poverty, on behalf of equality for all Americans, for medical care under social security, and for world peace with freedom that our nation is pursuing."

Addressing a special joint session of the merger convention Sec. of Agriculture Orville L. Freeman told the delegates working on the merger that "for three years you have discussed this move, and I congratulate you for the vision and determination to see it through.

"Together," Freeman asserted, "you will not only protect the advances each union has made, but also will be able to secure even greater benefits for all your members."

Pres. John Connolly and Sec.-Treas. Wesley A. Taylor of the Bookbinders, in a message to the convention, declared "we know this merger will prove beneficial not only to your membership, but to the printing trades workers as a whole."

The officers of the new union will be: Pres. Kenneth J. Brown (ALA), Executive Vice Pres. William J. Hall (IPEU), Recording and Financial Sec. Donald W. Stone (ALA) and Treas. Ben G. Schaller (IPEU).

Vice presidents will be Walter F. Risdon and Henry J. Dillon of the Photo Engravers and Jack H. Wallace, Gus Petrakis, Richard J. Clarke and James H. O'Neill of ALA.

Representing IPEU on the new union's 25-member international council will be: Atlantic Region, Frank H. Ostertag of Newark; Central Region, Charles G. Thompson of Cleveland; Mountain Region, Charles R. Harris of Houston; Pacific Region, Kenneth H. Davis of San Francisco; and Canadian Region, Leslie J. Young of Toronto.

ALA international councilors are: Atlantic Region, George W. Luke of Buffalo, Theodore T. Meyers of Pittsburgh, Newton C. Quick of Schenectady, Milton N. Williams of Philadelphia; Central Region, Harry F. Spohnholtz of Chicago, George K. Gundersen of Chicago, John L. Petitti of Cleveland; Mountain Region, Edward V. Donahue of Minneapolis-St. Paul; Canadian Region, Roy Turner of Toronto; and Pacific Region, Earl Kinnery of Vancouver, B. C. The votes of the individual members of the international council are weighted under the new constitution to provide for a 15-15 balance of voting strength for 10 years.

Per capita taxes approved by the convention are $3.25 per month for journeymen and apprentices and $2.75 monthly for general workers.

Anti-Poverty, King-Anderson Bills Backed By Group Health Institute

Minneapolis—Strong support for Pres. Johnson's anti-poverty program and the Administration's bill for Social Security hospital and nursing home care for the aged was unanimously voiced at the 14th annual Group Health Institute here.

Sponsored by the Group Health Association of America, the institute brought together nearly 400 representatives of local group health plans, cooperatives and labor unions for a three-day examination of the "health of group health."

Speakers and members of discussion panels found the group health movement growing, with existing plans looking for means to expand their services and work more closely with labor and management in providing high-quality health care for wage earners.

In the non-profit group health plans, members and subscribers generally pre-pay a fixed monthly sum in return for comprehensive medical care provided by the plan's own staff doctors. Administration of the plans is ordinarily in the hands of the consumers, while professional medical matters are under the control of the physicians.

Many of the group health plans were created by unions, or have close ties with unions and cooperatives. In the past few years, the Auto Workers, Steelworkers, Retail Clerks, Meat Cutters and others have served as sponsors for new plans having membership in the scores of thousands.

UAW Vice Pres. Pat Greathouse, one of the principal speakers at the institute, recalled that the UAW, through "determined collective bargaining," had won a "relatively high level Michigan Blue Cross-Blue Shield pattern of service benefits" for employes of Ford, General Motors and Chrysler. But while labor is "uniquely responsible" for whatever success the voluntary insurance plans have achieved, Greathouse added, experience with them has not been "entirely satisfactory." He said the union became convinced "there must be a better way to achieve the kind of comprehensive, high quality medical care service benefits which our people require and demand."

The result, he said, was the Community Health Association, the Detroit group health plan the UAW was instrumental in creating. It now has a membership of almost 65,000 and the union is "delighted" with its success, Greathouse reported.

Steel Plans Cited

John Tomayko of the Steelworkers recalled successful union ventures into group health at Pittsburg, Calif., and Sault Ste. Marie, Ont.

Union members of the Steel Industry Human Relations Subcommittee on Health Care, he noted, are now developing a "practical, business-like approach" to making group practice plans available to steel workers and their families through creation of a dual-choice system.

Tamayko said the union hopes to enable its members to enter present plans where they exist, to "enlarge, improve and strengthen" the group health plans in other areas, and to help develop joint community group health plans where they do not exist but where "local circumstances permit such undertakings."

Mel Glasser, head of the UAW's social security department, urged joint action by existing group health plans to provide better care for workers suffering from mental illness. He called also for programs to manufacture or to buy medical drugs in large quantities "to make possible major economies for the consumer."

The resolution to support the President's anti-poverty program followed a speech to the GHAA by Hyman H. Bookbinder, former AFL-CIO legislative representative now serving as executive director of the President's Task Force on Poverty.

Johnson, in a telegram to the organization, "praised its role in working for the improved health of all our citizens" and expressed hope the "Administration's medical programs will continue to merit your support."

Kenneth McCaffree, an associate professor of economics at the University of Washington, was elected president of GHAA. A trustee and former president of the Group Health Cooperative of Puget Sound in Seattle, McCaffree has also had experience as an arbitrator.

Dr. Frederick D. Mott of Community Health Association in Detroit, the retiring president, was elected chairman of the GHAA.

Pan American, Engineers Sign New Contract

The Flight Engineers have announced the signing of a one-year agreement covering members who work for Pan American Airways.

The new contract provides pay increases, plus improvements in transfer and crew-basing provisions, effective June 1, 1964, termination date of an existing agreement. The parties also agreed, FEIA Pres. William A. Gill, Jr., said, to extend by one year the provisions of a voluntary arbitration agreement between union and management.

The new contract, signed one year from the date of an agreement on crew complement, took only three days to negotiate. Brown said emphasis in negotiations was placed on obtaining a short-term pact to "resolve some of the immediate working condition problems" of the engineers.

Gill called the agreement "an example of collective bargaining at its best," and said the union will seek similar agreements with American and Eastern Airlines.

Democratic Leader in Ohio Senate Elected State AFL-CIO President

Cleveland—State Sen. Frank W. King of Toledo, veteran member of the Bricklayers and Teachers unions, was elected president of the Ohio AFL-CIO and Robert D. Bollard was re-elected secretary-treasurer by delegates to the 4th constitutional convention of the state labor organization.

King, 52-year-old Democratic minority leader of the Ohio Senate, defeated incumbent Pres. David Kane, a member of the Bookbinders. The vote was King, 3,334; Kane, 1,279. Kane had been elected president at the 1962 convention.

Some 2,000 delegates attending the convention in Cleveland's public hall voted unanimously to continue the 41-year-old Bollard as secretary-treasurer. A former staff representative of Dist. 25 of the Steelworkers, he was appointed to the office last August by the executive board of the state body to succeed Elmer F. Cope, who resigned for health reasons.

The new president of the State AFL-CIO began a long and successful political career in 1949 when he was elected to the Ohio House of Representatives from Lucas County. He was a member of the Toledo City Council in 1950-51. Since 1953 he has continuously represented the 34th Senatorial District (Lucas County) in the Ohio Senate.

King was majority leader of the Senate in the 1959 session, following defeat of the so-called "right-to-work" amendment and the election of the first Democratic legislature in 10 years. Ohio workers made some of their most significant legislative gains in the 1959 session—approval of supplemental unemployment benefits (SUB), passage of Ohio's first FEPC law, increases in unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation, and liberalization of the laws covering the injured and unemployed.

He is a member of Bricklayers Local 3 and Teachers Local 250 of Toledo. He is apprentice training coordinator and instructor of bricklaying apprentices for the Toledo public schools.

Among legislative goals for 1965 adopted by the convention were:

- Reform of Ohio's tax structure, which places too much of the burden on low-income families, and opposition to "the enactment, extension or increases of existing regressive taxes such as the sales tax."
- An increase in unemployment insurance to two-thirds of weekly wages and extension of the payment period to 39 weeks.
- An increase in workmen's compensation to 75 percent of the claimant's average weekly wage.
- More adequate support of public schools but not by "regressive taxes."
- A fair housing law "to eliminate discrimination in housing because of race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry.
- A state minimum wage law "in line with the federal minimum wage law."
- A little Wagner Act giving Ohio workers, including public employes, the right of self-organization and collective bargaining.
- Legislation outlawing the use of professional strikebreakers.
- A prohibition against lie detector tests and television surveillance of workers by hidden devices.

In another resolution the convention urged the 1965 legislature to "give favorable consideration in the spirit of the American tradition of fairness by enacting a fair bus law which provides school bus transportation to all children regardless of the school which they attend."

The convention also went on record in favor of the 35-hour week, hospital insurance for the aged through social security and retirement under social security at age 60 with full benefits.

The Convention heard speeches by Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Anthony J. Celebreeze, USWA Sec.-Treas. I. W. Abel, AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization John W. Livingston, Auto Workers Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey, Assistant Sec. of Labor George L-P Weaver, and AFL-CIO Cope Dir. Al Barkan.

Israel Leader Hails AFL-CIO World Role

Israeli Prime Minister Levi Eshkol hailed the AFL-CIO as a "positive influence" throughout the world that "gives labor movements everywhere the confidence that progress through stability is indeed possible."

Eshkol, a founder of Histadrut—the Israeli General Federation of Labor—and head of a labor party government, made a special trip to AFL-CIO headquarters to meet with Federation Pres. George Meany, AFL-CIO vice presidents and staff members during his official state visit in Washington.

After conducting Eshkol on a tour of the headquarters building, Meany declared that the trade union philosophy "that the basis of wealth in society lies in the wealth and health and comfort of the people" has been translated in Israel into the philosophy of the state itself.

He hailed Israel as a state which not only opens its arms to peoples from all parts of the world but which in its practice of democracy has demonstrated that it "has a wonderful people, is a wonderful land and has a wonderful trade union movement."

Eshkol, in a brief address, recalled his role in the founding of Histadrut and found encouragement "that labor in many countries has shown itself capable of adapting itself to the new requirements of the modern age and to the challenges and opportunities of the changing international political scene." He added:

"From contacts with labor leaders—both in developed and less-developed countries, I can say that AFL-CIO is not only a central force in American progress. Its positive influence is felt throughout the world. You give to labor movements everywhere the confidence that progress through stability is indeed possible."

Israel, he said, derives "strength from the continuous expression of your fraternal solidarity. We feel your friendship not only in the broad question of our survival and progress. We are daily reminded of it through the institutions you have established in Israel."

He cited the "great stadium rising in Nazareth to bear the name of George Meany which will serve Jewish and Arab workers of the region," the Ladies' Garment Workers Union and David Dubinsky for the hospital serving the Negev region and an Auto Workers youth center in Holon named for Walter P. Reuther.

He cited also the joint effort of the AFL-CIO and Histadrut in the creation and operation of the Afro-Asian Institute and the cooperation with the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Belanger Defeated:

Textile Convention Re-elects Pollock

New York—The Textile Workers Union of America, at the union's 25th anniversary convention, re-elected Pres. William Pollock, Sec.-Treas. John Chupka and a full slate of officers pledged to their support.

Pollock defeated J. William Belanger, president of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO and a vice president of TWUA, 608 to 340. Chupka turned back Wesley W. Cook of Washington, also a vice president, 596 to 335.

Twenty vice presidents, running at large, defeated 19 challengers by approximately the same margin, as did three trustees backing the Pollock group. Previously the Belanger-Cook forces had held a 12 to 10 majority on the union's executive council.

The election was conducted by secret ballot under the direction of the Honest Ballot Association. The outcome was indicated on the opening day, when a credentials dispute precipitated the first roll call vote in the union's history. The Pollock group won by 2 to 1.

Pollock's keynote speech declared that sweeping changes in the textile industry, resulting in greater price stability and higher profit margains, coupled with a "friendly and understanding administration in Washington," promise to bring about a "new day" for the nation's textile workers.

Pollock noted that the textile industry, once described by Fortune magazine as the "last uncleared jungle of free enterprise" in American industry, was increasingly coming under the domination of large companies.

"This union does not favor monopoly, or its direct by-product, administered prices," he said. "But if the constantly-changing world we live in demands this kind of concentration . . . management must show a concern for something far beyond economic power and profits. . . .

"So I make this proposal to the managements of these growing giants:

"Go modern all the way.

"Don't stop with your machinery and your marketing methods; modernize your labor policies, too."

Pollock hailed recent shifts in policy of the National Labor Relations Board with respect to organizing rights, and urged use by the board of its power to seek injunctions against unfair labor practices.

In many other respects, he pointed out, textile workers have been helped by federal policies put into effect since 1961. He recalled that TWUA was the first union to endorse John F. Kennedy for president in 1960, and added:

Endorsement Urged

"The same considerations that prompted us to speak out in behalf of John F. Kennedy . . . apply to Pres. Johnson's candidacy now. . . . I urge this convention to go on record in support of Lyndon B. Johnson in November."

The convention heard R. Sargent Shriver, Peace Corps director who is also heading the anti-poverty program, praise TWUA as "long-time veterans" of the war on poverty. Sec.-Treas. John Chupka gave Shriver a $10,000 check as down payment on the union's quota of $61,000 for the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Fund and the John F. Kennedy Memorial Library, and pledged that the balance would be raised promptly.

Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress emphasized the common bonds between the two nations and thanked TWUA for its role in the Canadian labor movement.

FTC Crackdown Hits Phony 'Labor' Paper

The Federal Trade Commission has cracked down on the two operators of a self-described "labor paper" by ordering them to stop representing that the publication is endorsed by, affiliated with, or an official organ of a labor union.

The order names Joseph Lash and Eugene Serels as co-partners in both Trade Union Advertising Associates, Inc., and the Trade Union News, of New York City, "or any other publication." It adopts an initial decision issued last Dec. 8 by Hearing Examiner Loren H. Laughlin and climaxes a case brought to the commission's attention by the Intl. Labor Press Association in its continuing campaign to protect the reputation of the legitimate labor press and combat unscrupulous competition.

In addition to charges of "false, misleading and deceptive representation" to advertisers that the Trade Union News has labor union sponsorship, the FTC charged that the publication was misrepresented as the winner of national advertising and international editorial awards, and that the respondents placed "unauthorized advertisements" in the publication and then sought "to exact payment from such alleged advertisers."

The order adopted five specific "cease and desist" recommendations spelled out by the hearing examiner. They were:

- "Representing, directly or by implication, that said newspaper is endorsed by, affiliated with, or an official publication of, or otherwise connected with a labor union or trade union.
- "Representing that said newspaper was the 'Winner of the National Trade Union Advertising Award,' or 'Winner of International Editorial Excellence Award,' or otherwise misrepresenting that any of respondents' publication has been presented with an award or distinction as a result of a competitive contest.
- "Misrepresenting in any manner that competitive contests are or have been conducted by impartial and qualified individuals to determine the relative quality or merits of any of respondents' publications in comparison with competing publications.
- "Placing, printing or publishing any advertisement on behalf of any person, firm, or corporation, in any of respondents' publications without a prior order or agreement. . . .
- "Sending bills, letters or notices to any person, firm or corporation, with regard to an advertisement which has been or is to be printed, inserted or published on behalf of said person, firm, or corporation, or in any other manner seeking to exact payment for any such advertisement, without a bona fide order or agreement to purchase said advertisement."

Foe of Extremists:

Mississippi AFL-CIO Backs Ramsay Stand

Jackson, Miss.—Pres. Claude Ramsay of the Mississippi AFL-CIO, an outspoken foe of right-wing extremist groups, won easy re-election and a strong vote of confidence for his policies at the state federation's biennial convention here.

Delegates adopted a resolution branding the John Birch Society and other "radicals of the far right" as "subsersive" and equally as dangerous to democratic institutions as the Communists. "Masquerading as patriots," the resolution said, the radical right groups "are constantly injecting their poison into the minds of the people."

Earlier Ramsay warned the delegates that state laws enacted "under the guise of segregation maneuvers" include anti-picketing and anti-boycott legislation that could become weapons against Mississippi's trade unions.

Ramsay charged that "hate groups" in Mississippi had singled out officers of the state AFL-CIO for attack because "the labor movement in the state has been making progress" and its opponents hoped to "destroy the movement" by destroying the leadership.

In a contest for the presidency, Ramsay was elected to a third term as president by better than a 4-1 margin. Re-elected also were Sec.-Treas. Thomas Knight, who was unopposed, and Vice Presidents James E. Clark, C. E. Shaffer and Marvin Taylor.

Delegates voted twice to support the action taken by the officers in asking the Federal Communications Commission to refuse a license renewal to a Jackson television station, WLBT.

The resolution, which denounced the station for having "deliberately and fraudulently attempted to discredit the Mississippi State AFL-CIO and its officers" and operating as a forum for the radical right, was first passed by a voice vote. After a local newspaper reported the vote as "close" and said Ramsay ignored calls for a standing vote, angered delegates gave a convincing refutation of the news story. They passed the resolution again by a standing vote of 198-12.

Delegates gave a standing ovation to Mississippi's Pulitzer Prize-winning editor, Mrs. Hazel Brannon Smith of the Lexington Advertiser, who told the convention:

"The second half of the 20th Century belongs to the South if we can put aside our racial prejudice and hate and join forces with the progress of our republic."

She told her fellow-Mississippians that the time has come to organize the "great silent majority" and speak out against groups seeking to control their thinking.

"The time has come in this state," Mrs. Smith said, "to join the rest of the nation and tell the Citizens' Council to go to hell."

The convention heard labor's political role stressed by Deputy COPE Dir. Joseph M. Rourke and Area COPE Dir. Daniel A. Powell. Earlier a report on the Mississippi political education program by Knight charged that the state political race last year "reached an all-time low" which made it difficult "to get the truth to the rank and file members due to the walls of confusion, propaganda, mud and slime and gutter politics."

Despite these obstacles, Knight said, labor mailed out 125,000 pieces of literature on the issues and candidates and helped elect a majority of COPE-endorsed candidates.

Stanton E. Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and local central bodies told the delegates that collective bargaining by itself cannot solve "today's complex problems." It is the "peculiar responsibility" of labor's central bodies, Smith said, to help make democratic government responsive to the views of the people.

Also on the convention program was the Rev. L. J. Toomey, director of the School of Industrial Relations at Loyola University in New Orleans, who declared that if the nation fails to live up to its "profession of faith as outlined by the Constitution, we will probably not survive and we do not deserve to."

closed to the dissenting views of others.

The petition also accused the station of:

- Attempting to discredit the Mississippi AFL-CIO, including an unlawful attempt to influence a National Labor Relations Board election.
- Falsely accusing Ramsay of having attempted to block the showing of an anti-Communist film, even though the charge was without foundation and was publicly retracted by the person who had made it.

Filing of the petition came after a two-year check of the station's programming by the state central body. The petition pointed out that the Mississippi AFL-CIO is made up of citizens and television viewers who are entitled to a fair presentation of matters affecting their interests "without slanting, bias, distortion or prejudicial programming."

Ramsay said in a statement that "the time has come for the people of Mississippi to free themselves of the radicals of the far right, who are equally as dangerous as the radicals of the far left . . . Under the pretense of preserving freedom and the Constitution, these extremists and their 'front' organizations would destroy our government and our Constitution."

NEW HALL OF HONOR in Dept. of Labor is dedicated with unveiling of a plaque jointly honoring the Clothing Workers and the Hart Schaffner & Marx Co. for more than half a century of constructive labor-management relations. Shown, from left, are: ACWA Exec. Vice Pres. Hyman Blumberg, ACWA Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum, Hart Schaffner & Marx Pres. John Gray, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and ACWA Vice Pres. Bessie Hillman. Potofsky, Rosenblum and Mrs. Hillman were among the company's employes who walked the picket line for four months in the historic 1910 strike.

Rail Firemen Meet on Rules Arbitration

Chicago—National officers, general chairmen and staff personnel of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen met here to deal with issues raised by arbitration board rulings in the work rules dispute, and to chart the future course of the brotherhood.

Pres. H. E. Gilbert said the 250 BLF&E leaders would review the forced arbitration of the fireman-helper question, with a vote due.

In his call for the meeting, Gilbert said the union's membership is being subjected to unfair treatment by some managements under the compulsory arbitration award which, he said, forced many men off their jobs and forced some railmen out of the industry.

'We have run into such inhuman treatment by some managements that we find it hard to believe," Gilbert declared. He cited the "critical situation" on the Elgin, Joliet & Eastern Railroad as a major example of employes with many years of service ordered to work far from their home base and barred by a court order from defending themselves against management actions.

CITY POLICE and U.S. marshals in Lansing, Mich., have their hands full trying to remove wives of union railroaders from a picket line at a Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad crossing. Thirty wives picketed the Lansing crossing after an earlier demonstration in Grand Rapids, protesting layoffs and transfers of male members of Lodge 265, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen. The men were barred from demonstrating by a court order. Three women were arrested on charges of resisting an officer.

'Hall of Honor' Praises Era of Labor Peace

A union and a company which forged more than half a century of industrial peace after a bitter four-month strike shared the honor of launching a new Hall of Honor in the U.S. Dept. of Labor.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz opened the exhibit hall by unveiling a plaque hailing the joint contribution to "the private democracy of labor-management relations" by the Clothing Workers and the Chicago firm of Hart Schaffner & Marx.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany praised the company's acceptance of the role of trade unions just as "the trade union movement accepts without reservations" the private enterprise system.

Meany suggested that it is time the "leading business associations" in the United States "try to follow in the footsteps of some of their members" in relations with unions.

On hand for the dedication were three veteran officers of the ACWA who had walked the picket lines together during the historic strike—Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum and Vice Pres. Bessie Hillman, widow of Sidney Hillman, leader of the strike and ACWA's founding president.

Potofsky and John Gray, president of Hart Schaffner & Marx, spoke of how the company and the union had worked to build a solid foundation of labor-management relations which proved durable enough over the years to resolve the day-to-day problems which arose. They both praised Wirtz for having conceived the idea of a Hall of Honor to mark "notable achievements in the living history of labor-management relations in America."

Later, at an informal luncheon, there were reminiscences of the days when Potofsky was a pocket maker for Hart Schaffner & Marx, when Rosenblum was a cutter and secretary of the strike committee, and when Mrs. Hillman was an underage worker who, she told the gathering, used to be locked in the washroom along with other child workers when the state factory inspector would visit the plant.

During the good-natured bantering between union and employer, Gray told the gathering that the relationship reminded him of the story of a teen-age boy struggling to carry a younger lad on his back.

"Isn't he heavy?" the boy was asked.

"No," came the answer. "He's not heavy. He's my brother."

That, said Gray, is how management feels about the union.

Wirtz Upheld On L-G Complaint

New Haven, Conn.—The 60-day period in which the secretary of labor may file suit in a union election case under the Labor-Management Reporting & Disclosure Act (Landrum-Griffin) is directory rather than mandatory, the U.S. District Court here ruled.

The court refused to dismiss a complaint filed two days late by Sec. W. Willard Wirtz asking that an election held by Hod Carriers Local 611 be set aside.

The law says a complaint must be filed 60 days after a member protests the conduct of a local union election. Local 611 asked for the dismissal on the ground it was filed 62 days after.

The court ruled the filing was timely because the 60th day fell on a Sunday and the 61st day was a federal holiday, and in addition ruled that the 60-day period is not a statute of limitations but rather a directive to the secretary.

Court Rules Union Must Arbitrate

San Francisco—The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals here has ruled that arbitration of a dispute between the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and the Square D Co. over an incentive wage plan is required by the language of a contract between the parties.

Refusing a National Labor Relations Board request for enforcement of a board order, the court said it agrees with company management that, in the absence of an arbiter's decision, the board has no power to determine that the firm committed unfair labor practices.

The NLRB had ruled that Square D violated the law by refusing to negotiate with IUE Local 1503 on grievances arising out of the operation of an incentive plan the firm refused to write into the contract.

Management claimed, and the court agreed, that the union waived any right to bargain or "grieve" under the plan when it accepted a contract with a "zipper" clause, foreclosing further bargaining for the contract term but providing for arbitration of disputes over language.

Moment of Truth

THE SENATE is fast approaching its moment of truth. After interminable weeks of debate it is nearing the hour when the question of how much longer a handful of men can frustrate the will of the majority is decided.

The move to impose cloture in the civil rights debate—to shut off debate and initiate "yea" or "nay" voting—was made possible by a bipartisan agreement on a substitute bill that meets the needs of reasonable men.

This bipartisan agreement will go a long way toward placing on the statute books substantive and meaningful legislation that can provide a sound legal base for equal rights for all Americans.

To assure that this legislation will in fact become the law of the land, the first job is to put an end to the 12-week-old filibuster by voting cloture. A vote against cloture can only be construed as a vote to continue fruitless discussion, to delay and deny equal rights to all Americans, to further subvert the democratic process.

Toward a Stronger Union

THE MEMBERS and the leaders of the Photo Engravers and the Lithographers, acting with painstaking care to protect all the equities involved, have put together a merger that holds great promise for building a stronger union in this area of the graphic arts.

The merger agreement and constitution for the new union—the Lithographers & Photoengravers Intl. Union—were carefully drafted and checked every step of the way toward final merger with the membership via referendums and conventions.

Local unions were deeply involved in the drafting and discussions. Now there remains one more step, a final referendum of the memberships of both unions before the new organization is formally born.

These are old unions, proud of their craft traditions and skills. The Lithographers date back to 1882, the Photo Engravers to 1900. They have served their members well in the past decades, but the time has now come where that service can be improved by building a new, single organization to serve the members better.

A Deserved Honor

THE LABOR DEPT.'S new Hall of Honor commemorating notable achievements "in the living history of labor-management relations in America," was dedicated with a plaque honoring the 50 years of industrial peace between the Clothing Workers and Hart Schaffner & Marx; the honor was signally deserved.

The ACWA history of collective bargaining with the Chicago clothing firm is firmly rooted as an example of how a union and a company can work out their common problems, an example that is followed today in thousands of peacefully arrived at collective bargaining agreements.

The sad fact is that conflict and struggle are too often the standards used to report on labor-management relations. The overriding majority of bargaining sessions are settled peacefully and in good faith. These are not news, are infrequently reported. Yet in a real sense it is this day-by-day handling of labor-management relations that has made America a strong and free nation. It is this overlooked facet of trade unionism that is honored in the Hall of Honor.

Showdown Time

Hits Burnham Book:

Msgr. Higgins Scores Rightist For Diatribe Against Liberals

The following is excerpted from "The Yardstick," weekly column by Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of the Social Action Dept., National Catholic Welfare Conference.

JAMES BURNHAM, well-known author and lecturer and an editor of National Review since its founding, recently published a book entitled "Suicide of the West" which takes the cake as the most uninhibited, free-wheeling, all-out, no-holds-barred attack on the so-called "liberals" written in this or possibly any other generation.

Burnham summarizes his book in one brief sentence. "This book," he says, "is a set of variations on a single and simple underlying thesis: That what Americans call 'liberalism' is the ideology of western suicide." He does not say that liberalism is necessarily responsible for the decline and possible disappearance of western civilization, but he does contend that liberalism "motivates and justifies" the contraction and "reconciles us to it."

What is this horrendous ideology that "Americans call liberalism?" In answering this question, Burnham first draws up a list of well-known American citizens from many different walks of life who "everybody knows" are "liberals."

But this, he hastens to add, is only a partial list. It is limited, in other words, to the "pure-bred, pedigree-registered, blue-ribboned, Westminster liberal champions." A complete list of those who subscribe to the "ideology of western suicide" would, he reminds us, include millions of others and notably "the Jewish and non-evangelical Protestant clergy, and not a few Catholic priests and bishops."

Strangely enough, Burnham's nerve seems to fail him at this point, for he neglects to mention Pope Paul VI and his three or four immediate predecessors in the papacy. And yet, by the logic of his own definition of "liberalism," he should have singled them out for honorable mention.

Burnham says it is not too difficult to devise "a fairly accurate diagnostic test" for liberalism. All you really have to do, he contends, is to ask the "patient" to answer yes-or-no, true-or-false, to a list of 39 sentences or propositions.

"A full-blown liberal," he maintains, will agree with every one, or nearly every one of these 39 propositions. A convinced conservative, on the other hand, will disagree with most of them, and a reactionary will disagree with all or nearly all."

For my own part, I have never met anyone—liberal, conservative, or reactionary—who would be foolish enough to try to dispose of all of these propositions with a simple yes-or-no, for many of them are very ambiguous, to say the least, and one or two of them are downright silly.

But that's beside the point. The point is that if Burnham's list of 39 sentences or propositions is really, as he contends, the authentic litmus-test of "liberalism," then Paul VI is a "liberal," and so were his three or four immediate predecessors.

A random sampling will suffice to demonstrate:

4. "Political, economic or social discrimination based on religious belief is wrong."

7. "The government has a duty to provide for the ill, aging, unemployed and poor if they cannot take care of themselves."

8. "Progressive income and inheritance taxes are the fairest means of taxation."

11. "The United Nations, even if limited in accomplishment, is a step in the right direction."

13. "Wealthy nations, like the United States, have a duty to aid the less privileged portions of mankind."

21. "We always ought to respect the religious beliefs of others."

ANYONE who has even a nodding acquaintance with the social encyclicals and other authoritative papal statements would find it as easy as rolling off a log to demonstrate, from the record, that these propositions are substantially in harmony with the teaching of recent popes.

For present purposes, I am not arguing, nor do I even mean to imply, that this in itself is any proof that these propositions are valid.

I am merely saying that if Burnham insists on using them as a quasi-infallible "diagnostic test for liberalism" on the part of certain Catholic priests and bishops in the U.S., he ought to be prepared to follow his own logic to the bitter end.

After all, when it comes to motivating and justifying the possible disappearance of western civilization, a few "liberal" popes are obviously more influential and considerably more dangerous than all the so-called "liberal" priests and bishops of the U.S. put together.

I realize, of course, that Burnham would look a little foolish if he were to try to persuade the American public that the papacy has been and is today guilty of all the grievous faults which he nonchalantly ascribes to other lesser "liberals."

But if the future of western civilization is really at stake, he ought to have the courage to put aside all human respect and come right out and call a spade a spade, regardless of the consequences.

Morgan Says:

Shift in Age Groups to Pose New Problems in Adjustment

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

THIS IS THE COMMENCEMENT address season. The President of the United States opened it officially at the University of Michigan. This is the time when public figures appear on the campuses across the nation and eloquently challenge graduating seniors to succeed by solving the world's ills which the speakers' own generation helped to cause and complicate. The planet with all its throbbing problems is a rather dubious graduation present for even the hopeful young, but there it is, a hand-me-down not without some value.

Morgan

To keep pace and company with this quickie age of instant food, instant drink, instant beauty, instant election returns and instant everything I was about to invent the instant graduation speech—dehydrated cliches dissolvable in a wash of sentimentality—when two developments stayed my ingenious hand. One is the projection of the demographers, the population experts, that by 1975 half the citizens of the United States will be under 26 years of age. The second was the lead story in a Wall Street Journal issue which reported that in order to help employes meet the problems of old age a number of companies are sponsoring retirement schools.

How quickly the shoe is being fitted to the other foot. Before we know it teen-agers will be the commencement orators, telling graduating classes of senior citizens how to meet the new challenges of a world they thought they were leaving behind. Obviously such a switch in circumstances calls for a quick change in my recipe for instant elocution.

But what a vista of opportunities this revolving picture suggests. Of course, with the population shift in age groups will come other changes. No longer a minority group, youngsters will be more sure of themselves, less rebellious, and instead of juvenile delinquency, the truant officers will be confronted with a spate of lawlessness by frustrated, misunderstood senior citizens. There is a fruitful moral theme for a 19-year-old spellbinder before a graduating class of octogenarians at Cozy Corners State Retirement College for the Elderly.

We can reasonably expect that those Easter weekend riots that have been nightmares for beach resort police surrounded by beer-drinking, window-breaking, sap-running undergraduates will be replaced by the hi-jinx of maturity in which a recently retired chairman of the board is sloshing through the fountain of youth on a dead run in pursuit of a pensioned secretary who has just had her face lifted, her hormones rebalanced and her life's purpose refreshed.

The retirement school curricula reported by the Wall Street Journal includes such rewarding studies as how to live on a reduced income, how to pick the Shangri La of retirement, what to do about ill health and learning to ride a hobby.

However, the Journal's dispatch continues, in its admirable tradition of candid journalism, that "a few hours of advice and discussion obviously can't eliminate all the troubles of the elderly, and some of the tips offered workers in retirement courses appear to be of dubious value. One retirement booklet (for example) suggests retired people economize by making their own greeting cards out of cut-up seed catalogs and observes that back-yard dandelions, pokeweed, chicory and other weeds make 'delicious and nutritious' eating."

Dubious value, indeed. There is on the contrary something touchingly refreshing about the suggested spectacle of small bands of senior citizens, like fat and well-adjusted sheep, happily foraging on the lawn for dandelion greens.

THE JOURNAL dispatch concludes with a sage piece of advice: don't move in with the children. (I know of some families who would like to move the children out now but that may be a non sequitur beside the point.)

The paper quotes a University of Chicago retirement booklet as follows: "There is growing evidence that most older people not only want to live apart from their children but are better off living alone in their own way just as long as possible. Few roofs these days are large enough to give each generation in a three-generation house the personal freedom it needs."

Well, there goes togetherness. As for personal freedom, that is what an open society is supposed to be all about. The problem of mixing freedom and security in proper proportions so that individuality will flourish, not wilt, calls for a recipe that nobody has quite come up with yet in any full measure of satisfaction. The search for it provides a thoughtful commencement theme for a graduating class of any age.

Washington Reports:

Special Effort Urged to Combat Extreme Poverty in Appalachia

NO ONE HAS a job. The man lives with his family in a completely dilapidated shack. They have no central heating, plumbing or lighting and, of course, no one ever heard of a telephone. The road there is in most cases just a foot path. Even a jeep can make it only part of the way. The family usually has a small potato patch; potatoes are their major staple of a diet to carry them through the winter.

Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., under secretary of commerce and chairman of the President's Appalachian Regional Commission, thus began his description of a typical part of the 10-state area that comprises Appalachia.

Interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program carried on 700 radio stations, Roosevelt said that most of the people in the area "live on food surplus commodities and sometimes a relief check. They are miles from any hospital. Children are often without shoes and cannot walk the miles to school in the winter, and that school is often a one-room shack with a leaky roof and draughty walls."

Roosevelt said that although the War on Poverty program will aid Appalachia, the region also needs special programs. Before industry and business will come in, he said, roads must be built, sewerage plants and other facilities installed. He recommended replenishment of the once plentiful timberlands, development of the vast recreational facilities of the scenic areas, and aid to agriculture.

He declared that Appalachia should be a concern of all Americans for humanitarian reasons and also because the improvement of the area and aiding the people to get jobs will make it more productive.

"If we can upgrade the standard of living, the purchasing power, then they will be able to buy more dresses made on Seventh Avenue in New York, more cars made in Detroit, and other goods made all over the nation," he asserted.

AT PRESENT, said Roosevelt, unemployment in Appalachia is double that in the rest of the nation, and the per capita income is far below the national average.

The legislative authorization to start the Appalachia program would be for $228 million. Roosevelt explained that the part of it which has to do with retraining of unskilled workers, with education and health, would be taken care of under the overall Anti-Poverty program.

Since Pres. Johnson has placed the program high on his priority list, Roosevelt expressed optimism that it will be approved "by this Congress."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

SEN. GOLDWATER OF ARIZONA is conceded to be at the point of the presidential nomination in next month's Republican National Convention following his victory over Gov. Rockefeller in California's primary. If the appearance is ratified by the final result, the Old Guard which for years has demanded a "real Republican" as the party's nominee will have won its heart's desire.

Not only will the Old Guard have blocked a candidate more liberal than the GOP voting record in Congress; it will have successfully put over the nomination of a senator substantially more conservative than the majority of his party colleagues. He will be a candidate to the right of his party, not the left of it.

Sen. Philip A. Hart of Michigan, a Democrat but a careful man with words and a senator tolerant of the give-and-take of politics, put into speech the feelings of many who for many months could not believe that the Republicans would end up with Goldwater.

The Republican Party is "too responsible to do such a disservice to the country," said Hart. Goldwater's nomination might be in the best election-year interest of the Democrats, he suggested, but "in the long-term public interest" it would be a mistake to let the leadership and organization machinery of either great major party fall into the hands of a "medicine man" who thinks "everything can be cured by magic potion."

So many others have felt. But in fact Goldwater has a hard core of devoted followers; they carried California for him; and they must be rated as very likely to sweep him to the nomination next month.

THE RECORD SHOWS, abundantly, that the Republicans have never in this century nominated a candidate with Goldwater's peculiar set of qualifications.

Goldwater regularly shows up on the index of the highly conservative Americans for Constitutional Action (ACA) as having a 100 percent record for "adherence to constitutional government as interpreted by the ACA." Only eight other Republican senators and one Democrat, Sen. Frank Lausche of Ohio, share his top billing.

The Arizona senator is the only member, Republican or Democratic, who is shown on key rollcall votes selected by the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education to have voted wrong every time for as long as 10 full years in the Senate (1951-62 inclusive). The issues listed do not include so-called labor bills alone, but range across the field to include foreign policy, farm policy, civil rights, housing, education and taxation.

There is another key: the record of "bipartisan voting" as compiled by the authoritative reference publication, Congressional Quarterly. CQ reports the record of each senator in comparison to actions taken when majorities of both parties have been in agreement —a majority of Democrats and a majority of Republicans voting together for or against a bill or a resolution. Goldwater's record of concurrence on such "bipartisan" rollcalls is among the low ones.

An eastern liberal like Sen. Aiken of Vermont voted with the bipartisan (and Republican) majority 72 percent of the time in 1963, against it only 9 percent. A Colorado middling-conservative like Sen. Allott of Colorado voted with the bipartisan majorities 65 percent of the time, only 15 percent against.

Goldwater's record: only 36 percent of the time did he vote with the bipartisan (and Republican) majority; 26 percent of the time against.

THIS RECORD DOES NOT READ to many like that of one who could be described by the term "real Republican." It is the record of a senator such as the Old Guard wants.

The Old Guard, that is, from some of the mountain states and from the South, where conservative Democrats have recently shifted into the GOP. In these states, activists and kingmakers can control the Republican state conventions and handpick the national convention delegates.

No Wendell Willkie is Sen. Goldwater, no Tom Dewey, not even an Alf Landon (1936) nor a Nixon nor an Eisenhower, about the latter of whom Goldwater has been often caustic. A true-blue "real Republican," Old Guard version.

APPALACHIA is a section which merits and will receive special attention in the War on Poverty, Franklin D. How to Buy:

New 'Noisy' Vegetables Echo In Emptier Consumer Pockets

By Sidney Margolius

THAT MAN ON TELEVISION keeps asking: "Why should vegetables be the quiet corner of your plate?"

We have discovered why. It's because the noisy vegetables cost actually two to three times as much as the quiet ones. And that is what the Green Giant really is ho-ho-ho-ing about.

The noisy vegetables, in case you haven't observed the latest television campaigns, are frozen vegetables already creamed, or with butter sauce added, or additional ingredients like bits of mushrooms or green peppers, or all mixed up and almost ready to serve, like rice with peas.

As shown on TV, when you serve these to your family, orchestras play in the background and you draw admiring glances.

But wait till you see the glance you get from your husband when he sees how much your food bills have gone up. Nor will the sounds you hear be those of an orchestra.

For example, Seabrook's chopped broccoli au gratin costs you 9 ounces for 31 cents, or 3.4 cents an ounce. Ordinary frozen chopped broccoli costs you 14 cents for a 10-ounce package, or 1.4 cents.

Green Giant broccoli spears in butter sauce are 39 cents for 10 ounces; 3.9 cents an ounce. Ordinary frozen broccoli spears cost just 1.8 cents an ounce.

Birds Eye cut green beans in butter sauce come to 3.4 cents an ounce; ordinary cut green beans, 2.1 cents. Or take frozen peas. Birds Eye peas in butter sauce come to 3.1 cents an ounce; ordinary frozen peas in 10-ounce cartons, 1.6 cents; frozen peas in two-pound polyethylene bags, 1.4.

You can make it a modern shopping law, that the more manufacturers mix things together, the disproportionately more they cost you. When Birds Eye mixes rice and peas and adds a sprinkle of mushrooms, the package costs you 35 cents for 7 ounces, or 80 cents a pound. Or when Birds Eye mixes peas and potatoes with cream sauce, the result costs 55 cents for an 8-ounce package. That's $1.10 a pound.

Even if you don't want to cook, you can buy canned cooked potatoes for as little as 12-14 cents a pound.

Your best buy in ordinary frozen vegetables is the two-pound poly bags now sold by many stores. These are not only cheaper than frozen vegetables in the familiar small boxes but even more convenient. You can pour out the amount you need for a particular meal and return the rest of the bag to your freezer compartment, thus eliminating leftovers.

WATCH THE WEIGHTS marked on the packages when buying packaged frozen vegetables. You can't assume that all are 10 ounces. Some are only 8 or 9. In fact, some of the 9-ounce packages may look bigger to you than the 10, because they have a larger face but are narrow in depth.

Even if you don't use the fancy versions of frozen vegetables but stick to the staple forms, are frozen vegetables as good in value as fresh or canned? Most often, fresh produce in season is the best buy, followed by canned vegetables and fruits, while frozen tend to be the more expensive. The relatively best buys in frozen vegetables usually are reported to be peas and lima beans.

The U.S. Senate has authorized an investigation of food marketing costs. The high cost of modern processed foods should provide at least one revealing answer to the growing spread between the prices farmers are getting and those consumers pay.

It is also interesting to see how different manufacturers manage to charge exactly the same prices to the penny for the same processed spinach, or other items of this type. They can't, of course, have exactly the same costs.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Calm, Uncomplicated Children Display Curly Little Brains

By Jane Goodsell

I USED TO THINK that children were uncomplicated little creatures with charmingly serene minds and a clear-eyed, undistorted vision of the world. I can't imagine where I ever picked up such a ridiculous idea.

Motherhood taught me that the mind of a child is a place of wild disorder, where logic unravels into chaos, where reason turns inside out, and thought processes weave patterns too complex for the adult mind to follow.

My own glimpses into the child mind leave me gasping for air and hanging onto sanity with my fingernails.

I've lived in close contact with my youngest daughter, Molly, for eight and one-half years now and, while her face is familiar, that curly little brain of hers is unfathomable.

One day she went for a walk with her Bluebird troop, and came home red-faced and panting to announce that she was "just 'zosted."

"Where did you go?" I asked.

"I dunno," she said. "Some park. I forgot the name of it. Anyway, I'm never going there again. It's uphill all the way, both ways."

A few weeks ago she came home from school and looked in the cookie jar and found it empty.

"Why don't you have bread and butter with sugar?" I suggested. "It's good. My mother used to fix that for me when I was a little girl."

"I'd rather have peanut butter," she said. Then a few minutes later she asked curiously, "Who was your mother?"

I was stunned. She'd eaten dinner at my mother's house practically every Sunday night of her life.

"Grandma's my mother," I said. "You know that."

"Oh, now," she said. "Sure, Grandma's your mother now. But who was your mother when you were a little girl?"

THEN, AFTER I've decided that the poor child doesn't know anything, it turns out—well, here's an example:

We had a dinner party one night, and the next morning Molly confided that she'd spent a good part of the evening sitting at the top of the stairs, listening.

"Some of it I didn't understand," she said. "Some of the things they talked about."

"Oh?" I said, wondering uneasily what we had talked about.

"Well," she said chattily, "they talked about immigration, and I know what that is. That's when people from other countries come here to live. And I know what homosexuality is. That's when girls marry girls instead of boys. That's right, isn't it?"

"Uh—yes," I said. "That's right."

"But what I didn't understand," she said slowly, "was something Mr. Leonard said. What was it now? Oh, I remember!"

I held my breath.

"Mommy," she said, "tell me. What's a whippoorwill?"

Freeman Cites Need:

Farmer, Labor Action Urged on Recreation

The following is excerpted from a speech by Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman to the recent convention of the Packinghouse Workers.

ONE OF THE TRULY difficult problems of living with abundance is to recognize that leisure is to be enjoyed; that it should provide satisfying, enriching experiences for all of us.

Hunter P. Wharton, president of the Operating Engineers, put it well when he told delegates to the union's recent convention: "It may well be that America is entering an era where true wealth will be measured by leisure time and its use, rather than by financial acquisition."

He said, "The keystone in this new life is some effective method of guaranteeing that the shorter week is, in reality, a social gain and not two jobs."

He suggested that government at all levels take the lead in developing programs and facilities to "insure the individual the full riches of his new leisure," and urged a substantial increase in rural recreation areas, among other things.

This need is one which this Administration early recognized and acted to meet. We not only have sought to develop public recreation areas, but we also have developed under the Agricultural Act of 1962 a number of ways for labor unions and groups of farmers to jointly develop and maintain outdoor recreation facilities in the countryside.

In fact, many groups of workers are now tentatively dipping their feet into this rural reservoir of recreational opportunities. Employes of a Utah power company recently leased a 160-acre ranch on the Yellowstone River as a vacation and sports area. A string of pack horses is maintained to take individuals and families on fishing, hunting and camping trips into a nearby wilderness area.

In Ohio, 400 employes of a firm are developing 100 acres of former cropland as a recreational park with the help of their employer. Each employe pays $12 a year.

In Iowa an employe association leases some 240 acres for recreational uses, including a club house, picnic grounds, playgrounds and swimming in two small lakes.

THESE EXAMPLES only touch the surface of what might be done by joint farmer-labor recreation development efforts. At the present time, the USDA provides loans, and in some cases grants, to encourage development of recreational facilities on farms. Through other programs, such as the small watershed program, we encourage development of recreational facilities and opportunities on a larger scale. These programs involve the land and water resources of groups of farmers in cooperation with groups of city people.

Let me urge all of organized labor to actively explore the potential for developing outdoor recreation opportunities jointly with farmers and groups of farmers. This Administration is prepared to extend its support and cooperation fully in any such undertaking.

Perhaps developing rural recreation seems like a small way for organized labor to begin working toward a new dimension of living. I don't think we should mislead ourselves that the war on poverty will be easy. The effort to translate our goals into words must not lead us to think that a grand crusade will quickly sweep all the ills of rural and urban America before us.

It will not be so. Rather, it will take a thousand and one small miracles—a labor union joining with a soil and water conservation district to create a recreational park; a farmer growing recreation in what once was a corn field; a union member building a summer home in Appalachia or northern Minnesota as new highways open them to new opportunity; a determination by farmers and workers that a child should not be condemned to ignorance because his parents are poor; an understanding that racial injustice makes us all poorer; a realization that illness and poor health should not be the penalty of an empty purse.

High Court Rejects State Loyalty Oaths

The Supreme Court has struck down a State of Washington statute requiring public employes to swear that they are not "subversive persons" and a companion law requiring teachers to swear they would "promote" respect for the country's institutions and flag and "undivided allegiance."

The court divided 7-2 in each case, with Justice Byron R. White writing the majority opinions holding that the state laws were so vague in language as to be unconstitutional.

In other actions the court:

- Ruled unanimously that the State of Alabama and its courts had proceeded unconstitutionally in barring activities of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and warned that it would take further action if Alabama's courts did not comply promptly.
- Upheld an Ohio retail "price maintenance" law, under which manufacturers may enforce the minimum prices for retail sales of brand-name articles even against retailers who have refused to agree specifically to do so. The 8-1 decision held that Congress in the 1952 McGuire Act had authorized such state statutes.
- Reversed decisions of the Georgia Court of Appeals and the Illinois Supreme Court setting aside jury verdicts in favor of railroad workers who had claimed job-related injuries. The reversals restored the original jury awards.

In the Washington "loyalty oath" cases, the court said through Justice White that the statute requiring the oath of all public employes was so indefinite in describing the term "subversive person" that it gave no understandable guide to what was required. Would a person be deemed "subversive," the court majority asked, if he advocated a world government or repeal of the 22nd Amendment to the Constitution (which limits presidents to two terms)?

Would a teacher who declined to salute the flag because of religious scruples be caught by the oath to "promote respect" for the flag? the opinion asked regarding the teachers' law.

In ruling on the Ohio price maintenance law, Justice Arthur J. Goldberg for the majority said that the statute was valid against a retailer even if he had not agreed to observe the producer's stated minimum resale prices—at least when, as in this case, the manufacturer had such contracts with other retailers and had called its posted list to the attention of the "non-signer."

"Whether it is good policy" to have such state laws, Goldberg wrote, is for Congress to decide, and Congress in the McGuire Act clearly approved such "price maintenance schemes," he said.

In the Alabama case involving the NAACP, Justice John Marshall Harlan for the unanimous court pointed out that the state had never advanced a "constitutional reason" for barring the NAACP and that the state supreme court had never decided the organization's appeals on merits, throwing out the cases on procedural grounds.

The state court had applied procedural rules with "pointless severity," Harlan wrote. It should immediately void an injunction against the NAACP and allow the association to proceed with its business in the state. If the state court did not, he warned, the NAACP had specific permission to return to the U.S. court "for further relief."

HOW TO REACH workers and low income families with effective mental health services was discussed at a meeting of labor and mental health profession representatives in New York. Participants included (left to right) Dir. Lawrence Rogin of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education; Assistant Dir. Lisbeth Bamberger of the Dept. of Social Security; Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes; Dr. Harvey Tompkins, director of psychiatry at St. Vincent's Hospital, New York, and Julius Rothman of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities.

Mental Health Conference Sees Need of More Worker Services

New York—Evidence pointing to low utilization of psychiatric benefits available to workers should be "a clarion call to develop better services for this segment of the population," Assistant Dir. Lisbeth Bamberger of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security declared.

At a conference called by the federation to develop policy recommendations on labor's role and responsibilities in the mental health field, Miss Bamberger cited the need of reliance on public funds for the basic financing of mental health services. She stressed the importance of financial considerations in providing early care and warned against permitting the concept of the "insurable risk" to restrict the development of new methods of treatment.

Blue Collar Patients

Studies show that the largest number of patients in mental hospitals come from the ranks of blue collar workers, Dir. Melvin Glasser of the Auto Workers Social Security Dept. told the conference.

"It is still a shock to me," he said, "to learn of assembly lines with gadgets on them which secretly speed up the pace 25 seconds of every minute . . . of television cameras set up to watch workers, of secret listening devices scattered around the plants, and a host of other ingenious gimmicks which are a constant affront to human dignity."

The worker has been alienated from psychiatry by his own attitude toward mental illness and psychiatry's failure to provide adequate treatment, said Dr. Robert Reiff, director of the Division of Psychology at the Albert Einstein College of Medicine.

"When workers are brave enough or enlightened enough to present themselves for treatment," he said, "they have found only closed doors or closed ears."

He listed three criteria that must be met if community programs are to meet mental health needs—immediacy of service, continuity of care and flexibility of treatment approaches and methods. He urged an "organized liaison" between labor and the mental health professionals to end "100 years of second-class citizenship for the mentally ill from the ranks of labor and the poor, and to insure a new era in the treatment of all the mentally ill in America."

Dr. Frank Riessman of Columbia University's Dept. of Psychiatry urged unions to become more actively involved in planning and improving community services for the mentally ill. He called on professionals in the field to modify treatment forms to the needs and living conditions of low-income persons. The result would be a greater acceptance of mental health services, he maintained.

Mental health education within organized labor would be most effective if it were to involve a "social action orientation," he suggested, and had the participation of key union leaders and labor education specialists.

URW Signs Up Crash Pad Makers

Logan, O.—Because a majority of the 300 workers at the Goodyear Tire plant here have signed authorization cards, the Rubber Workers have requested the firm to recognize the union as bargaining representative. If it refuses, a National Labor Relations Board election will be petitioned for.

Automotive crash pads are made here. The union said 600 jobs were lost when production was transferred from Akron a year ago.

Hotel Unions Press for Social Security on Tips

The Social Security Administration has agreed to take a second look at the "$70 plan" conceived by New York hotel workers and their employers to improve benefits for pensioners.

The plan, once turned down by the SSA and the Treasury, was negotiated two years ago by the New York Hotel & Motel Trades Council and the employer association. It provided that each worker be credited with earnings of $70 weekly, including tips, for social security purposes. Despite the rejection, it has remained in effect and nearly $500,000 has piled up in an escrow fund.

The promise to review the rejection was made by a Social Security Administrator Robert M. Ball at a meeting in Washington, with a delegation, from the trades council that included about 200 members of Hotel & Club Employes Local 6, many of them waiters who rely on tips for a good part of their living, and of Building Service Employes Local 144.

They met with Ball, other SSA officials, representatives of the Internal Revenue Service — which has ruled that tips are income for tax purposes—and the Treasury, as well as members of Congress. Ball agreeing to "real consideration" of the plea for a change in the ruling, said:

"We'll look this thing all over again and if we possibly can, we will settle the issue by favorable administrative ruling."

Most of the delegation was made up of rank and file union members who gave up a day's work to make the trip and whose expenses came out of their own pockets and those of their fellow-workers.

Taxed on Salary Only

After Sidney E. Cohn, the union's counsel, made the principal statement for the workers, many of the rank-and-filers joined to explain that they and their employers now pay social security taxes only on their salaries as spelled out in the contract—$38.15 a week for waiters, correspondingly low for other tip workers. John Dalton, a Local 144 pensioner, also told about trying to get along on social security benefits of $59 a month.

Sec. James Marley of Local 6 corrected Ball's impression that a worker who is on the job one or two days a week would receive a full week's pay and thus get Social Security credit on the full $70. Mrs. Julia Algase, assistant to Pres. Jay Rubin, produced records and promised more to rest Ball's doubt that tip workers actually make $70 a week.

Rubin, in summing up, said that acceptance of the $70 plan would add $43 a month to tip workers' retirement benefit—still under the maximum. The 1962 agreement with employers, he said, was made in lieu of wage increases.

Union officials estimated that about 35,000 workers in New York City alone were represented by the delegation and would benefit from SSA approval of the plan.

THE FEAR OF LOSING what little they have in the way of a job and home keeps many Negro sharecroppers in Mississippi from registering to vote, Mrs. Suzie Brown tells a Washington conference on rural poverty.

At Farm Labor 'Hearings':

Negro Sharecropper Tells Of Life of Fear, Poverty

By Robert B. Cooney

Fear—this is what keeps many Negroes in the South in poverty. And fear is what a Mississippi sharecropper overcame when she traveled all the way to Washington to describe her conditions of life and labor.

Mrs. Suzie Brown told her story at public hearings sponsored by the National Advisory Committee on Farm Labor.

Mrs. Brown, widowed mother of six, crops 22 acres of cotton near Canton, Mississippi. With the help of her children, she brought in 23 bales of cotton last year, a crop worth about $3,400.

Mrs. Brown was paid "$174 and a few cents" as her net income for her work, she told the conference. This, plus $25 a month in maintenance from the landowner, gave her a cash income of $474 and a few cents for all of 1963.

A counsel at the hearings asked Mrs. Brown if she had ever received any technical, financial or welfare aid from a variety of governmental programs: from agricultural extension service agents, from the Farmers' Home Administration, free lunches in school for her children, surplus food in the winter.

"No, sir" was her reply to each question.

Half Isn't Half

Mrs. Brown said she crops on a "half and half" basis and described this method of payment:

"We never knows nothin' until the date and then they'll just write somethin' on a piece of paper and just give it to you . . . doesn't matter if you made a hundred bales —if they didn't want to give you anything for it, just write that on a piece of paper and hand it over to you. You can't even argue with them 'cause you don't know anything. . . ."

The question of the value of a bale of cotton was raised. An expert present said it is worth $145 or $150 a bale, making Mrs. Brown's crop worth about $3,400. Deductions for rent and other items left her with the net payment of $174 for her "half."

Rev. James L. Vizzard, Washington director of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference, expressed his concern over Mrs. Brown's fate for testifying:

"I'm a little nervous about people who have the courage to come and speak with us. Is there any chance, Mrs. Brown, that when you return home, you might find your relationship with the landowners somewhat changed because you have—"

"I might find my relationship," she responded, "just 'to hit the road.'"

She said "a lot of our farmers out there . . . they are really afraid" to become active in changing their conditions. They fear, she said, they won't have a place to live or work.

Might Have to Move

Then she added, with no change of tone:

"You know, I liable to have to move. Don't make any difference."

Norman Thomas, a member of the panel, then urged that the light of publicity be kept on Mrs. Brown, adding:

"When I was in Mississippi, I was told that one way the white supremacy is kept and one reason why people don't register is precisely the fact they lose what little they've got. . . . We ought to trace through, Mr. Counsel, what happens in the case of Mrs. Brown."

Mrs. Brown elaborated on this point:

". . . In case we goes to Canton to register, we gets thrown in jail trying to register . . . so many croppers and so many people in Madison County are afraid to register because of their jobs. In other words, if you do go register, they want to know what are your occupation, what are you here for, what you want to register for? "We're not treating y'all alright? Y'all not satisfied with what we done?" No, we couldn't be, 'cause we don't have a right. If we could just get all the Negroes in Madison County, just in Madison County, we could go ahead on with civil rights. But without that, I don't see."

Consumer Price Index Rises Slightly in April

The Consumer Price Index rose slightly in April due to higher prices for most consumer services, used cars and apparel, the Labor Dept. has reported. Food prices held steady and housing costs dropped slightly.

The April CPI edged up by one-tenth of 1 percent to 107.8, the department said. This means the market basket of goods and services which cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period now costs $10.78. The April index is 1.5 percent higher than a year ago.

Raises for 1 Million

More than 1 million workers are to receive wage increases of 1 cent an hour on the basis of quarterly reviews of the escalator clauses in their union contracts. Of these, the report noted, 800,000 are in the auto and auto parts industries; 100,000 in farm and construction equipment industries; 65,000 in aerospace firms and 45,000 in various metalworking companies.

In a companion report, the Labor Dept. said the net spendable earnings or "take-home" pay of factory production workers increased slightly in April due to a small gain in average hourly earnings.

The factory workweek and average overtime hours remained unchanged at 40.4 and 2.8 hours, respectively, the report added.

The weekly take-home pay of the factory worker with three dependents, after deductions for social security and federal income taxes, totaled $91.22, the department said. The worker with no dependents took home $83.49.

In both cases, the report added, the April take-home pay was a new record high, representing a rise of 33 cents over March. The federal income tax cut has been fattening the take-home paycheck since January.

The report said the "unusually large over-the-year increase of $5.50 in spendable earnings was influenced by increased hourly earnings and the reduction in federal income taxes." In addition, it added, the workweek in April of last year was shortened by religious holidays.

Real earnings, or the purchasing power of take-home pay, rose "moderately" despite the increase in the CPI, the report added. These were up about 5 percent over the year.

On the CPI, a key element in the overall rise was an increase of 0.3 percent in the costs of health care and recreation. This reflected higher prices for such recreation as movies and golf green fees and continuing rises in medical fees and hospital service charges. Health care and recreation costs are up by nearly 2.5 percent over the year, the report added.

Apparel prices were up by 0.3 percent over the month, mainly because of increases for men's suits and slacks, the report said. Used car prices rose by more than 1 percent in line with usual seasonal patterns.

IFJ Reelects Guild Leaders

Vichy, France—Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson of the Newspaper Guild was reelected vice president for North America at the seventh world congress of the Intl. Federation of Journalists.

At the same time ANG Pres. Arthur Rosenstock was reelected a member of the executive committee. Sec.-Gen. Henry J. Bradley of the British National Union of Journalists was elected president.

Other vice presidents chosen were Rupert Giessler of Germany, elected to the new post of first vice president; M. Gabriel Makosso of the Congo (Leopoldville); Miguel Perez Turner of Argentina and Ho Van Dong of South Viet Nam. Eighty-eight delegates from 33 nations attended the conference of the IFJ, the international trade secretariat for unionized journalists in the free world.

Baltimore Food Chains Maintain Long Lockout

Baltimore, Md.—The insistence of seven big grocery chains here on using part-time employes instead of full-time workers, and their refusal to add agreed-upon wage increases to contract minimums, has stalemated negotiations with Retail Clerks Local 692 and sent a strike and lockout of 5,000 workers into its eighth week.

The union struck Apr. 17 against the Acme stores, and six other chains—A & P, Food Fair, Giant, Grand Union, Penn Fruit and Safeway—then locked out their union workers and their patrons, according to Sec.-Treas. Alvin Akman of RCIA Local 692.

The settlement of the two unsettled issues would, Akman said, remedy the problem where 60 percent of employes at several chains work less than 29 hours a week. He added: "The full-time work force has been reduced" at some of the chains to as little as 40 percent of the total work force.

The union has asked that available work hours be given to present part-time employes on the basis of seniority "to provide more full-time jobs and add to the security and status" of part-time staffers.

Public Interest

Akman said management does not deny the union charge that the employers would rather hire two part-time employes at beginner's rate than upgrade a part-time employe to a full 40 hours, but says its present policies of part-time hiring are "in the public interest."

"The public," said Akman, "will have no difficulty in understanding that the employers' boast about their offered increases to full-time employes is poor consolation to a majority of employes denied full-time employment."

All the closed stores are highly profitable, said Akman, citing the 1963 reports that profit on investment averaged 11.4 percent during 1963 except for Safeway, whose 1962 profits were listed at 16.2 percent.

Acme earnings alone were 9.12 percent as a ratio of net profit to net worth for the year ending Mar. 31, 1964, the union quoted Supermarket News as reporting recently.

Equally false as a management argument is the claim that the stores cannot fulfill union requests and "meet competition," said Akman, adding: "The lockout is not against unfair competition but in support of the big offender, Acme," which, he said, for many years has "used the most brutal methods" to avoid unionization of its 50 stores on the Eastern Shore of Maryland.

"Management cannot pretend to support the interests of the public" when it locks the public out of its stores, he declared.

Keyserling Urges Congress to Split FEC Railroad From duPont Banks

The billion-dollar Alfred I. duPont estate, which owns 31 banks and the Florida East Coast Railway, is not a charitable foundation but a giant business enterprise and Congress should split it up in the public interest, economist Leon Keyserling testified before the House Banking Committee.

Keyserling, president of the Conference on Economic Progress, formerly headed the President's Council of Economic Advisers in the Truman administration. He testified on behalf of the Railway Labor Executives Association but stressed that the views he expressed were his own as well.

He gave strong endorsement to a bill by Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.) to bring the duPont empire under coverage of the bank holding act. Doing so, he said, would force the estate—run by financier Edward Ball—either to dispose of the Florida National group of banks, which Keyserling said dominates banking in the state, or to sell its other enterprises including the Florida East Coast Railway, the St. Joe Paper Co. and other major firms.

"The duPont estate has been operating, and is still operating, as an aggressive, vigorous, competitive, expansionary business enterprise, gigantic in size and exhibiting customary business ruthlessness in its objectives," Keyserling said.

"This being the case, the public policy that bank holding companies should be subject to the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956, and that such companies should not engage extensively in non-banking enterprises," he continued, "should apply directly and forcefully to the duPont estate."

The FEC's non-operating rail brotherhoods struck Jan. 23, 1963, for a wage increase previously granted by all other major U.S. railroads. Ball has been running FEC freight trains with strikebreakers and has defied all efforts to settle the dispute on acceptable terms.

Keyserling said the railway is "clearly within the control of the St. Joe Paper Co.," a holding company which is "clearly within the control of the duPont estate" and Ball, the dominant figure in the dispute.

If the dispute is to be settled by collective bargaining, the witness declared, "then it should be settled by collective bargaining between railway employes and genuine railroad management, not a test of force between railway employes . . . and a vast financial and industrial complex dominated and controlled" by bankers.

This is another way of saying, Keyserling added, "that banks, even if they finance railroads, should not be in the railroad business—and this is the very purpose of the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956, a purpose violated in the case of the FEC by the exemption of the duPont estate" from the act.

It is, the economist asserted, such situations as have now arisen on the FEC which illustrate the wisdom of Congress in its original decision that banks should not be in the railroad business. He concluded that the Patman proposal, now before the committee, "is designed to correct a serious and enduring deviation from that original wisdom."

Leadership Bill Endorsed:

Labor Backs Move To Break Filibuster

countered with an offer to permit voting to begin on some 300 pending amendments to the bill, an offer curtly declined by Mansfield who termed it "a maneuver" to further prolong debate. He noted that at the rate opponents wanted to vote, it might take "999 days" to complete action on the bill.

If cloture is voted, each senator would be limited to one hour of further debate. If sponsors of pending amendments demand separate rollcall votes, there would be some additional days of delay but the final showdown would be in clear sight.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, addressing a Utility Workers legislative conference, expressed optimism about the outcome and said the AFL-CIO has "put on as intensive a campaign to pass a strong civil rights bill as we ever have on any piece of legislation." Meany's 1963 New Year's message, Biemiller recalled, termed civil rights and particularly fair employment legislation "the great moral issue" facing Congress.

The substitute Senate bill, Biemiller said, improves the House-passed measure "by giving the attorney general the power to initiate suits whenever he finds a pattern or practice of discrimination in either public accommodations or equal employment opportunity." The bill is weakened somewhat by a new requirement that individuals must process their own cases if they have to go to court, he added.

"If we could strengthen the bill a little bit, we would be very happy. But if the price of getting cloture is that the bill has to stay in the shape it is in, that is agreeable to labor," Biemiller said.

He told the delegates that, contrary to claims by some opponents of civil rights, the bill "makes it perfectly clear that existing seniority systems will not be affected."

The legislation, he stressed, "specifically provides that simply because a racial or religious imbalance exists in comparison with the general community, no preferential treatment need be given which would affect hiring, layoffs or seniority systems."

The Senate substitute bill—carrying the names of Dirksen, Mansfield, Democratic Whip Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.) and GOP Whip Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.)—has been cleared with House civil rights leaders, Biemiller said, and plans are to ask the House to approve the Senate-passed measure intact. This would avoid the necessity for a conference and a second Senate vote, which would be subject to a renewed filibuster.

There was some speculation as to the effect of the California primary victory of Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) on the 25 Republican votes Dirksen has said will be cast for cloture. Goldwater is an announced opponent of the civil rights bill and of the cloture move.

Dirksen told newsmen he was confident the GOP votes would be forthcoming and Humphrey reported that "more than 40 Democrats" will vote for cloture.

Labor Funds Finance Brazilian Housing Units

A union-sponsored, 4,800-unit low-cost housing project, financed by up to $9.5 million in mortgage loans from the welfare and pension funds of AFL-CIO affiliates under an agreement guaranteeing them against loss, will be built in Sao Paulo, Brazil, the American Institute for Free Labor Development announced.

The venture will be called the John F. Kennedy Memorial Housing, and is the fourth housing project arranged for Latin American workers through the AIFLD, much of the financing coming through loans from AFL-CIO affiliates. A project in Honduras has been completed, one in Mexico is well under way and another has been launched in the Dominican Republic.

The Sao Paulo project will be constructed on land donated by the Brazilian government, which also will install roads and water and sewerage lines. Behind it are 38 free Brazilian unions with total membership of about 500,000 which have formed a Committee for Trade Union Assistance to get construction under way.

The one-story duplex dwellings will range in size from two to four bedrooms. The selling prices have not yet been determined, but it is estimated they will run between $2,000 and $2,500. A 10 percent down payment will be required but may be reduced if raising that amount proves too difficult for workers who earn as little as $40 a month, according to Dir. William C. Doherty, Jr., of the AIFLD's Social Projects Dept. Monthly payments will be in the neighborhood of $15.

Financing by the AFL-CIO unions is conditioned upon an investment guarantee by the Agency for Intl. Development (AID), under the Alliance for Progress program, which is expected soon.

The mortgagors will make 20-year loans which will pay interest to the union pension and welfare funds at the rate of 5.25 percent, with a 100 percent guarantee against loss. Another 1 percent will be charged by AID—the figures being so low because the government has guaranteed repayment in dollars. Sao Paulo banks will charge for their services about three-quarters of 1 percent, so the buyers will pay about 7 percent interest. The legal rate in Brazil is 12 percent and no money has been available at this figure for low-cost housing.

3-Way Effort

The AIFLD is a tripartite organization founded two years ago by labor, industry and government to fight communism in Latin America by helping the people to improve their living conditions. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is president and Serafino Romualdi is executive director.

Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, the AIFLD secretary-treasurer, at the press conference announcing the Brazilian project emphasized the speed with which the organization has moved since its establishment to help provide housing and credit facilities, and to strengthen unions in their sponsorship of social progress.

"It's a tribute to the genius of the American people for helping someone else—selflessly," he observed.

Bipartisan Amendments Listed To House-Passed 'Rights' Bill

The substitute civil rights bill introduced by the Senate's Democratic and Republican leaders makes a number of changes in the House-passed bill, some largely technical or clarifying. Following is a summary of the more significant amendments:

VOTING RIGHTS (Title I)

The House bill, while generally barring literacy tests not given in writing, permits oral tests if requested by the applicant and permitted by the state. The Senate proposal would eliminate this exception, requiring all tests to be conducted in writing, except where the U.S. Attorney General has certified that state literacy tests are administered fairly under other procedures.

The Attorney General or a defendant can request a three-judge federal court to hear cases involving a pattern or practice of voting discrimination. Use of a three-judge court expedites a final decision, since its rulings are immediately appealable to the Supreme Court.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS (Title II)

Although the Attorney General will not be empowered to file federal suits on behalf of individual complainants, he is authorized to intervene in such cases with the court's permission. He is empowered on his own initiative to file suits to enjoin a pattern or practice of discrimination and, in such cases, there would be no waiting period for referral to state or local agencies.

Individuals who file suits may, at the court's discretion, have court-appointed lawyers and be relieved of payment of costs and fees.

In states or localities having anti-discrimination laws, complainants would be required to notify the state or local agency 30 days before filing suit. The court could grant a stay pending completion of state or local proceedings.

In individual cases brought in states without such laws, the court may refer the case for 60 days to the new Community Relations Service created in the bill, with an additional 60 days extension if voluntary compliance seems possible.

All cases brought by the Attorney General shall be expedited in the courts and he may request a three-judge federal court.

PUBLIC FACILITIES (Title III)

The original House bill contained a provision in this title permitting the Attorney General to intervene in suits filed in federal courts by private persons alleging deprivation of equal protection of the laws on account of race, color, religion or national origin. This provision has now been moved to Title IX to make clear that it is not limited to cases involving denial of access to public facilities.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION (Title IV)

Before filing a school desegregation suit, the Attorney General is required to give notice to school authorities and allow a reasonable time to adjust the complaint.

It is made clear that nothing in the bill authorizes transportation of students to achieve a racial balance or prohibits school assignments for reasons other than race, color, religion or national origin.

CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION (Title V)

Procedures for commission investigations are spelled out, but are not inconsistent with current commission practices.

FEDERAL FUNDS (Title VI)

Clarifying language specifies that federal funds will be cut off only in the program and locality in which discrimination occurs. Thus a finding of discrimination in a school lunch program would lead to a cutoff of federal school lunch funds only in the school districts involved, not in the state as a whole.

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUITY (Title VII)

The principal changes deal with enforcement. The newly-created Equal Employment Opportunity Commission is not authorized to bring suits against discriminatory employers. Instead the Attorney General may sue to end a pattern or practice of discrimination and, with court approval, intervene in actions brought by individuals. Where a court order is defied, the Commission could initiate contempt proceedings.

In suits by individuals, courts may appoint an attorney and waive costs and fees.

In this section, also, the Attorney General may request a three-judge federal court, and courts are directed to expedite cases he brings. The phrase "pattern or practice" of discrimination, which occurs in several places, deals with discrimination representing more than an isolated instance.

In states with enforceable fair employment laws, a complaint must first be filed with the state or local agency. No federal charges may be filed until 60 days thereafter (120 days during the first year of the law), or until the state or local proceedings terminate, whichever is sooner. After a suit is filed, the court may stay proceedings for up to 60 days to permit continued settlement efforts. The time limits and referral procedures would not apply in suits filed by the Attorney General.

Charges must be filed by individuals or a member of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The House bill would also have allowed suits by organizations on behalf of individuals.

Coverage includes employers who have the specified minimum number of employes during a period of at least 20 weeks of the current or preceding year.

Unions, employers and employment agencies are not required to grant preferential treatment to members of any group on account of racial or religious imbalance.

Religious organizations are exempted only for employment related to the religious activities of the organization.

The "anti-athiest" provision adopted by the House is deleted.

Nothing in the act prohibits employers from denying employment to or discharging employes who do not meet requirements of a federal security program affecting their jobs.

Employers may continue to apply different wage standards to different locations, if such differences are not related to race, religion, sex or national origin.

Suits must be brought in the court district where the discrimination occurs, where employment records are kept or where the complainant would have worked. Only if a summons cannot be served in one of these areas may a suit be filed in the district of the company's principal offices, as allowed in the House bill.

Discriminatory practices are covered only if committed "intentionally."

Persons subject to state or local FEPC laws or to presidential fair employment orders cannot be required to keep separate records for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

An inadvertent omission in the House bill is corrected by including discrimination because of sex—as well as race, color, religion and national origin—in the enforcement provisions of the bill.

VOTING CENSUS (Title VIII)

While the Census Bureau is still obligated to gather registration and voting data based on race, color and origin on recommendation of the Civil Rights Commission, persons questioned can not be required to answer questions as to their race, color, national origin, political affiliation, how they voted or why they didn't vote.

COMMUNITY RELATIONS SERVICE (Title X)

The House bill's limitation of the number of employes of the service to six has been deleted in recognition of the expanded functions given the service.

JURY TRIAL (Title XI)

A provision has been added assuring jury trials in criminal contempt cases where the punishment exceeds $300 fine or 30 days imprisonment.

Wins California Bloc:

Goldwater Advances Toward Nomination

prospective contest in those terms after the California returns by calling on "all Republicans to join our crusade, so that this year the Republican Party will offer a choice not an echo, to the American people."

There was doubt and uncertainty in some Republican circles, particularly in the eastern states, who fear that a Goldwater nomination may endanger re-election chances of liberal GOP members of the House and Senate, but few publicly argued that Goldwater could now be "stopped" by a last-minute coalition centering on some single candidate to oppose him.

Goldwater on key issues has often been at odds with the Senate Republican leadership. He was one of eight GOP senators who voted last year against the nuclear test-ban treaty while 25 Republicans voted for its ratification. He cast the only Republican vote in 1959 against the Kennedy-Ervin union-reporting bill. He has announced opposition to the pending civil rights bill and the cloture move backed by the GOP floor leader, Sen. Everett McK. Dirksen (Ill.).

Rockefeller, conceding that "indications" are for a Goldwater convention victory on the first or second ballot, made it clear that he was "sticking to the end" with his candidacy, largely with the design of nurturing a "forward-looking" platform growing out of "the 1960 and 1956 platforms." The issue between now and the convention, he said, is "principles."

Noting that Goldwater on election night had said his approach was in the "mainstream" of American principles, the New York governor told a press conference that if this was so, the mainstream appeared to be a "meandering" one. The problem, he said, was to "get the mainstream back into the main channel."

Goldwater called on party leaders to back him, saying the GOP can beat Pres. Johnson "if we concentrate our fire on him and not on each other."

The major thing, he said in his election night statement, is to defeat "Lyndon Baines Johnson" and the program of "Lyndon Baines Johnson."

Opposition Unlikely

Key associates of Pennsylvania's Gov. William W. Scranton and of former Vice Pres. Nixon—the two undeclared candidates widely mentioned as potential nominees if Rockefeller beat Goldwater in California—said after California that a "stop-Goldwater" move at this date would "split the party wide open" and bring "carnage."

"He is so close to the nomination," one commented, "that his supporters would never forgive a drive to take it away from him."

This opinion is based partly on the quality of dedication Goldwater's followers have shown, which was underscored in the California voting.

The Arizona senator's volunteer workers in Los Angeles County, which produced the margin of Goldwater's 51.4 percent defeat of Rockefeller, were rated far more effective in rolling out his maximum potential vote than the New York governor's elaborate organization down to the precinct level.

Their campaigning also was to a large degree responsible for a late resurgence of Goldwater sentiment just before the primary after Rockefeller had picked up momentum by winning Oregon's May 15 primary and appeared to have won the favorite's position in California.

Goldwater's last-days resurgence was detectable to experienced political observers in the state. Long-time Nixon backers who had believed the previous week that Rockefeller would win said on election eve that the governor's support looked "mushy" and that his backers might not turn out at the polls, whereas all Goldwater supporters were zealous and certain to vote.

A 'Giant Step'

Goldwater himself made no claims of certain nomination after his California victory. Calling it a "giant step," he commented, "We still have a ways to go."

His campaign manager, Denison Kitchel, was less modest, claiming a total of 450 "publicly committed" delegates including the 86 Goldwater won in California, and 96 others listed as "favorable" toward the 655 needed for nomination. This did not take into account the 56 Texas delegates and 20 in Alabama the senator is conceded to have every prospect of picking up in upcoming Republican state conventions.

State leaders in Washington and New Jersey said the senator's California victory would sharply increase his strength in their previously chosen delegations, technically uncommitted. Newspaper tabulations conceded Goldwater as high as 435 of the 450 Kitchel called "publicly committed" plus the Texas and Alabama delegates in prospect.

TRIENNIAL CONGRESS of the Intl. Federation of Commercial, Clerical & Technical Employes in Tel Aviv, Israel, picked Pres. James A. Suffridge (speaking) of the Retail Clerks as its president. The federation is one of the world trade secretariats associated with the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions whose president, Omer Becu, is the second from Suffridge's right.

World Clerks Group Elects Suffridge

Tel Aviv, Israel—Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks was elected president of the Intl. Federation of Commercial, Clerical & Technical Employes at its triennial congress here.

Suffridge is the first American to be elected head of the world trade secretariat, one of 17 associated with the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions. He has been president of the RCIA since 1944 and is a vice president of the AFL-CIO.

The IFCCTE was organized in Amsterdam in 1904 and has its headquarters in Geneva. It has 82 affiliates with about 4 million members in more than 50 countries and represents all white collar workers. Its affiliates are divided into four trade sections — technicians and foremen; employes in commerce; bank, insurance and social insurance employes, and employes in industry.

3 House Veterans Ousted in Primaries

Three veteran Democratic members of the House were knocked out of office in New York and Alabama as voters trooped to the polls June 2 in widely-scattered primaries involving national and state posts and selection of delegates to party presidential conventions.

In a contest nationally noticed, the former White House press secretary, Pierre Salinger, defeated State Comptroller Alan Cranston for the Democratic nomination for the U.S. Senate in California. Salinger will run Nov. 3 against Republican George Murphy, a former movie and television actor, for the seat being vacated by ailing Sen. Clair Engle (D).

The House losers included Rep. Charles A. Buckley, chairman of the powerful Public Works Committee, who has served 30 years beginning with the off-year election of 1934 during Franklin D. Roosevelt's first term as President. Also defeated in New York was Rep. James C. Healey, a five-term member and a Buckley lieutenant in the Bronx Democratic organization.

In Alabama's unique "low-man-out" Democratic congressional primary, Rep. Carl Elliott was defeated for renomination by State Sen. John Tyson. First elected in 1948, Elliott for years was a respected member of the House Education & Labor Committee before moving in 1961 to the Rules Committee as the personal choice of then Speaker Sam Rayburn. He was opposed this year by Alabama's segregationist Gov. George C. Wallace.

Mansfield Wins Easily

In Montana primaries, the Senate Democratic leader, Mike Mansfield, won easy renomination, sweeping all the state's 56 counties, and Ronald R. Renne, former president of Montana State College, won the party's nomination for governor. Republicans chose Alex Blewett to face Mansfield in the Nov. 3 general election and renominated incumbent Gov. Tim Babcock against Renne.

Sen. John Stennis and five incumbent House Democrats were easily renominated in Mississippi. Four Negro candidates who ran in the primary for the first time since Reconstruction Days trailed the incumbents.

In South Dakota, former Lieut. Gov. John F. Lindley was nominated for governor in the Democratic primary and will face Republican Hils Boe, incumbent lieutenant governor, in November.

Buckley and Healey, the House Democrats beaten in New York, fell before a factional element seeking control of the party locally which was backed by Mayor Robert F. Wagner. Nominated in Buckley's 23rd Congressional District was Jonathan B. Bingham, and James H. Scheuer defeated Healey in the 21st Congressional District.

Wagner also helped defeat a comeback attempt by the onetime Tammany Hall leader, Carmine G. De Sapio, in a Greenwich Village district.

The Alabama primary threw Elliott into a contest in which nine candidates were nominated in districts—districts now outmoded by the state's loss of a House seat after the 1960 census—and then ran at large for the eight places to which the state is limited. His victorious opponent, Tyson, comes from the state's second most populous area centering in Mobile.

In another election with national overtones, Eugene (Bull) Connor, the former Birmingham police commissioner ousted after he halted Negro civil rights demonstrations with police dogs, made a comeback by defeating incumbent D. C. Owen for nomination as president of the state Public Service Commission.

In California, Salinger ran for the Senate nomination with the backing of State Assembly Speaker Jesse Unruh and State Atty. Gen. Stanley Mosk. He was aided by a testimonial from Mrs. Jacqueline Kennedy, widow of the late President, and endorsement from Mrs. Clair Engle, wife of the incumbent senator. Cranston was backed by Gov. Edmund G. Brown and had the endorsement of the California Democratic Council and the state Committee on Political Education.

Federal Curbs Urged On Real Estate Frauds

Federal legislation to protect the public, particularly the elderly, against misrepresentation by land speculators and real estate promoters has been proposed by the AFL-CIO.

The federation called for regulation of interstate advertising and sales-by-mail of homes and home sites by the Securities & Exchange Commission in the same manner that the SEC now regulates stock sales and offerings.

Sec. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee made his proposal in a statement to a Senate subcommittee, headed by Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N. J.), which has been investigating frauds against the elderly.

The AFL-CIO statement, submitted to the subcommittee by Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, cited "misleading" advertisements "designed to entice elderly citizens to purchase, sight unseen, real estate purporting to be suitable for retirement living."

After the sale is made, Shishkin pointed out, the buyer often finds that the sites lack such essential utilities as water and electricity, and sometimes even access roads.

He urged the subcommittee, a unit of the Senate's Special Committee on Aging, to require complete disclosures of pertinent information regarding the property offered for sale in a registration form filed with the SEC and in a prospectus furnished each person solicited.

"The legislation we propose is urgently needed," the AFL-CIO statement said. "It would provide for fair and reasonable regulation in the public interest, convenience and necessity, of offerings for sale, through the mails or otherwise in interstate commerce, of land subdivisions and of other real estate."

In a covering letter to Williams, Biemiller praised the subcommittee's investigations into "widespread exploitation" of elderly citizens—including hearings on health frauds, quackery, and deceptive sales practices for health insurance.

"The people most likely to be victimized" by misrepresentation in land sales "and the main target of the unscrupulous speculators" are retired persons or elderly persons near retirement, Biemiller pointed out.

Senate Cloture Vote Spurs Final Drive for Rights Bill

Pay Raise, Foreign Aid Pass House

The House backed Pres. Johnson down the line in two major votes—approving a $535 million pay bill raising salaries of 1.7 million federal employes from file clerk to Cabinet member and passing intact a $3.5 billion foreign aid bill, authorizing every dollar the President had requested. It was the first time in 17 years the House had not cut a President's foreign aid budget request.

In approving a pay raise averaging above 5 percent for rank-and-file government workers by a 243-157 vote, the House reversed its 222-184 defeat of a similar bill just three months ago.

The stumbling block in the first vote had been a proposed $10,000 raise for members of Congress. The new bill drops the amount of the congressional and top executive raise to $7,500 and postpones its effective date until January—when a new Congress takes office. It was amended on the floor to provide that congressional pay will automatically be raised in the future whenever government employes are given raises—by the same percentage.

Raises for postal and other federal employes are identical with the earlier bill, and take effect the first pay period after the bill becomes law. Most postal workers will receive an average 5.6 percent raise. Other salaried federal employes will receive increases ranging from 1.6 to 22.5 percent.

In a message to House members before the vote, the AFL-CIO termed the salary increases at all levels "urgently needed" and said even higher raises would have been justified.

Senate Unit Kills 'Quality' Price Bill

The Senate Commerce Committee has tabled—thus killing—a so-called quality stabilization bill, which the AFL-CIO has blasted as price-fixing "anti-consumer legislation."

A companion bill has been approved by the House Commerce Committee but has not received Rules Committee clearance.

The bill, similar to "fair trade" legislation, would "destroy any semblance of competition and raise prices for consumers," the AFL-CIO charged in a resolution adopted at its last convention.

Drops to 5.1 Percent:

May Jobless Rate Hits 4-Year Low

By Saul Miller

Paced by a sharp drop in unemployment of adult women, the jobless rate hit a four-year low in May.

The drop in the unemployment rate from 5.4 to 5.1 percent of the labor force brought a statement from Pres. Johnson that he was "greatly encouraged" by the decrease in joblessness and "that this is further evidence that the tax cut is working as expected and that its economic stimulus is being translated into new jobs."

Economists indicated that the improvement in the jobless picture was tied directly to the continuing improvement in economic conditions generally, but noted that the nation's labor force did not increase in May on a seasonally adjusted basis as it had in previous months and that the influx of teenagers hunting summer jobs was still to come.

The drop in the unemployment rate for adult women from 5.4 in April to 5.0 in May was exceptionally sharp and indicated that women were either taking part-time jobs or dropping out of the labor force. Since the beginning of 1963 the jobless rate for adult women had been over 5 percent and has fluctuated in the 5.1 to 5.7 percent range since 1962. It was last below 5 percent in September 1960.

Contrasted with the sharp drop for women, the rate for adult men dipped slightly from 3.8 to 3.6 percent while that for teenagers moved from 16.2 to 15.9 percent.

This is the way the joblessness and employment situation looked in mid-May:

- Unemployment at 3.6 million was about 300,000 below the April

Filibuster Halted By 71-29 Margin

By David L. Perlman

The Senate drove closer to a final vote on broad-ranging civil rights legislation by choking off a 75-day filibuster after beating back efforts to scuttle the key fair employment section of the bill.

It was the first time the Senate had ever broken a filibuster against a civil rights bill, and one of the rare instances that cloture has been voted on any bill. The 71-29 vote for cloture was four more than the two-thirds required to limit debate.

With all 100 senators present, 44 Democrats and 27 Republicans voted for cloture, including the leaders of both parties and ailing Sen. Clair Engle (D-Calif.) who was brought to the Capitol in an ambulance.

Opposed were 23 Democrats and six Republicans, including Arizona's Sen. Barry Goldwater, front-runner for the GOP presidential nomination.

Although debate is now limited to one hour for each senator—non-transferable—estimates of the time necessary to dispose of hundreds of pending amendments to the House-passed bill ranged up to two weeks.

FEP Upheld

Before imposing cloture, the Senate voted 64-33 against stripping the bill of its fair employment guarantee—which the AFL-CIO has termed the "key" to effective civil rights legislation. The move, sponsored by Sen. Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (D-N.C.), was opposed by 44 Democrats and 20 Republicans, and supported by only 21 Democrats and 12 Republicans.

By a 64-34 vote, the Senate then turned down an amendment by Sen. Norris Cotton (R-N.H.) to limit coverage to establishments with 100 or more employes. The House bill covers firms of 100 or more workers one year after enactment, but

Union Role Stressed in Bias Fight

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany summoned the trade union movement to carry out pledges made "to eliminate any vestige of discrimination in our ranks" and urged unions to use "economic pressure," if necessary, to make employers live up to their promises not to discriminate in hiring and promotions.

It will take "time, courage and intelligence" to wipe out race discrimination in employment, Meany said, but "it's a job the trade union movement can do."

Meany gave the keynote address at a conference sponsored by the Labor Advisory Council to the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, attended by officers or key staff members of some 80 unions.

John H. Lyons, president of the Iron Workers and chairman of the advisory council, told the delegates the purpose of the gathering was to help develop "better and more efficient ways" of carrying out the non-discrimination pledges signed by virtually every AFL-CIO affiliate.

'Stop-Goldwater' Drive Collapses As GOP Moderates Fail to Unite

By Willard Shelton

Cleveland—The 56th annual Governors' Conference here saw the collapse of a late-blooming "stop-Goldwater" drive among Republicans, underscoring the already strong probability that the Arizona senator will be nominated by the GOP national convention opening in San Francisco July 13.

Former Pres. Eisenhower played a principal role in one episode by first encouraging Pennsylvania's Gov. William W. Scranton to offer himself as an alternative to Goldwater and then withdrawing support and warning Scranton against becoming part of a "cabal" to "stop anybody."

Scranton, who was authoritatively reported as on the verge of declaring himself a candidate to offer a rallying-point for GOP moderates, abruptly pulled back and returned to his previous position that although he would accept an "honest, open draft," he would not seek the nomination.

Former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon after meeting with Republican governors next suggested that Goldwater might not have the nomination "locked up" and said the "search was still on for a third force" to oppose the Arizona senator, but acknowledged that the "search" had been hurt by what a reporter termed Eisenhower's "on-and-off" operation involving Scranton. This "third force" drive blew up even faster than Eisenhower's support of Scranton.

The volcanic struggle within the Republican Party over its posture with Goldwater as its apparently certain nominee included these events:

- The Arizona senator showed up here briefly to attend a dinner at which Eisenhower was speaker, but disdained numerous suggestions that he enter a "summit conference" with Eisenhower, Nixon and the GOP governors to clarify his

'Don't Buy' Drive Leads To New Hatters' Pact

A company which felt the pinch of a nationwide consumer boycott abandoned its anti-union campaign and agreed to a new contract with the Hatters providing substantial gains for nearly 800 workers in Corsicana, Tex.

Hatters Pres. Alex Rose credited the turnabout by the management of Texas-Miller Products, Inc., to the "solidarity" of union members across the country who insisted on the union label and refused to buy Adam hats, the company's biggest-selling brand.

"We are deeply grateful," Rose said, "to every union and central body which helped publicize the dispute and to union members who protested the sale of the hats in stores in their communities."

Working for nine months without a contract after the company had refused to agree to any improvements, union members in Corsicana pinned their hopes on the success of the union label campaign. The union lost a decertification vote by a narrow margin, but the National Labor Relations Board last month set it aside after testimony that company officials had threatened to close down the plant rather than "submit" to union requests.

Meanwhile labor support for the Corsicana workers grew, expressed in resolutions, in articles in union newspapers, in volunteer help in passing out leaflets at plant gates and at entrances to stores selling Texas-Miller brands. Pickets at major retail outlets carried consumer-oriented appeals.

The company saw the results in its balance sheets. It acknowledged the effectiveness of the boycott and asked the union to resume negotiations.

Company Pres. Benjamin Parrill called together the workers in the Corsicana plant, emphasized the need for the union label for the success of his company's hats and stressed the importance of union-management harmony.

In New York, negotiations moved rapidly. Agreement was reached on a four-year contract including:

- A retirement program financed by employer contributions of 3 percent of payroll.
- Wage increases ranging from 32.5 cents to 44 cents an hour.
- An additional paid holiday.
- Permission for the company to use the Hatters union label when 97 percent of the workers are members of the union. (Texas law prohibits union shop contracts.)

In addition to Adam hats, the company's brands include Ashley, Bianchi, Bonar Phelps, Dorsey Jay, Hampshire Club, Repell-X and Sea Spray.

Essex Wire Strikers Ratify Pact Ending Long Walkout

Hillsdale, Mich.—Union ratification of a four-year contract containing a wage package of 34 cents an hour and work rule gains ended the bitter 102-day strike at Essex Wire Corp.

Importation of strikebreakers and use of the Michigan National Guard to keep the plant open had been ripping this community apart for weeks. Violence had flared repeatedly on the picket line as striking members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers fought back against aggression by armed company guards and strikebreakers.

The contract—the first for IUE Local 810 since it won an NLRB election last November—provides a flat 10-cent hourly pay boost the first year, a 2.5 percent raise the second year and 3 percent increases in the third and fourth year.

New premiums for afternoon and night shift workers—5 and 10 percent, respectively—were won by the union. Paid holidays are increased from seven to eight.

George Gould, IUE international representative, told the 180-member local, "I'm convinced we got the most we could get. I feel real good."

Base pay rates under the first year will range from $1.94 to $2.57 an hour. The company produces electrical wiring systems for autos.

First Offer Rejected

Final agreement was hammered out in a relatively brief bargaining session called in Detroit after the strikers had unanimously withheld approval of the original package.

Union negotiators were instructed to gain clarification of some management proposals. At the final negotiating session, the company agreed to spell out further details of work rule improvements won by the union, and the contract was then formally ratified. All strikers will be recalled to work, the company said.

National Guardsmen began moving out of town an hour after approval of the contract was announced. It was Gov. George W. Romney's use of troops to reopen the plant to strikebreakers that produced severe reaction, not only in Hillsdale but throughout the state. His denial of requests to revert to his original shutdown order angered community as well as union leaders.

IUE Rep. Ted Nolan charged the plant reopening under guard protection delayed the strike settlement by a week.

Romney reopened the plant after the company challenged his legal right to act. He said he would consider again closing the plant if Atty. Gen. Frank J. Kelley (D) ruled such authority was present in Michigan's "public emergency" law. When Kelley said it was, Romney then said he would act only if violence recurred in the heavily-policed city.

Romney invited IUE Pres. James B. Carey and Essex Wire Pres. Walter Probst to conduct final negotiations in the governor's office, but this failed to offset criticism that he had waited too long and that the plant reopening had delayed settlement.

'Primitive' Policies

The pressure of ever-mounting public resentment and castigation by daily newspapers of Essex Wire's "primitive" labor relations was credited as a major factor in bringing an end to one of Michigan's longest and most bitter strikes.

The confusion of the final week before settlement was compounded when the National Labor Relations Board issued complaints charging unfair labor practices by both company and union.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Michigan chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union and the Auto Workers had joined in protests against the plant reopening.

The first Negroes ever hired here by Essex Wire were the armed guards and strikebreakers it imported from other areas. NAACP Executive Sec. Roy Wilkins urged Romney to close the plant because "companies that do not hire Negroes under normal circumstances incite racial discord by hiring only Negroes during a strike."

UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock labeled the plant reopening "a naked act of aggression against the people of Hillsdale and against the workers and their families."

The ACLU had protested that Romney's order gave protection to the company while denying rights of workers.

Two Operating Unions Ratify Rail Agreement

Chicago—A four-year dispute over work rules ended here June 6 when the Firemen & Enginemen and the Railroad Trainmen ratified the terms of an agreement reached with the help of mediators named by Pres. Johnson.

The agreement provided these improvements for 200,000 operating employes:

Seven paid holidays for all hourly-paid employes; shelter allowances, plus a $1.50 meal allowance, for trainmen held at away-from-home points; wage inequity adjustments of $1.06 a day for yard engineers and 70 cents for firemen on a five-day week, 65 to 70 cents a day for hostlers, $2.90 for brakemen and $3.10 for conductors.

The agreement also preserves 100 miles as the basic work unit, with rates for excess miles remaining as is until Jan. 1, 1968; amended rules on staffing of self-propelled machines; new rules to govern discontinuance of the last yard engine in a yard and the last yard engine on a shift.

Changes in interdivisional runs asked by management were referred to a national committee for study. It was agreed also that employes adversely affected by rules changes will receive severance pay and other benefits under the Washington Job Protection Agreement.

Other organizations that signed earlier were the Locomotive Engineers, Conductors & Brakemen, and the Switchmen. Not involved was a dispute over manning by firemen and trainmen. This was settled by forced arbitration ordered by Congress.

BLF&E Pres. H. E. Gilbert said the pact represents "significant progress" for workers. He cited the "important precedents" of paid holidays for hourly workers, expense allowances for road employes and inequity adjustments for yard employes.

A great deal of credit, Gilbert said, must go to the President, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and mediators Theodore Kheel and Dr. George Taylor. He praised also the "militant attitude" of Illinois Central Railroad workers who struck Apr. 8 to bring the long dispute over rules to a climax.

The BRT, at a separate meeting here, said it will ask U.S. railroads later this year at individual negotiations to meet new wage goals. The union will ask pay hikes of 50 cents an hour or $4 a day, and improved vacations up to five weeks after 20 years of service, four weeks after 15 years.

Wage proposals were made earlier by two of the other four operating unions—the Engineers, and the Firemen & Enginemen.

Johnson Sees Opportunity Open to All

A determination "to open wider the doors of opportunity within America for all" was voiced by Pres. Johnson at a meeting with a joint committee of the United Italian-American Labor Council and the Order Sons of Italy in America.

The committee, headed by Luigi Antonini, president of the labor council and vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, met with the President to seek his support for legislation pending in Congress which would make Columbus Day a legal holiday and for bills to "humanize the immigration laws as the late Pres. Kennedy had recommended."

Johnson told the committee that the country has a President who is "determined to open wide the doors to America for all those who want to come and live with us and contribute their talents to our success."

He said he would do "all I can to encourage the nation to remember Oct. 12—and what it stands for."

"Italy is in many respects the mother of us all," he said. "Western culture—in Europe and in this country—is deeply indebted to the great minds and great men of Italy. We wouldn't be what we are if we had closed the door against the migration of ideas from country to country. We in America must never adopt a closed-door policy toward the migration of men and their minds from country to country."

Half-Day Strike Wins Major Gains For Casts of Broadway Stage Hits

New York—A half-day strike of Broadway actors was effective enough to win gains for almost 1,000 performers that an Actors' Equity spokesman hailed as "quite an achievement."

After four hours of union picketing, employer-members of the League of New York Theaters agreed to a four-year contract providing minimum wage increases totaling $12.50; a six-day work week during rehearsals and wage parity of rehearsal pay with regular pay at the start of the fourth contract year.

The contract, with work rules being negotiated, will bring performers' minimums from $117.50 as of June 1, 1964, to $130 on June 1, 1967. Rehearsal minimums go from the present $97.50 a week to $130 on the latter date. Road minimums will progress from $151.70 to $167.50 by the fourth year.

Agreement was reached and the strike ended with the help of Mayor Robert Wagner (D) and City Mediator Morris Tarshis. Wagner called the union and management negotiators to Gracie Mansion, his residence, and kept them there until 3 a.m. the following day.

Wage terms are retroactive to June 1, and cover 765 Broadway actors plus companies in Los Angeles, Toronto, and "on the road."

Actors whose theaters were picketed will get lockout benefits, the union decided—one-eighth of a week's salaries for the cast and stage managers of "Oliver" and "The Deputy," who lost pay for one performance; one-seventh of a week for rehearsal time lost by those in "Golden Boy" and "Fiddler on the Roof."

Police League Cites Unionist

Buena Park, Calif.—The Buena Park Police Protective Association presented a special citation to Sec.-Treas. Arthur Z. Berland of Retail Clerks Local 324 for his cooperation in planning and sustaining year-round teen-age dances in the union auditorium.

ILGWU Unit Marks 50 Years:

Health Center Vision Praised by Johnson

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York—The vision and valor of the immigrant garment workers who founded a health center 50 years ago were praised here by Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson, who declared that today's problems are new and challenging but the goals are the same—"progress and justice for all Americans."

"I predict that in the next 10 years we will make greater gains toward this goal than at any time in the long history of our republic," he told an overflow gathering in the High School of Fashion Industries.

It was the climax of a three-day commemoration of the founding by the Ladies' Garment Workers of the first union-sponsored health center, now grown from two small rooms on Union Square to a coast-to-coast chain of 13 centers and 9 mobile units serving remote areas.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler offered the warm congratulations of the labor movement and read a message of tribute from Pres. George Meany, who said he is confident world labor will "always look to the ILGWU for pioneering ventures and will never be disappointed."

There is nothing quite like the ILGWU in the labor movement or anywhere else, Meany declared, adding "because it is unique . . . the ILGWU has made an invaluable contribution to the betterment of life in America."

The union's tribute to its health pioneers included a conference of ILGWU health center directors, a luncheon in honor of the New York center staff, a symposium on the future aspects of health care, and a dinner in honor of health center physicians.

At the center itself, occupying seven floors of a 26-story building at Seventh Ave. and W. 25th St., the President dedicated a plaque depicting the ILGWU health center medal authorized by the late Pres. Kennedy in the last bill he signed before his death in November 1963.

ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky gave Johnson the only silver copy of the medal and announced that bronze copies will go to the bill's sponsors — Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.).

In 1963, the ILGWU's medical and hospital system gave 1.2 million separate services to 101,000 patients at a cost of $5.7 million in 27 states and Canada. The centers employ 466 physicians, 102 nurses and 343 other staff members.

All the centers sponsor educational campaigns dedicated to the ideal of preventive medicine, and the union said its records show a large number of unsuspected ailments turned up by routine diagnostic examinations. All services are financed by labor-management health funds.

At the public commemoration, Johnson declared "we have proposed, and we will pass, the strongest civil rights bill in American history," but the time has come to look beyond that legislation and to "lift the heavy weight of discrimination in the hearts and homes of people," to give members of minorities "the training, the education, the housing" to help them "pass through the doors of opportunity."

Johnson assured the ILGWU that his Administration will keep its promise to provide hospital care for all older citizens through social security. The underprivileged and the underpaid, he said, will be benefited by extending minimum wage and unemployment insurance coverage.

Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze, principal speaker at the physicians' dinner at the Statler-Hilton Hotel, recalled that in 1914, when the cloakmakers started their health center, he landed on U.S. shores at the age of 2.5 years.

To the immigrant garment workers of 1914, he related, "the dream of America was more powerful than the reality." They set out to create a land in which the dream and the reality were one and, while the job is "far from finished, it has been shown over and over again that the reality can be made to correspond to the dream," he declared.

Dubinsky expressed the ILGWU's "warm thanks" to the thousands who helped create and expand the union health care program and read a letter from Pauline Newman, health center educational director, recalling that in 1926 it was in danger of closing but other New York unions raised enough money to keep it going.

"We are fortunate, you and I, that this institution lived," said Dubinsky. "Today there are 50 or 60 more that exist all over the land."

Teachers Win Major Victory In Cleveland Representation Vote

Cleveland—The American Federation of Teachers scored a significant victory when its Local 279 —the Cleveland Teachers Union—won exclusive representation rights for 5,500 public school teachers here.

The CTU defeated the Cleveland Education Association, an affiliate of the National Education Association, by a vote of 2,701 to 2,026. There were 162 votes for neither.

The AFT victory heartened the union's leaders in drives toward obtaining representation rights in other large cities, including Philadelphia, Boston, Los Angeles and Newark, N.J.

Last month the AFT won representation rights for public school teachers in Detroit, also defeating an NEA affiliate.

James T. O'Meara, CTU president, said victory in Cleveland was especially significant because it overcame what he charged was a well-financed "smear" campaign by CEA, involving "untruths, distortions and outright lies."

Campaign Was Costly

He estimated CEA's campaign in the newspapers and over the airwaves cost between $30,000 and $40,000. The money obviously came from its state and national bodies, O'Meara said.

He said CTU spent an insignificant sum, compared to CEA.

"The vote demonstrated the intelligence and reason of our teachers," O'Meara declared. "They were able to see through the irresponsible, unprofessional campaign conducted by the other organization."

CTU received 200 more votes than it has members.

Now that it has won exclusive-representation rights, O'Meara said CTU will seek an increase in minimum and maximum salaries, extension of longevity increments to 30 and 35 years of service from the present 25 years, across-the-board increases, paid hospitalization, severance pay, an increase in accumulated sick leave from 90 to 120 days, reduction of class sizes and other improvements.

He said CTU would not seek a contract with the school board but would represent the teachers by negotiations with the board.

Its increased responsibilities as representative of all the teachers in the Cleveland public school system will require CTU to expand its staff, O'Meara said.

The union, he continued, will seek to establish a defense fund to help teachers who are defendants in criminal actions brought against them for disciplining pupils. He said the union already has $50,000 liability coverage for each teacher who is sued in a civil action for disciplining a pupil.

Ralph McAllister, Cleveland school board president, condemned irresponsible language used in the election campaign by one of the organizations. McAllister would not say whom he meant, but Daniel O. Corrigan, another school board member, said he believed the board might have a group libel case against CEA for its charge in a newspaper advertisement that the board had made a "deal" with the union.

AFL-CIO leaders in Cleveland supported CTU's campaign to obtain exclusive representation rights and assistance during the drive was provided by staff representatives from the AFL-CIO regional office. This drew a CEA charge that CTU was dominated by "labor bosses."

O'Meara, who is an attorney, also charged that some of CEA's campaign material was libelous.

Steelworkers' Official Named to AAA Board

New York—Ben Fischer, assistant to the president of the Steelworkers and head of the union's Arbitration Dept., has been elected to the board of directors of the American Arbitration Association.

Doctors Hail ILGWU Health Care Program

New York—A panel of prominent doctors has challenged the labor movement to "use its immense bargaining power" and its combined strength to improve the quality of health care services in America.

The medical profession in turn was admonished by Nelson Cruikshank, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, to "take the lead in teaching what doctors know best" and refute the "economic snake-oil" peddled through the American Medical Association, which has been crusading against what it calls "socialized" medicine.

The interchange came at a symposium on "New Horizons in Medical Care" as part of the 50th anniversary observance of the Ladies' Garment Workers Health Center, which featured five of the nation's most knowledgeable practitioners of the healing arts —two hospital administrators, two heads of group practice clinics, and one practicing physician and surgeon. Cruikshank was chairman.

Dr. Caldwell B. Esselstyn, director of the Rip Van Winkle Clinic in Hudson, N.Y., recalled that the AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its February meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., pinpointed four major unmet health needs.

Opportunity for Labor

"Labor has the opportunity to set the pattern for tomorrow, as the ILGWU did 50 years ago," he said.

"Labor can help by saying 'we are going to get our medical care only from properly organized groups or hospitals; that will upgrade the quality of care,'" declared Dr. Russell V. Lee of Palo Alto, Calif., founder and acting head of the Palo Alto Medical Clinic and medical instructor at Leland Stanford University.

"Your program is good," said Dr. Martin Cherkasky, president of the Greater New York Hospital Association and director of Montefiore Hospital, "but only a third of your [ILGWU] New York members get to your health center."

Labor and medicine should interest themselves in the health problems of older workers and retired workers, said Dr. Howard Rusk, director of New York University's Institute of Physical Medicine & Rehabilitation. Saying "we shall always be grateful" for the ILGWU's support of the institute and its rehabilitation programs, he urged further interest in the development of new types of preventive medicine to prolong lives.

Dr. Kenneth W. Clement, Cleveland, O., who is a member of the Social Security Advisory Council, along with Cruikshank, brought the congratulations of the National Medical Association, of which he is president, for the ILGWU's continued attention to the "social well-being of your members" and other Americans.

ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky reminded the audience that one of the union's demands in the historic 1910 strike of the cloakmakers was "better sanitary conditions in the shops" and thanked the doctors present for their continuing contributions to the health of union garment workers.

On the question of improved medical care, the panelists agreed that medicine is on the threshold of its greatest advances, and Cruikshank defined the AFL-CIO's objective as that of making needed medical and hospital care available to all.

Rusk asserted: "You in the unions—if you think that changes toward quality and economy will be brought about by the doctors—you're wrong. The organized users can do something about that."

He advised labor to "make up your mind what kind of care you should fight for; that should lead to some action."

FACES of special medal commemorating 50th anniversary of founding of Ladies' Garment Workers Health Center. An act of Congress, approved by the late Pres. Kennedy two days before his death, authorized striking of silver medal and 2,000 bronze copies.

Joblessness in Duluth Laid To Automation

Duluth, Minn. — Technological changes in steel and transportation are the major causes of unemployment in the Duluth-Superior, Wis., region, according to a comprehensive redevelopment report made public by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

Contributing factors listed were significant seasonal fluctuations in local employment and a dearth of year-round job opportunities.

One of 122 Studies

The report was one of 122 which will be released within the next few months to provide basic manpower information concerning as many areas and to help in the development of plans for local economic recovery and reemployment. It was prepared by the department's Bureau of Employment Security in cooperation with the Commerce Dept.'s Area Redevelopment Administration.

The study emphasized the effect on employment of the change on the Great Lakes to new, larger and speedier freighters which use fewer ships and fewer men to transport larger amounts of iron ore in less time. The shipment of grain, upon which much of the area's economy depends, now requires about half the formerly-utilized manpower because of grain elevators.

Job losses in several other nonmanufacturing industries have aggravated the situation, the report showed.

The Duluth-Superior area has had "substantial and persistent unemployment"—which the department defines as 6 percent or more jobless—since 1960. It was recommended to the Commerce Dept. in 1961 for designation as an area for redevelopment under the Area Redevelopment Act.

Studebaker, UAW Revise Health Pact

South Bend, Ind.—Terms of a revised health insurance agreement affecting present and former Studebaker Corp. workers have been announced by the Auto Workers.

Under the agreement, 3,000 former workers who have been unable to contribute toward the program will again be protected through Oct. 31, expiration date of the existing agreement.

The revised pact, according to UAW Regional Dir. Ray Berndt and Pres. Woodrow Frick of Local 5, provides that:

- Studebaker will pay the full cost of premiums required to cover pensioners, 800 employes still working, and eligible laid-off employes for the weeks beginning June 8 through Oct. 26.
- Workers still employed by the firm, and laid off or disabled workers who have made contributions for weeks since May 4 will receive a refund of these contributions.
- Pensioners who have paid premiums for May and June will get a refund of these amounts in their July pension check.
- All Studebaker workers on layoff or sick leave whose insurance has lapsed since last Dec. 9 will have their insurance reinstated automatically.
- Laid-off workers covered by insurance with another employer cannot file claims for hospital-medical expense but will still be covered by life insurance.

For the 60 percent of workers laid off five months ago when auto production was halted here, and still unemployed, the "full package" of benefits will apply for the remainder of their covered insurance weeks, the UAW said.

KATHERINE RUTH JENSEN receives a medallion as Presidential Scholar from Pres. Johnson at ceremonies in the East Room of the White House. One of 121 young people chosen from all the states and territories and the District of Columbia for this award, she is also one of the winners of a 1964 AFL-CIO Merit Scholarship Award. She is headed for Carlton College in Minnesota.

8 Union Youths Win Presidential Medals

Eight teenagers with union backgrounds, including Katherine Ruth Jensen, one of the AFL-CIO 1964 College Merit Scholarship winners, were entertained at the White House June 10 as Pres. Johnson presented them with medallions certifying their selection as Presidential Scholars.

For Miss Jensen and the seven other union-family scholars, who were among 121 chosen for the presidential awards by a committee headed by Milton Eisenhower, it was a five-hour White House visit filled with variety and enchantment.

'Rendezvous With Excellence'

In the East Room, the President told the scholars and their parents, who were invited to accompany them, that their generation's destiny is a "rendezvous with excellence."

The Senate cloture vote on the civil rights bill that day, he said, "demonstrates that the national will manifests itself in congressional action," and he urged the young people to "excel in citizenship" in the years ahead.

To each in turn, Johnson gave a medallion bearing an engraving of his profiled head and, on the reverse side, a symbolic engraving of Prometheus strangling the vulture of ignorance while holding aloft the torch of learning.

Miss Jensen is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred F. Jensen of Whitewood, S. D. Both her parents were union members in the Kaiser Shipyards during World War II.

Union Backgrounds

Other Presidential Scholars with union backgrounds include Marcia Elaine Cooke, Jacksonville, Ark., whose father Willis is a member of Machinists Lodge 2211; Alice Kathleen Cox, Wellington, Kan., whose father John belongs to IAM Lodge 202; Lorraine Toly, Seattle, Wash., whose father Michael is a member of Sheet Metal Workers Local 99; Michael Roy Pease, Los Vegas, Nev., whose father Roy belongs to Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 357; Kathleen Ann Frankovic, Garfield, N. J., whose father Frank Joseph belongs to Oil Workers Local 80406. Margaret Rossoff, Brooklyn, whose father Martin and mother Annie are both members of Local 2, American Federation of Teachers; John O'Farrell Stevenson, Brooklyn, whose father John is a member of Local 32-B, Building Service Employes.

The AFL-CIO gave a luncheon honoring these eight Presidential Scholars the day after the White House awards were made.

In the White House itself following the East Room ceremonies, the 121 young people and their parents were entertained at an hour-long reception in the historic State Dining Room, with the President and Mrs. Johnson and their daughter Lynda Bird mingling with the group and with famous artists, scientists and entertainers as specially invited guests.

Lynda Bird was hostess to the young people at a hamburger feast under a striped awning on the White House South Lawn (parents and reporters were banished for this event) and there was entertainment to follow.

Famous Performers

Sidney Poitier, this year's Academy Award winner as best actor of the year, introduced the entertainers including performers famous among young people, including Conductor Leonard Bernstein of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, the Gerry Mulligan quartet, Metropolitan Opera singer Nicholas di Virgilio, actor Jose Ferrer and the Kingston Trio.

The President visited the party briefly to introduce the young people to Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, who was attending a briefing session on Southeast Asia problems.

For a good deal of the evening, Pres. and Mrs. Johnson watched the young people at their hamburger feast and the entertainment from the Truman Balcony above. They rejoined their guests on the South Lawn when it was time to bid them good-night and wish them well.

Project to Help Workers:

Union Health Center To Study Mental Ills

New York—The Sidney Hillman Health Center has received federal grants of $650,000 to finance a four-year experimental project for treatment of union members' mental health problems.

The National Institute of Mental Health is giving $500,000 for the venture, with the remaining $150,000 coming from the Vocational Rehabilitation Administration.

The center honors the memory of the first president of the Clothing Workers and is sponsored jointly by the union's New York Joint Board and the New York Clothing Manufacturers' Association. The U.S. grants are the first to be made to a labor-management medical institution for the treatment of workers' mental illnesses.

The goal of the project is to help workers under great mental strain hold on to their jobs and to enable others to return to jobs they have had to give up because of mental problems.

It grew out of the health center's experience with a $225,000 federal grant made three years ago for the rehabilitation of physically-disabled or sick workers. Pres. Louis Hollander and Vice Pres. Vincent Lacapria of the center said it was found that treatment of workers' physical ailments was not enough and that many had mental problems.

New Labor Service Seen

Dr. Robert H. Felix, director of the National Institute of Mental Health, said the institute is interested in demonstrating methods of incorporating mental health services into the programs of labor health centers.

"It is hoped," he added, "that the experiences of the Sidney Hillman Center will make possible the exploration of methods and techniques that can be used effectively and appropriately in other centers."

Dr. Hyman J. Weiner, formerly on the faculties of the Columbia School of Social Work and the Albert Einstein College of Medicine, will direct the project under the supervision of Dr. Morris Brand, medical director of the Hillman center for the last 13 years.

As outlined, the new program will attempt to:

- Establish the union as a source of aid in coping with mental problems.
- Develop ways to encourage the union member and his family to use mental health services for "average" as well as severe problems, and new ways of providing such services.
- Experiment with techniques for keeping a worker with emotional problems on the job or restoring him to his job.
- Test new ways of working with existing community mental health agencies.

The objectives will be sought by:

- Establishing a mental health team to include psychiatrists, psychologists, social workers and nurses.
- Establishing a special labor-management committee to work with the mental health team on developing policies and programs to guide the program.
- Developing close working relations with existing mental health hospital facilities.
- Building permanent case finding machinery.
- Retraining workers for new jobs where possible.
- Establishing a rehabilitation unit to experiment with ways of influencing the work situations of emotionally-disabled workers based on labor-management cooperation.

ABC Wins Drivers' Vote In Memphis

Memphis, Tenn.—The American Bakery & Confectionery Workers won bargaining rights for 451 bakery drivers, route salesmen and garage personnel here, ousting the Teamsters by a margin of nearly 4-1.

Voting in the mail ballot were drivers employed at the American, Continental, Schneider's and Colonial bakeries in Memphis, and at a Colonial bakery in Jackson, Tenn. The new unit includes 90 drivers operating out of Clarksdale, Miss. They voted in a separate ballot.

The Memphis vote was the ninth collective bargaining election won by the ABC during the past month, a union spokesman said.

Other recent major elections included a 400-worker unit at the Salerno-Megowan Biscuit Co. in Chicago and a 250-worker unit at the Stella D'Oro Biscuit Co. in the Bronx, N.Y., formerly affiliated with an expelled bakery union.

Unionists Head Back to Schools As Labor Education Season Opens

The first wave of 20,000 members of AFL-CIO unions who will study under accelerated labor education programs has registered at universities and union training centers for their week-long battle with the books.

The program will continue throughout the three summer months and has been extended to 33 universities and 13 trade union centers in order to train larger numbers of leaders on a broader scale than ever before. In addition, about 1,000 full-time union staff members will be receiving advanced training.

One of the major subjects is the war on poverty and its relationship to the state and area where the specific school is being held, Dir. Lawrence Rogin of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, said. The relationship between poverty, unemployment and civil rights will be examined, he said, and current legislation and an understanding of the 1964 election issues will be stressed.

"In addition to the need which arises from a normal yearly turnover in union membership," Rogin observed, "we constantly face new educational challenges. One, for example, is the need for thousands of trained rank and file leaders for the rapidly-growing government employes' unions."

Staff Training

The curricula, he reported, include advanced training for staff representatives of federal employe unions who will establish a nationwide program of instruction for local union officers and shop stewards in parliamentary procedure, public speaking and the "unique methods" unions must use for dealing with the government as an employer.

The instruction is available for white collar workers as well as for carpenters, electricians and metal trades employes.

Rogin said some of the students will concentrate on college-level studies in the fields of foreign trade, long-range economic trends, the impact of automation and problems of organizing white collar workers.

The summer schools are sponsored by AFL-CIO affiliated unions and by state and local central bodies, with the National AFL-CIO participating on a limited basis. The local union selects the students and pays a basic fee covering registration, room and board.

A schedule of labor-sponsored summer schools is available from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Public Relations, 815 Sixteenth Street, N.W., Washington 6, D.C.

Show Displays Union Goods, Services

DREAMS CAME TRUE at the Union-Industries Show in Louisville, Ky., for Mr. and Mrs. Guy Richerson when they won the $7,000 electric kitchen given by the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Richerson belongs to the Auto Workers.

GRAND OPENING: From left, Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis, AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; Pres. Anthony De-Andrade, Pressman; Under-Sec. of Labor John F. Henning; Dept. Pres. Richard F. Walsh; IBEW Sec. Joseph D. Keenan and Sec.-Treas. Arthur P. Gildea, Brewery Workers.

THOUSANDS OF SPECTATORS from nearby Kentucky and Indiana thronged to the Kentucky Fair & Exposition Center in Louisville for the Union Industries Show. Skills displayed by artisans such as this Flint Glass Worker proved fascinating and drew a steady stream of onlookers.

A LADY CAN GET pretty well worn out just by looking at all the wonderful things there are to see at a union label show. When she does, there's just one thing left—take a nap.

SHEEP-SHEARING EXHIBITION offered by the Meat Cutters was one of the big attractions. On the more practical side, the union helped its visitors beat the cost of living by giving away packages of meat to winners of drawings.

PROFESSIONAL TOUCH in the far-out decoration of cakes was demonstrated by members of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers. This year's Union Industries Show was the 19th in the series, had 425 individual exhibits.

CHAMPIONSHIP in contest held by the Bricklayers for apprentices was won by Jay Young, shown receiving award from Union Pres. John J. Murphy. More than $80,000 in gifts, prizes and souvenirs was given away during the show.

The Goldwater Candidacy

THE RIGHTWING Republicans who for nearly three decades have been bemoaning "me-too" and "echo" candidates apparently will have their chance in 1964 to demonstrate their proposition that a rigidly conservative GOP candidate can be elected President of the United States.

All indications at this writing are that Sen. Barry Goldwater is a strong front-runner for the Republican presidential nomination on a straight-away conservative, rightwing program which challenges the basic concepts of American political life as developed over the past 30 years. His nomination in July would join the conservative-liberal battle and presumably resolve the "me-too" issue.

While such a battle may resolve the issue as seen by the GOP rightwing, it will also badly weaken and impair the strength and effectiveness of the Republican moderates and liberals who have made a contribution to shaping the nation's foreign and domestic policies.

This can only injure the nation overall. The modern political dialogue in America has never been one of extremes and the strength of the nation stems in part from the moderate and liberal forces in both parties.

An Improvement, But . . .

THE DROP in the unemployment rate in May to 5.1 percent of the labor force is a welcome change from the stuck-on-dead-center figures of the past few months. It reflects the continuing improvement in the nation's economic health and the possibility of further improvements.

But despite the change over the past 12 months—a drop from 5.9 to 5.1 in the rate of unemployment and a decrease of more than 400,000 in the number of unemployed—there are still 51 out of every 1,000 persons seeking jobs who cannot find them.

The drop in the May unemployment rate brings the nation back to where it was four years ago before the onset of the 1960-61 recession. This is a real improvement, but in the spring of 1960 when the economy was moving ahead well, the unemployment rate was also over 5 percent, and it was considered an intolerable rate during a period of "prosperity."

The same situation holds true today. With profits and sales booming, a 5.1 percent rate is unacceptable. The programs and policies to reduce that rate even more sharply than in May are still critically needed if the nation is to move truly toward maximum employment and production.

A Key Victory

THE HISTORIC SENATE vote to impose cloture and end the debate on the civil rights bill is a sharp affirmation that representative democracy is a live and going institution.

It underscores also the simple fact that when a majority of the people favor a specific course of action and when their moral and political voices are raised, even the most encrusted of legislative machinery will move in response.

Having won the key victory on cloture and the opportunity to vote on the merits of the civil rights legislation, the need now is for the voice of the majority to continue to be heard loudly and clearly on Capitol Hill so that a meaningful, effective law will finally emerge to assure equal rights for all Americans.

'It's Here to Stay':

Mediator Urges Improvements In Bargaining—Not Substitutes

The following is excerpted from an article by Theodore W. Kheel, "A Labor Relations Policy for 1964," which appeared in the April 1964 issue of Personnel Journal. Kheel is a widely known mediator and arbitrator with long experience in labor-management relations.

PROPOSITION NUMBER ONE in a policy of labor relations for 1964 is the precept that collective bargaining, whether we like it or not, is here to stay. From this it necessarily follows that our objective must be not to find a substitute for bargaining, but to discover ways of making it work better.

This leads to proposition number two, which is that we must, at all costs, avoid sweeping generalizations. The 18 to 20 million workers in organized labor in the United States belong to different kinds of labor unions in various parts of our country. Some are composed of skilled workers, some of unskilled, some predominantly of women, most predominantly of men. In some, the average age is high, in others it is low. The industries they deal with also are widely varied and dispersed.

Labor leaders are condemned as dictators controlling the policies and decisions of their organizations. Simultaneously, we hear complaints about union officials failing to exercise leadership, leaving control of the destinies of the union instead to the rank and file. Some leaders are said to be corrupt, others too dedicated and incorruptible. Anyone who starts a sentence by saying that "the trouble with labor or management is" is bound to be partially right but mostly wrong.

As proposition number three, there is the need to avoid oversimplification. Any form of bargaining is difficult. Hence, collective bargaining, a term first used by Beatrice Webb in 1891, is necessarily more so. Collective bargaining is exactly what the name implies: bargaining collectively or together by a group of workers with management.

BUT A UNION is not simply a group of workers. Necessarily, it must have leaders or representatives, and some will come from the plant while others are professional spokesmen, spending full time at their jobs. There are, as you know, international as well as local officials and the bargaining process frequently involves adjusting differing points of view between and among the various leaders and the rank and file. You deal mainly with local leaders but they, in turn, have to report back what you say and what is proposed.

This brings us to the next proposition—the importance of accepting the realities of bargaining for what they are, imperfect though they may be.

Employers suffer from a terrible frustration in collective bargaining. They view themselves, quite naturally, as the giving party, but it is always the union representatives who get credit for what is given. There is an understandable temptation on the part of employers to seek credit for what they give. There is also a tendency to feel frustrated by one's seeming inability to convince union leadership of the economic unsoundness of certain demands or practices, especially when they appear unsound from the employes' point of view as well as the employers'. But it is sometimes wiser to give credit than cash. The problem stems from the political nature of a representative organization. Some employers—one important one in particular—have developed the practice of putting all they have to offer on the table precluding any higgling or haggling on the terms of settlement. This is justified as an honest and forthright way of dealing with employes, eliminating what is called face saving for union leaders. In the writer's opinion, face saving in this connotation is misleading. Face saving implies doing something to bail someone out who has gotten in too deep. This fails to recognize the true nature of the bargaining process.

Another point which is gaining widespread acceptance is that of recognizing that collective bargaining is an all-year-round process and not something done solely at the terminal date of contract. This is sometimes referred to as continous bargaining and it has taken the form of a human relations committee in steel, and in the establishment of committees and groups from particular industries, to meet away from the bargaining table to consider the problems the industry and union are facing.

While the problems before us are indeed severe, there is no reason to lose confidence in the capacity of collective bargaining to perform its particular job. It can do this job if we follow the simple principles of the policy of labor relations. This calls for acceptance of the fact of collective bargaining as the only alternative, avoidance of generalizations that do not have universal application, avoidance likewise of the tendency towards oversimplification of a complicated process, playing the game according to its rules and recognizing it for what it is, and working at it on an all-year-round basis. With such a policy, we can get the benefits of a process which is difficult in the extreme, but which we must learn to use intelligently if we are to succeed in retaining its values.

Morgan Says:

Congress Should Be Ashamed Of What It Does to D.C. Schools

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

TWENTY YEARS AGO, incredibly enough as that jet-propelled crow of time flies, this correspondent was helping Allied forces liberate the eternal city of Rome from the Nazis. My assistance, as memory screens it through a film of nostalgia for that stupendous spectacle, consisted largely of staring goggle-eyed at the ruins of the Forum and the Colosseum and the completely unruined figures of gorgeous Roman girls who, in a Latin rapture of hospitality, conveniently and delightfully impeded the progress of our retinue of jeeps and other vehicles. Julius Caesar could not have had a more triumphal entry in his heyday. We were conquered.

Morgan

Hardly had we set up a press center in the Stampa Estera—the foreign press building—in downtown Rome and made mental or more tangible notes of whom to bestow the largesse of our PX rations upon than something called the invasion of Normandy crowded us completely off the front page. And in pursuing my research for this essay I discovered to my chagrin that the 1964 World Almanac does not even bother to give a date for the taking of Rome, which began, actually, on the night of June 4. It was difficult, in the shadow of St. Peter's, under the dark cypress trees of the Villa Borghese amidst the pink and orange and ochre walls of the unravaged Italian capital, to visualize the enormity of the Allied invasion of France, by the mightiest armada of ships and planes ever assembled.

EVEN TODAY as the distance of time deepens one's perspective a little, it is not possible to grasp the size of that calculatedly convulsive event or of the tangential events that preceded or followed it, like the fall of Rome or the bombing of Hiroshima. But as private reminiscences and public documentaries unreel, one question keeps flickering persistently on the screen of memory: what did we learn?

What did the greatest war in history—up to now—teach us? True enough the recovery of western Europe, thanks to our massive aid and the Europeans' will, has been a staggering wonder and we Americans ourselves are wading through rich prosperity that has brought us the highest material standard of living that any nation has ever experienced.

But what of the prosperity of our minds? The truth is, and we keep dodging it, that we are continuing scandalously to neglect the one institution on which, more than anything else, the future of the open society depends: education. Without it, in quality as well as quantity, we will be a bankrupt nation. The mocking contradiction of this situation is that people have a yearning to learn that is more persistent than many of their elected and appointed representatives in government give them credit for.

A month ago I recalled the plight of public schools in Washington, the numbing fact that the classrooms of the elementary schools in the capital city of the most powerful nation in the world are almost utterly devoid of library books. Public high schools in the District of Columbia are not much better off.

But there is, as that broadcast was able to report, a candle flickering in the dark. At Dunbar High, in a Negro ghetto not far from the dome of the Capitol, a teacher named Lorraine Goldman has established a paperback lending library by which deprived students are learning to read and are discovering the miracle of books.

Now, it develops, other candles are burning in other schools in Washington. Gage Elementary School, a pin-neat red brick building in a pleasant Negro neighborhood near Howard University, has mobilized children and parents to establish a library. Congress doles out the funds for District schools and Congress should be ashamed of itself.

"If we waited for Congress to act," says Mrs. Erastine P. Williams, president of Gage's PTA, "it would be too late. The children would be gone to junior high."

Or they would be dropouts. Gage doesn't have a library yet, but one room has been hopefully set aside and in a series of PTA meetings baited with door prizes—which turned out not to be needed—$200 has been raised in little more than a fortnight for a book fund.

A schoolbook fever, of sorts, is beginning to grip Washington. The citizens of the national capital, who can't vote on their own civic affairs, are being forced by the indolence and irresponsibility of Congress to take some of these education matters in their own hands.

Asked why he was interested in books, a Gage fifth grader said "we want to learn more than our parents know"—including, presumably, a few pointers on honorable ways to avoid war. Which is not an inappropriate subject to ponder on the 20th anniversary of D-Day in Normandy.

Washington Reports:

Proposed Federal Pay Increase Held Reasonable, Long Overdue

THE PROPOSED pay increase program for federal executives, members of Congress and the judiciary "is a compromise of a compromise" and is long overdue, just and reasonable, according to Rep. James H. Morrison (D-La.), whose bill has been passed by the House, and Rep. George M. Wallhauser (R-N. J.), member of the House committee that considered the legislation.

Morrison pointed out, in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations, that the Randall Commission, headed by Clarence B. Randall, president of Inland Steel, had recommended $50,000 annually for members of the Cabinet, who now get $25,000; $35,000 for members of Congress, now paid $22,500; $60,000 for Supreme Court justices, the vice president and the speaker of the House, instead of $35,000, and $35,000, instead of $22,500, for U. S. district judges.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was a member of the commission and concurred with its recommendations for top level salary increases. In an earlier report, he recommended raises for U.S. employes at lower levels which were higher than those the commission proposed.

The bill that failed in House earlier this year cut the Randall figures, said Morrison, proposing a $10,000 increase for members of Congress instead of the commission's $12,500. Under the current bill the raise would be but $7,500.

WALLHAUSER made the point that 1.7 million classified and postal employes would also receive raises under the bill to make their salaries comparable to but less than private industry rates.

Asked if the $545 million required to pay the increases would be inflationary, he called attention to the fact that the budget provided for an even larger sum for this purpose. Morrison said that the money would go back into the economy at a time when stimulation is necessary to reduce current high unemployment.

He emphasized that many government officials have been obliged to leave their federal jobs, because of low salaries.

Wallhauser said that the increase for members of Congress would not go into effect until Jan. 1, so that none would be voting a raise for himself unless re-elected. Classified and postal workers would get their higher pay on the first payday after approval by the House and Senate.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

CLEVELAND—Gen. Eisenhower may have blown his last chance to remake the Republican Party—a task he showed no taste for during his eight years in the White House—by backing away from a last-ditch effort to steer the GOP away from the nomination of Sen. Goldwater for President. The scene was played almost in public view here at the 56th annual Governors' Conference.

The General had been induced by somebody—and rumor has it that it was Milton Eisenhower, his brother—to initiate a meeting urging Gov. William W. Scranton of Pennsylvania into the race. Rockefeller was clearly finished, beaten by Goldwater in California, and Michigan's Gov. George W. Romney almost equally clearly lacked the political acumen to move surefootedly in the hurricane-blasts of presidential politics. Scranton was the only available potential, and Eisenhower moved.

Scranton is believed by political reporters, who have flocked to his state capital in droves, to have been honest in saying he didn't want to run and didn't even want the White House job. But he heeded Eisenhower's plea and prepared to shift ground. Then the Goldwater backers reached Eisenhower and Ike pulled the rug from under Scranton before Pennsylvania's governor could reach the microphones to make a public response to the General's plea.

There were a few Goldwaterites among the 16 GOP state governors here—but none from the populous northeastern states, where issus such as civil rights and foreign affairs, the United Nations and nuclear bombs, school aid and "selling" the TVA, are taken seriously.

The private caucuses of the Republican governors became exceedingly candid as word was spread of what Eisenhower had done to Scranton. Some of the press conferences of the governors became equally so.

ROMNEY FLAMED UP first with a denunciation of Goldwater attitudes—that is, as "publicly stated," he said—implying he had never before suspected what the senator from Arizona stood for.

When he read the denunciation to his colleagues in caucus they tried to dissuade him from issuing it publicly. Even Rockefeller said, "No, no, this is not the way to do it," and Gov. Mark Hatfield of Oregon asked sardonically where Romney had been all the time. Romney issued his denunciation anyway, after prayerful consideration, and then decided again he wouldn't run for the nomination himself.

When Eisenhower met the GOP governors, the majority told him bluntly that Goldwater would lose almost all, if not all, of the states east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio River. The General said comfortably that perhaps it was the turn of the moderates to accommodate themselves to the party's conservatives on a presidential nominee. Party unity should come above personality, he affirmed. (One governor reported that a ghost of ironical amusement played momentarily across Scranton's face.)

Former Vice Pres. Nixon came to town, turned publicly and violently anti-Goldwater, but as Goldwater remarked a day later, "He's beginning to sound like Stassen."

FOUR AND A HALF MONTHS before the Nov. 3 election, the eastern moderates may be wrong when they foresee disaster for themselves in the House and Senate and for local GOP candidates with Goldwater at the head of the ticket. Maybe the Old Guardsmen who have begged for a "real Republican" instead of a "me-too" candidate will be proved right, and Goldwater will move to the White House pulling along on his victory tails vastly larger numbers of elected Republicans. The moderates don't think so. They fear catastrophe.

Said one angry young man who considers it catastrophe:

"We've thrown away the Negro vote, what little we have of it, forever. They've thrown away the Big Cities strategy (the invention of Ray Bliss, the astute and able Ohio Republican state chairman, and keystone to most GOP planning since 1961).

"They've thrown away my generation. I wouldn't even be able to get my parents to vote for Goldwater. I wouldn't even ask them."

PAY INCREASES for the Cabinet, judiciary, congressional, executive and other federal employes are necessary in equity and to halt resignations, Rep. James H. Morrison (D-La.), left, and Rep. George M. Wallhauser (R-N. J.) asserted in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

Anti-Wrinkle Cosmetics Draw FDA Crackdown 'Just in Time'

By Sidney Margolius

THE FOOD & DRUG Administration has moved swiftly and decisively to seize several brands of anti-wrinkle creams recently brought out by cosmetics manufacturers with what the government charges are exaggerated claims.

In rapid succession, the FDA already has seized shipments of "Helene Curtis Magic Secret Wrinkle Smoothing Skin Lotion" and also "Sudden Change," and "Anti-Wrinkle Face Lift" manufactured by the Lanolin Plus Laboratory of Hazel Bishop, Inc., and "Line Away Temporary Wrinkle Smoother," by the Coty Division of Charles Pfizer.

This energetic action has startled the $2.5 billion cosmetics industry which has been enjoying its most profitable era as the result of television saturation advertising of lotions, deodorants, rinses, hair dressings and other products.

The government's action may have come just in time to protect the rest of us. Helene Curtis now is preparing to bring out a similar wrinkle cream for men, who up to now may not have been worried particularly about wrinkles.

As this department reported last January before the new lotions came on the market, most have as their supposedly amazing new ingredient, a protein derived from the blood of cattle.

The FDA acted because it considers the new lotions should be classified as new drugs, not merely cosmetics, and as such, they "are not generally recognized as safe and effective by qualified experts for prolonged, continued use for removal of wrinkles and no New Drug Application has been approved" as required by law.

The FDA also charges that the three products it seized are misbranded because their labeling "is false and misleading when read by the ordinary consumer." In the case of "Magic Secret," the FDA argues that the labeling gives middle-aged women the impression that "this is a newly-discovered article produced after years of research which will immediately and dramatically eliminate all her wrinkles. . . ."

The FDA says that in actuality, the product has only a temporary effect on wrinkles, and that regular applications do not provide any permanent benefits.

The government agency made similar complaints of exaggeration against Hazel Bishop's "Sudden Change" and Pfizer's "Line Away." The FDA said that the labeling on "Line Away" also suggests that the user will feel a "tingling sensation which is natural and indicates the 'Line Away' is at work."

Helene Curtis also sells a similar lotion called "Soft Focus" through its door-to-door subsidiary company, Studio Girl. One Studio Girl representative told us that the protein in this lotion "works with the protein in the skin." She didn't explain how this takes place.

AS PREVIOUSLY reported, the price of these wrinkles lotions sold to worried women, and about to be sold to men who want to keep their skin smooth, is $5 for one-fifth of an ounce, in the case of "Magic Secret." The reason given for this new world's record in lotion prices is that it takes 1,000 head of cattle to produce the protein for 50,000 fifth-of-an-ounce bottles.

For consumers, the real significance of the FDA actions is the determined effort FDA is making to check lavish claims which could mislead consumers about the effectiveness or uniqueness of such products.

It is a fact that heavy television advertising has increased family spending noticeably for not only skin lotions, but a host of other surprisingly expensive products, often sold with high-pressure claims. Teen-agers have been shown to be especially susceptible to TV promotion of such products.

Most dramatic has been the increased purchases of body deodorants, which alone now takes an estimated $130 million a year of the public's money. This is a form of spending that advertising created. Before the deodorant ads started there was no deodorant market, one toiletries manufacturer recently told a business reporter in predicting that we are entering an era of "total deodorization."

Not only women and teen-agers but men are increasingly worrying about underarm odor. One authority reports that men now are responsible for one-fourth of the purchases of deodorants.

Senators Volunteer:

Financial Disclosure Pushed in Congress

CONFLICT OF INTEREST is a phrase that is being increasingly used by critics of Congress. How do you make sure that a senator isn't letting his private interests dictate his voting record? How do you make sure that he isn't using his immense power to push projects that may enrich him or his friends?

Theoretically it should not be necessary to ask such questions. The good morals and the good taste of a man who becomes a United States senator should be taken for granted. Unfortunately, this isn't true. There are still members of the Senate who are perfectly willing to accept legal fees from clients who are vitally affected by Senate votes. And there are still others who insist that they are the best judges of what is proper conduct in any possible conflict of interest between their own pocketbooks and the public welfare.

Things may not be as blatant as they were in the early days when senators were clearly marked as representing for pay special interests without any sense of impropriety. A revered Daniel Webster could calmly write the monied interests of Massachusetts to remind them that his "'retainer" had not recently been "refreshed." Nevertheless, there has been a growing concern among a number of senators that the Senate image is being damaged by "conflict of interest" situations. The Bobby Baker case has served to sharpen their concern.

ONE SOLUTION that apparently has struck a favorable chord is the voluntary revelation by senators of their financial interests.

Already a number of senators have taken that step. They include "Mike" Mansfield of Montana, Democratic majority leader; Joseph Clark (D-Pa.), Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.), Kenneth Keating (R-N.Y.), Hugh Scott (R-Pa.), Stephen Young (D-O.), William Proxmire (D-Wis.), Philip Hart (D-Mich.), Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), Clifford Case (R-N.J.), Harrison Williams (D-N.J.), and Frank Church (D-Idaho).

In presenting his own financial record, Church questioned whether a workable conflict-of-interest statute could be worked out in view of the fact that it is almost impossible for a senator to avoid voting on financial legislation which, in one way or another, affected him.

"If a solution is to be found," he said, "we must look for it in the field of full disclosure. Let each senator make public his personal holdings and his sources of income. Then the voter may compare the senator's record in office with his financial holdings and determine for himself whether the senator has voted his private pocketbook interests or the general public interest, in the discharge of his duties." (PAI)

"Why, yes, I have had a previous loan with you—in fact, I want this loan to pay off that loan."

HERE'S A BRAIN-TWISTER for you:

If Martin is a meat-and-potatoes man who hates fancy cooking;

And Agnes is a graduate of Cordon Bleu, who views cooking as an art form, and considers roast beef and browned potatoes dull and unimaginative;

And if Tom and Helen are Goldwater supporters;

And Leonard and Harriet are voluble advocates of Medicare;

And if Martha and Paul adore Doris Day movies, and think the Beverly Hillbillies are a scream;

And George and Carol refuse to have a television set in the house, and attend only foreign movies;

And if Bill is on a low-cholesterol diet, and can't eat butter or mayonnaise or whipped cream or gravy;

And Ed is on a bland diet for his ulcer, and can't eat fruits or vegetables unless they're pureed;

And if the Masons are expecting their eighth child;

And the Wainwrights are charter members of the Planned Parenthood Committee;

And if the Hansons have just returned from a trip to the Orient, and can't talk about anything else;

And the Clarks have just returned from Mexico, and are bursting to talk about their impressions;

'The Blue-Sky Sweatshop':

Farm Labor's Critical Plight Key Front in Poverty Drive

No battle in the War on Poverty deserves a higher priority than the one that must be waged to bring "decency and hope" to the farm worker at the bottom of America's economic heap, according to an analysis of "The Blue-Sky Sweatshop" in the current issue of the American Federationist.

The "desperate plight" of those who work for wages on the nation's farms can no longer be ignored because "by any yardstick they are the most impoverished and exploited segment of the American labor force" and their working and living conditions are a "national scandal," the article declares.

The indictment of a society that stacks the cards against the element of its population least able to help itself is a Labor's Economic Review feature of the AFL-CIO monthly publication, prepared by the Dept. of Research.

"Although these workers contribute to the greatest abundance of food and fiber any nation has ever known," the magazine points out, "their reward is hardly sufficient to provide subsistence for them and their families.

"These workers are the victims of tragic job insecurity. They are denied the benefit of almost all the welfare and labor legislation that ensures a minimum standard of economic and social well-being for other American workers.

"Furthermore, as though to ensure their permanent degradation, year after year Congress has sanctioned the importation of thousands of foreign agricultural workers who compete unfairly with them.

Greed, Indifference Cited

"Their impoverishment results from technological progress, the greed of many employers and incredible public indifference."

Farm output has jumped 148 percent since the end of World War II, the article notes, but real farm wages have risen only 28 percent and the number of farm workers has dropped by more than 30 percent. About 3.5 million Americans did some farm work for wages in 1962, but only 2 million of them worked for more than 25 days and a mere 700,000 for more than 150 days.

Their earnings have been a continually declining proportion of the average factory wage, dropping from 67 percent in 1910-14 to 47 percent in 1945 and then to 36 percent last year. In the South, which employs more than half the farm laborers, the average rate in 1963 was 68 cents an hour, the article says. The highest average, $1.30 an hour, was reached in the Pacific Coast states.

"Those most responsible for the deplorable status of the hired farm laborer hide behind the myth that American agriculture cannot afford to do better," the article charges. "Higher labor costs would destroy the family farmer, they proclaim.

"Nothing could be further from the truth."

The reason, the article continues, is that agriculture has become big business with the family farm contributing less and less to total production and with fewer than 9 percent of all farms accounting for nearly 50 percent of all farm sales.

It is the largest farms that hire most farm labor, the Economic Review goes on, with 52 percent of the farms at the other end of the scale using no hired labor at all.

"The ability of a handful of giant factories in the fields to operate low-wage sweatshops directly threatens the well-being of the family farmers who compete against them," it observes.

". . . The degradation of the hired farm worker inevitably lowers the value of the labor of the family farmer and, hence, his income."

The article points out discriminatory legislation that bars farm workers from protections such as minimum wages, unemployment and workmen's compensation, and the right to organize into unions, and notes the depressing effect of imported farm labor on both the employment opportunities and the wages of domestic farm workers.

'Heightened' Concern

It observes that with "heightened public concern" over the unresolved problem of poverty, "important victories" may be at hand for the farm worker. Part of the heightened attack must be in the legislative area, it adds, and declares that "the main lines of action are clear:"

- "All foreign worker import programs must now be terminated."
- "Farm workers and their families must be given equal status with other Americans under the terms of all federal and state social welfare and labor laws."
- "Migratory farm workers, whose desperate plight particularly should be the cause of national shame, must be helped to enter the mainstream of American life by enactment of all of the measures initiated by the Senate Subcommittee on Migratory Labor."

"Ultimately," the article concludes, "a truly American standard of life and employment with dignity and self-respect can only be attained by farm workers themselves through union organization. Only when protective legislation can be reinforced by collective bargaining will the American conditions of life and of work so long denied them be won and preserved."

Equal Pay Law Goes Into Effect

An estimated 7.4 million women are guaranteed that they won't be paid less than men doing the same work under the Equal Pay Act which went into effect June 11.

The legislation, passed last year, also prohibits employers from lowering wages of men workers in order to bring about wage equality.

It covers all employers and workers who are presently under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Jobless Rate Declines To 4-Year Low in May

level and showed a greater-than-seasonal decline.

- The May rise in total employment was about 200,000 above the expected seasonal increase and reached a record all-time high of 71.1 million.

The 5.1 overall rate of unemployment for May was last reached in May 1960 at the peak of the recovery from the 1958 recession.

Harold Goldstein, in charge of employment statistics for the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics, expressed hope that "we are off the 5.4 percent plateau"—the unemployment rate for the past three months.

BLS officials were tempering their enthusiasm over the one-month drop in the jobless rate, however, indicating the possibility that it could move upward in June when teenagers hit the job market looking for summer employment.

The President, taking note of the continuing high level of unemployment among teenagers, termed it "extremely serious," warning that "further progress" must be made in this area. He called for enactment of the Administration's anti-poverty program to "provide both training and job opportunities for our young people and thereby strike at the basic roots of poverty."

He hailed "the fine advance already made in creating new jobs," adding that it would "give us courage and confidence to move steadily forward toward our goal of full employment."

Role of Social Agencies Cited in Poverty War

Newark, N.J.—How effectively the voluntary social agencies meet their challenges may well be the "deciding factor" in the War on Poverty, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler said at the annual awards dinner of the Essex-West Hudson Community Services.

Schnitzler visualized the effort to end penury in the lives of nearly 40 million Americans as a cooperative venture.

"Launching the attack deserves and demands the best efforts of all segments of American life," he said. "Government, private agencies, management, labor and individuals must join hands in a wholly united effort. I, for one, believe that we can work together—and that working together, we will succeed."

Labor, he said, "must" play a key role in the war because "our commitment to our country and to our fellow man demands our complete cooperation and maximum effort." He emphasized that the war is not new to organized workers because "we have been fighting it for generations—from the earliest days of trade unionism."

Schnitzler offered four suggestions for the role of the voluntary agencies in the War on Poverty:

- They can make "deprived human beings visible realities to the majority of the community that has no contact with them."
- They can serve as "trailblazers in finding new approaches to solutions for community problems;" attacking the "entire body" of poverty, instead of "just chipping away at the edges," will require new methods.
- They can develop community leadership in helping the functional side of agency work, and expand beyond the fund-raising role.
- They can serve as the eyes and ears of their communities to assure the "efficiency and effectiveness" of government programs.

"Let me re-emphasize that I do not see the entire burden of the poverty war falling on the voluntary agencies," Schnitzler added. "When I speak of 'you,' I mean 'we,' for your work is our work. We of the AFL-CIO recognize our responsibilities in this war and we are ready to discharge them to the very fullest of our capabilities.

"In the final analysis we must face reality. Unless we kill the germs that cause poverty, the disease will certainly return to haunt us once more."

New Mexico 'Work' Drive Session Flops

Albuquerque, N. M.—Only five persons, including the host and the principal speaker, showed up at a meeting here called to launch a drive to outlaw the union shop in New Mexico.

The National Council for Industrial Peace reported that invitations to the meeting had been sent to leading New Mexico businessmen, industrialists and ranchers. The scheduled speaker was Charles W. Bailey, a staff member of the National Right to Work Committee.

Meanwhile in nearby Oklahoma, where voters last month turned down a proposed "right-to-work" constitutional amendment, the organization which put on the anti-union shop campaign reported that its state president, Raymond Armstrong, has resigned. Armstrong, who came from Kansas, had served as the chief spokesman for the "work" supporters in their unsuccessful campaign.

Soviets Aiding Spanish Crackdown on Miners

Russian ships are unloading coal in Spanish ports to help ease the shortage created by strikes of Asturias miners, according to word the AFL-CIO has received from the free underground labor movement.

Some of the shipments are believed intended to create a stockpile for use in future strikes that are believed certain to come as the miners press their determined fight for improved wages and working conditions.

Most of the coal the Soviet Union is sending to help the Spanish government comes from Poland, according to the underground movement.

The "cynicism" of the Communist nations was pointed out by AFL-CIO Intl. Affairs Dir. Jay Lovestone.

"By exporting coal to Spain and providing vessels for transportation," he said, "they are helping the Spanish Falangist dictatorship to break the brave fight put up by the Spanish workers to regain trade union freedom and a decent standard of living.

"These tactics are in line with Communist policies of achieving their own imperialist foreign policy ends even if the workers suffer the consequences."

The Communists have given a helping hand to the Franco government on other occasions in the past.

In the period immediately after the Spanish revolutions the Russians were frequently accused of "fingering" Spanish Communist leaders whom Franco was quick to execute. More recently, in the United Nations Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization, the Spanish and Russian delegations worked out a tentative agreement to exchange trade union delegations. The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions took such conspicuous notice than Spain announced a "delay" in carrying out the agreement.

The two nations also entered into negotiations on exchanging trade delegations, but the Russians recessed them when Spain renegotiated its military base agreement with the United States.

In another development, spokesmen for underground free workers in Spain have asked maritime unions throughout the world to refuse to handle cargo destined for or arriving from Spain. This would be one of the most effective ways the free world could help Spanish unions in their struggle for civil and labor rights, they say.

New York 65 Seen Moving to Hike Rates

New York—A move to increase rates will shortly be made by the New York 65 Health Insurance Association, Pres. Raymond R. Corbett of the New York State AFL-CIO has predicted.

The association sells hospital and medical insurance to those over 65 years of age on a non-profit basis. Corbett said his forecast was based on recent testimony of the plan's president, Morton D. Miller, before the U.S. Senate Subcommittee on the Health of the Elderly. Miller testified that claims were exceeding estimates, and that if costs continued to rise a "modest increase" would be necessary.

$10,000 DOWN PAYMENT on the $61,000 quota of the Textile Workers Union of America for the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Fund and the John F. Kennedy Memorial Library is presented to R. Sargent Shriver, center, by Sec.-Treas. John Chupka, as Pres. William Pollock stands by. The check is made out to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and will be part of the AFL-CIO contribution.

TWUA Delegates See Organizing Goal In Sight

New York—Organizing the 800,000 unorganized textile workers in the United States and Canada is an attainable goal for the first time in almost 20 years, the Textile Workers Union of America believes.

This spirit of optimism dominated the closing days of the union's 25th anniversary convention here.

An organization committee report and an accompanying resolution—both adopted unanimously—gave these reasons for the new surge of confidence:

- A more objective attitude by the National Labor Relations Board.
- New aid from the AFL-CIO and its Industrial Union Dept. The AFL-CIO drive in Los Angeles has brought 500 new members into TWUA, the convention was told; the IUD is backing a campaign at the nation's second-largest textile chain, J. P. Stevens Co.
- Evidence of a "rebirth of organizing fervor," seen in two major southern election victories, involving some 1,800 workers, and in the formation of 45 volunteer organizing committees on which more than 400 rank-and-file members serve without pay.
- Recent successes in Quebec, the "Canadian South," where most of that nation's unorganized workers are located.

Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the IUD, Nick Zonarich, its organizing director, and Jim Pierce, head of the Stevens campaign, added to the optimistic spirit in speeches to the convention. So did a dramatic presentation honoring TWUA's silver anniversary, entitled "In Our Keeping."

Alexander Barkan, national COPE director who once held a comparable post with TWUA, warned that organizational and economic progress are inseparable from political progress.

Responding to an earlier proposal by Pres. William Pollock, the convention unanimously endorsed Lyndon B. Johnson for President. It also urged enactment of old-age hospital care under the social security system, backed the "war on poverty," called for stronger implementation of wage standards under the Walsh-Healey act and asked Congress to revise its rules and customs, including the seniority system.

Reverting to internal affairs, the convention abolished the five "administrative vice president" offices created two years ago, returning to the earlier system of 20 vice presidents elected at large. It also wiped out the post of president emeritus. Other proposed changes were dropped in favor of a two-year study of the union's constitution,

The 12 newcomers among the 20 vice presidents, who with Pollock and Sec.-Treas. John Chupka comprise the union's executive council, include Edward Todd, manager of TWUA's Chicago Joint Board. Todd was the first Negro candidate for national office in the union.

Following the convention, Pollock announced the appointment of Irving Abramson, former New Jersey CIO president, as general counsel, succeeding Ben Wyle.

Eisenhower Plays Key Role:

'Stop-Goldwater' Drive Fails As Chief Rivals Back Away

previously stated positions on major issues of foreign and domestic policy. His campaign managers claimed close to 700 votes for him on the first convention ballot, with only 655 needed to nominate, and Goldwater flew back to Washington immediately after the dinner to "vote on the Republican civil rights amendments," he said.

- Gov. George W. Romney of Michigan, after informing GOP governors of his intentions, told a press conference he foresaw the beginnings of "suicidal destruction of the Republican Party as an effective instrument" of government with Goldwater as its nominee unless the Arizona senator could satisfy him in a private consultation—not a group conference—that he supports "basic principles" of the GOP "heritage."

Romney said he had not realized "until the last day or two" that the party was faced with the possibility of the foreclosed nomination of "a candidate who does not accept these basic principles at least in his public utterances." Goldwater returned to Washington without seeing Romney.

- Gen. Eisenhower, stressing the importance of "party unity" in a session with the party's governors, got blunt warnings from the executives of populous industrial states that the party faced "disaster" on congressional and local candidates with the Arizona senator leading the ticket. The former president closed the meeting with a comment that principles and party unity were "more important than personalities."
- Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York told a press conference that he would continue a fight to influence the party platform but that he could no longer carry alone the burden of opposing Goldwater's nomination bandwagon. Of Romney's assault on the Arizona senator, he said it came "too late," and he used with regard to the Eisenhower policies and pre-convention operations the same word "meandering" he had previously employed to describe Goldwater's concepts.
- Nixon's effort to create a "third force" against Goldwater included startling attacks on the senator's "previously stated" positions, which in regard to "five key issues" would have to be "challenged, repudiated and modified" by the senator himself, he said. But only five days earlier he had publicly warned that any "stop-Goldwater" movement following the senator's decisive victory in the California GOP primary would "split the party wide open."

Scranton commented that he "didn't know what Nixon was talking about," and Romney—who had gone back to Michigan for a day to confer with state leaders—returned to say he would still "fight on the platform" but that he had "committed" himself to run for re-election as governor, not serve as a makeweight against Goldwater in the presidential race.

- Eisenhower, in his dinner-meeting address made an all-out plea for the elevation of state responsibility as against federal, admonishing the governors to avoid looking to a powerful central government and speaking regretfully of their failure to accept previous counsel to this effect. Goldwater, who personally told the former president he would not remain overnight to meet with him and the GOP governors, departed with words of praise for the Eisenhower theme. "It's what I've been saying all along," the senator commented blandly.

The Eisenhower-Scranton episode involved an extraordinarily fast reversal of attitudes by the former president, leaving the Pennsylvania governor with his feet cut from under him just before going on a scheduled nationwide television panel show (Face the Nation—CBS) apparently prepared to announce his availability.

Pieced together from authoritative sources, the story began with a telephone call from Eisenhower to Scranton the evening of June 5 offering to travel to the state capital, Harrisburg, to discuss the upcoming convention. Scranton went June 6 to the former president's Gettysburg farm, where for more than an hour he was urged to "broaden" his previously stated attitude toward seeking the nomination, to emphasize the "affirmative" aspects of his willingness to accept a convention "draft" rather than the "negative" aspects of his unwillingness to make an open fight.

Change of Plans

Scranton, considering that he had a clear Eisenhower appeal and a pledge of backing, thought it over and prepared to announce his availability. But when he reached Cleveland the next morning, June 7, he found a telephone call from Eisenhower awaiting him. The former president said a good many people had protested that a late Scranton move would smack of a "stop-Goldwater" operation. Eisenhower was quoted as saying to the Pennsylvania governor, "Neither of us want to be part of a cabal to stop anybody, would we?"

Scranton hastily discarded a statement on his availability and resumed his former stance of refusing to make an active drive for the nomination. Widely mentioned as one of the party leaders who had reached Eisenhower with "protests" against Scranton was former Treasury Sec. George M. Humphrey. Humphrey is Midwest finance committee chairman for the Arizona senator. The former President and Mrs. Eisenhower were guests while in Cleveland at Humphrey's nearby estate.

The technical business of the governors' meeting—juvenile delinquency reports, reports on highways, safety, civil defense, the national guard, principles of federal school aid—was totally overshadowed by the intense maneuvering among the GOP governors despite the small numerical size of the Republican bloc—only 16 governors from the 50 states.

The conference was also marked by a joint press conference appearance by California's Gov. Edmund G. Brown and the state's Democratic senatorial nominee, Pierre Salinger. Brown had unsuccessfully backed the candidacy of State Controller Alan Cranston against Salinger in the party's primary. It was the first meeting of the two since then, and each pledged full cooperation in the election in which Salinger will oppose GOP nominee George Murphy.

Wirtz Calls for Longer Schooling To Meet Manpower, Skill Needs

Los Angeles—Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz said here that serious consideration should be given to require pupils to stay in school until they are prepared to "carry themselves in the society at large."

The suggestion appeared to be an extension of the labor secretary's earlier proposal to raise the usual age of compulsory education from the present 16 to 18.

He made the suggestion here at the third of a series of seminars on automation and technological change. The others were held in Chicago and Philadelphia.

The session here was sponsored by the President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy and the University of California's Institute of Industrial Relations, in cooperation with the California State AFL-CIO and the Merchants & Manufacturers Association.

Wirtz said that at all three sessions, attended by top labor and management leaders, there was agreement generally that a major expansion of the educational system is necessary and on the need to set up an "early warning system" to guard against the impact of automation.

He will press, he said, for creation of 10 three-man teams composed of economists and scientists to survey industry and help anticipate plant openings and closings and future manpower needs.

Next year, he noted, nearly 500,000 young people will be in government-sponsored training programs, but "the trouble is we don't really know what skills to emphasize in the programs. We need much more accurate forecasts of future manpower needs."

Some administration officials had been concerned, he said, that businessmen might shy away from such programs because it will require planning, and to some this "is an unpleasant word."

But the consensus has been "stop talking about the need and start doing it," he observed.

Of the 35 million people who will enter the work force in the next 10 years, 9.5 million will not have finished high school, Wirtz said.

No Jobs for Dropouts

In the past, the lack of education was not an overwhelming handicap, but today "these people without high school educations are just not going to have jobs" he warned.

"We used to think that we did our duty by providing 12 years of free education, and our thinking has been that anybody who doesn't use that is making a mistake, that it is his fault, that it's too bad, and our responsibility ends with the supplying of that opportunity," he said, adding:

"It seems to me that the proposition ought to be rather that we are going to require in one form or another a person to stay in school until that person is prepared to carry himself in the society at large.

"I don't mean the same kind of schooling that he's been getting. I mean the kind of education needed to meet the present situation."

Statistics now available on future manpower needs are often just meaningless, he said, "like the man with one foot in the ice box and the other on the stove saying he is, on the average, quite comfortable."

The secretary said the nation is piling up a "human scrap heap of between 250,000 and 500,000 people a year, many of whom never appear in the unemployment statistics."

The "human scrap heap," he said, is composed of people who are disqualified from employment in a skilled economy and cannot or will not find work without special help "because of technological development, of their own educational failures, of poverty environments and other causes."

They are often not counted among the jobless because they have given up looking for work, Wirtz said, warning the numbers will continue to "grow and grow unless we make full employment a primary test of our economic performance."

Two Dock Locals Merge in Manhattan

New York — Members of two Manhattan locals of the Longshoremen have voted to merge into one local to secure "greater job security" for dock workers and more stability on the waterfront. Pres. John Bowers remains as head of the enlarged Local 824 and James Castellano of the former Local 1811 becomes business agent of the new local.

The merger creates one of the largest dock locals in Manhattan.

Administration Wins in House:

Foreign Aid Bill, Pay Hike Approved

The solid 230-175 foreign aid victory was the second success in a row for the Administration on the foreign aid program, which in past years has been heavily slashed at every step of the legislative process.

Earlier the House Foreign Affairs Committee refused to make any cuts in the bill, sending it to the floor intact with a strong bipartisan endorsement.

Before the vote, all House members received a memorandum from the AFL-CIO warning that "without American assistance many countries will not be strong enough to resist Communist subversion and aggression or to continue successfully their fight against poverty, disease and ignorance."

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged congressmen to "vote for the bill as it was reported by the House Foreign Affairs Committee and to oppose any crippling or weakening amendments."

Closest vote on the aid bill came when the House rejected, 211-193, a Republican recommital motion to cut $222 million from the bill.

The foreign aid program's most severe test will come on the appropriations which, in the past, have always carried less money than Congress has authorized. Rep. Otto E. Passman (D-La.), a strong foe of foreign aid, is head of the subcommittee which deals with the money bill.

The Administration, which submitted what aid supporters have termed a "bare bones budget," is reported to be prepared to battle both in the full Appropriations Committee and on the House floor to prevent severe cutbacks.

In other significant congressional developments:

- The House Education & Labor Committee approved a bill, strongly supported by the Building Service Employes, to require contractors who perform custodial and cleaning work for government buildings to pay area prevailing rates to workers. Labor has charged that existing low-bid contracts gave an unfair advantage to non-union firms paying substandard wages.

The committee put off until a later meeting action on a subcommittee-approved bill which would eliminate the Landrum-Griffin requirement for "faithful performance of duties" bonds for union officers and employes, and substitute the customary "honesty". bonds. The AFL-CIO is strongly supporting the change, pointing out that bonding companies have imposed an unnecessary extra premium for the broader coverage.

- The House Rules Committee agreed to begin hearings on the Administration's anti-poverty bill, which has been approved by the Labor Committee.

- As cloture brought the Senate within sight of passage of civil rights legislation, the AFL-CIO began a strong push for quick action on the Davis-Bacon fringe benefits bill, already approved both by the House and the Senate Labor Committee.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in letters to all senators, urged its approval "without irrelevant or crippling amendments." He pointed out that fringe benefits, virtually unknown when the Davis-Bacon Act was passed 33 years ago, are today "as much a part of the wage structure as the cash wage payment itself."

The pending bill would require employers on government construction contracts to match area standards of fringe benefits.

AROUND THE TABLE at recent meeting of AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurers Conference in Louisville, Ky., are: Gordon W. Chapman, State, County & Municipal Employes; Richard E. Livingston, Carpenters; William C. O'Neill, Plumbers & Pipefitters; Joseph D. Keenan, secretary of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler; Mrs. Esther F. Johnson, Government Employes; Toney Gallo, Cement Workers, chairman of the conference; Newell J. Carman, Operating Engineers; John C. Kabachus, Fire Fighters, and Owen H. Schoon, Postal Clerks.

CLC Protests Tax Ruling On Insurance

Ottawa, Ont. — The Canadian Labor Congress has called on the federal government to reconsider its decision to make hospital insurance premiums paid by employers under union contracts subject to the income tax.

If the decision is allowed to stand, CLC Sec.-Treas. Donald MacDonald wrote Acting Minister of National Revenue George McIlraith, it will mean financial loss for workers.

MacDonald pointed out that most workers covered by union contracts have their hospital insurance premiums paid by the employer. The CLC has learned, he said, that the government has accepted an interpretation of the Income Tax Act which would make employer-paid premiums subject to the tax where the law requires their payment.

"In the collective bargaining process no distinction has been made by the parties to the collective agreement between premiums payable to a public agency, such as the Ontario Hospital Services Commission, or a private one like Blue Cross," he wrote.

LABOR'S SUPPORT for a strong civil rights bill was stressed by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, center, in a radio interview with Cecil Holland, left, of the Washington Star and Neil MacNeil of Time magazine. In foreground is Harry W. Flannery, moderator of the Labor News Conference program heard on the Mutual Broadcasting network.

AFL-CIO Gives Strong Support To Appalachia Development Bill

The Administration's proposed Appalachia development program was strongly endorsed by the AFL-CIO in House testimony terming the bill a "challenging and imaginative approach" to the special problems of the "too long neglected" 10-state region.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged a House Public Works subcommittee to "act promptly" on the proposal "as part of the overall national attack on poverty" and to carry out the objectives of the 1946 Employment Act. His testimony was presented by Legislative Rep. Clinton M. Fair.

While stressing labor's "enthusiastic" support of both the goals and basic provisions of the Administration bill, Biemiller proposed a series of amendments to strengthen the measure, including a clearcut ban on plant piracy and runaway employers.

Biemiller told the special subcommittee set up to speed hearings on the bill that the proposed program of highway construction will have an "immediate job-creating impact" and "will open a door for the back country people of Appalachia to enter the social and economic life of America. These new highways will also open the great recreational potential of the region to tourists whose spending will give an added boost" to the region's economy.

He praised the provisions for "multi-purpose and coordinated water use . . . research to find more uses for coal . . . and to restore land eroded by strip-mining."

Job Goals Backed

Labor endorses "the proposed expansion of employment services, the provision of funds for community work and training programs, extension of the school lunch program and support for health and housing," Biemiller declared.

The AFL-CIO spokesman proposed these further improvements to the bill:

- A new leadership training program, to be administered by the land grant colleges in the area, designed to stimulate citizen participation to spur economic and social progress in Appalachia.

Drawing a parallel with the long-standing agricultural extension service, Biemiller said labor sees such a program "as an opportunity to develop citizen leaders . . . who will give vitally needed drive and dynamism to the redevelopment and renewal of Appalachia." He proposed a $7.5 million federal grant for such a program.

- Inclusion of Davis-Bacon prevailing wage guarantees in all federally-assisted construction under the program "to preclude the possibility that labor standards in the region might be undermined rather than raised."

- Stronger safeguards against runaway employers and plant piracy. The bill, Biemiller said, should specifically deny aid "to an employer who engages in the subterfuge of changing his corporate name but who has in fact relocated to an employer who would engage in fulfilling subcontracts formerly performed elsewhere, and to an enterprise that seeks to expand facilities in an industry in which very substantial under-utilized capacity already exists."

The Administration's bill would authorize a $736 million program, of which $228 million would be spent the first year. More than half the amount would be for highway and road construction designed to open up previously inaccessible areas and attract industry, rather than meet existing transportation needs.

Biemiller cautioned that the proposed Appalachia program, as is the case with other projects to aid depressed areas, can't be completely successful "unless the American economy as a whole achieves and sustains a high rate of growth with expanding job opportunity for all American workers."

But without such a program, he warned, persistent unemployment and poverty can continue "even during times of national prosperity."

New UIU Contract Seeks Strike-Lockout Solution

Berne, Ind.—The Upholsterers have signed a collective bargaining agreement with the Dunbar Furniture Corp. here providing that workers may call a strike or management may declare a lockout but production will continue and no one will suffer a financial loss—if the dispute is settled within six weeks.

Union Pres. Sal B. Hoffmann and company Pres. Harold D. Sprunger, saying they know of no other similar arrangement, signed an agreement with these provisions:

- When labor and management fail to agree on contract terms in the future, the union may call a strike or the company a lockout, but no one may stop production, stage a slowdown or take legal action for a 12-week period.

- For six weeks, 50 percent of the "strikers'" wages and an equal amount in company funds will be deposited in an account at the First Bank of Berne. Upon settlement, all the withheld money will be returned to the employes and the management.

- If talks continue over another three-week period, worker and employer contributions would continue, but only 75 percent of the trust fund would be returned to the parties on settlement, and the bank would get a small service charge.

- If settlement is reached within the next two weeks, both parties get only a 50 percent return on the funds in trust.

- Finally a single "sudden death" week remains during which the parties get a 25 percent return if they settle. After that, no money is returned to the workers or management, who may turn the funds over to a mutually agreed-upon charity or community beneficiary, or ask local clergymen to decide on its disposition.

The UIU and the company agreed that a genuine strike or lockout may start after 12 weeks if the other party to the dispute is given advance notice, but without such a notice the previous agreement is renewed automatically for a year.

All injury or illness insurance will be paid to the workers during the first "strike" or lockout period and will not be considered as wages.

Federal Unions Hit Postal Cutback

The AFL-CIO Government Employes Council has protested curtailment of postal services to the public, terming it a "move backward."

Restriction of Saturday service, the GEC said, "has made the post office virtually inaccessible to millions of working people."

GEC Operations Dir. John A. McCart said that if Postmaster Gen. John A. Gronouski fails to rescind his cutback orders, federal employe unions "will petition Congress to restore the efficiency of the service through legislation."

Drive for Passage Opens:

Senate Cloture Vote Spurs Rights Forces

then expands in subsequent years to cover establishments with 75, 50 and 25 workers.

Also beaten, 56-40, was an amendment by Sen. Bourke Hickenlooper (R-Ia.) to drop a provision for federal training programs to help teachers deal with desegregation problems.

The only major leadership-opposed amendment which carried was sponsored by Sen. Thruston B. Morton (R-Ky.). It guarantees a jury trial in all criminal contempt cases arising out of violations of court orders barring discrimination in public accommodations, public facilities, schools, federally-assisted programs, and employment. Senate Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) and Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) had proposed limiting jury trials to contempt cases involving sentences of more than 30 days in jail or a $300 fine. The Morton amendment won by a 51-48 vote.

The four amendments were acted on before the cloture vote at the insistence of a group of GOP conservatives led by Hickenlooper, chairman of the party's Senate Policy Committee.

There had been some speculation that Goldwater, returning to the Senate triumphant after his California primary victory, might wean away from Dirksen some of the carefully-collected Republican votes committed to cloture. The Arizona senator voted for the restrictive amendments and against cloture, but did not speak on the issue and dropped contradictory hints as to how he may vote on final passage.

Although the Senate was operating under a procedure which assured a cloture vote at 11 a.m. on June 10, West Virginia's Sen. Robert F. Byrd (D) spoke through the night in a 14-hour speech against the rights bill.

'Time for Decision'

As the hour approached for the cloture vote, Mansfield told the Senate it had reached "a crossroads of history and the time for decision is at hand."

Sen. Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.), in a final plea to his colleagues to vote against cloture, complained of "great pressures" brought on senators "by both political parties . . . the President of the United States . . . the leaders of the great labor organizations." He added:

"During the course of the debate, we have seen cardinals, bishops, elders, stated clerks, common preachers, priests and rabbis come to Washington to press for passage of this bill."

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.), Democratic floor leader for the bill, told the Senate that "the Constitution of the United States is on trial. The question is whether we will have two types of citizenship in this nation, or first-class citizenship for all."

Dirksen pleaded with his fellow Republicans to support cloture and pass the bill "to insure survival of our party."

To argue that cloture should never be invoked, he said, is to say that the Senate "adopted a rule which it did not intend to use."

With the cloture decision out of the way, the Senate moved quickly to the series of votes on additional pending amendments. Leaders of both parties are supporting a broad substitute bill which AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has said would "establish a workable civil rights program, providing no further amendments are adopted which would weaken it."

Of the first major amendments offered thereafter, the leadership easily beat two—a move by Russell to delay the effective date of the public accommodations section of the bill until November 1965, and a motion by Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) to strip the bill of a section directing a cutoff of federal funds where state or local authorities administering the program discriminate.

Rights Bill Link To L-G Rejected

An effort by Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.) to undercut the pending civil rights bill by tying it to the Landrum-Griffin Act failed the day after the Senate voted cloture on the long southern filibuster.

McClellan's amendment would have authorized suits by the Attorney General to enjoin violation or suspected "about-to-be" violation of the rights of individual members of unions.

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) raised a point of order that the McClellan amendment was not germane to the civil rights bill. When Sen. John C. Stennis (D-Miss.), temporarily the presiding officer, denied the point of order, Humphrey took an appeal, and the Senate overruled Stennis by a 48-33 rollcall vote.

LABOR'S DETERMINATION to eliminate race bias in employment was stressed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in keynote speech to a national conference called by the Labor Advisory Council to the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity. Seated, at left, are: AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler; Hobart Taylor, Jr., executive vice chairman of the President's Committee; Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, and John H. Lyons, chairman of the advisory council and president of the Iron Workers.

Unions Urged to Follow Through On Pledges to Combat Job Bias

of ending discrimination and signing a pledge," Lyons said. "We've got to get the job done."

At five workshop sessions, delegates tackled in frank discussions problems of using grievance procedures to eliminate race discrimination, methods of encouraging Negroes and other minority groups to bid freely for job openings in higher classifications, and expanded information to all groups as to apprenticeship standards and opportunities.

Before the delegates was a message from Pres. Johnson hailing labor's "commitment" to equal opportunity and charging the delegates "to work out ways . . . to give tangible evidence to the disadvantaged of our nation of the opportunities opening to them."

Hobart Taylor, Jr., executive vice chairman of the President's equal employment committee, reminded the delegates that employers have historically played one group of workers against another.

"We are here today because we are determined that those days will not come again," he declared. "We are not talking about measures that will take away protection from union members . . . What we are talking about is the fact that no facet of our economy should be operated in a manner which places artificial restrictions on a man's potential use of his abilities."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, chairman of the federation's Civil Rights Committee, said the trade union movement should be the "spearhead" of community efforts to eliminate discriminatory practices. He cited the participation of top officers of 52 international unions on labor committees dealing with civil rights issues, describing it as a record "unmatched by any other group."

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman called on the delegates to focus their discussions on "how we can add to what we're already doing."

In a concluding speech to the conference, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said he has "no sympathy" for preferential hiring practices or quotas for Negroes and other minority groups. He stressed, however, that equal hiring opportunity demands equal training and where this training has been denied. Negroes should be given special education and training opportunities to catch up.

"There is a much more direct correlation between unemployment and lack of education than there is between unemployment and race discrimination," Wirtz asserted.

Meany said that it is up to the trade union movement "to see to it that apprenticeship rolls are open, that all applicants get the same opportunity . . . irrespective of the color of their skin."

In carrying out labor's pledge to Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, "we will do everything possible in our power to eliminate discrimination," Meany declared.

"This has got to be done by us," he stressed. "If the employer does not want to do his part, it is up to us to use our economic pressure to see that he does."

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Civil Rights Cloture

The Senate on June 10 voted 71-29 for cloture—the limitation of debate—on the civil rights bill. The AFL-CIO strongly supported the cloture move. Following is the rollcall:

FOR CLOTURE

DEMOCRATS 44

Foreign Unionists Study in Canada

Ottawa, Ont.—Nineteen trade unionists from English-speaking British Commonwealth countries or nations to which Canada is giving aid have started a 15-week study of the labor movement and industrial relations under the federal government's external assistance program.

The program includes a week of orientation in Ottawa, attendance at the Labor College in Montreal jointly sponsored by the Canadian Labor Congress, the University of Montreal and McGill University, and observance of union activities and industrial relations in different parts of Canada.

Countries represented are Gambia, Trinidad, Barbados, Swaziland, Kenya, Malaysia, Antiqua, Ceylon, and Southern and Northern Rhodesia. The government plans to bring a French-speaking group to Canada next year.

Court Extends One Man-One Vote Rule

Rights Bill Passage Certain As Leaders Win All Tests

High Court Sets Goal Of Equality

The Supreme Court ruled in a landmark decision that both houses of state legislatures must be elected from districts "substantially equal" in population.

The court rejected the argument from six states that one house might be districted so as to base representation on geographical areas rather than on population. Citing the "equal protection of the laws" clause of the 14th Amendment, Chief Justice Earl Warren wrote for the court's majority:

"Legislatures represent people, not trees or acres. Legislators are elected by voters, not farms or cities or economic interests."

The effect of the court's 6-to-3 decision was to ensure that in the future state legislatures will have a substantial increase in members from city and suburban areas while there will be a relative decrease in membership from small towns and sparsely populated rural areas.

The AFL-CIO in its November 1963 convention in New York praised the high court for its 1962 ruling that federal courts had power to outlaw state legislative districts that discriminated against the seven out of 10 Americans now living in metropolitan areas. The convention called for application of the principle of "one man, one vote" in apportionment of both state legislatures and the U.S. House of Representatives.

Warren, in spelling out the

Substitute Cleared for Senate Vote

By David L. Perlman

The Senate rolled toward passage of the civil rights bill, crushing by heavy bipartisan majorities all attempts to gut the legislation through amendments.

By 76-18 vote, the Senate leadership's bill, embodying changes acceptable to civil rights supporters, was substituted for the House-passed measure. This shut the door on further changes and assured the bill's passage by a big margin.

With each senator limited by the cloture rule to one hour of talk, a final vote on the bill was near as the AFL-CIO News went to press. It then goes back to the House, where its supporters will seek acceptance of the Senate amendments. The measure was likely to be tied up in the House Rules Committee a week or more, but approval of the Senate bill would send it directly to the President's desk, avoiding a return trip to the Senate and a possible renewed filibuster.

Time-consuming rollcalls on more than 100 amendments and frequent quorum calls kept the Senate in late night sessions as the Humphrey-Dirksen bill neared passage. Attempts to make major changes were largely perfunctory. Saving their time for a final round

Last-Minute Plunge:

Scranton in Drive To Halt Goldwater

By Willard Shelton

In a last-minute plunge, Gov. William W. Scranton of Pennsylvania announced as a candidate for President and began a series of desperation drives to cut down the delegate strength of Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona, who already appeared to have gathered more than the 655 Republican National Convention votes neded for nomination.

Declaring himself a candidate at a Maryland state Republican assembly just 31 days before the GOP nominating convention opens in San Francisco, Scranton in a pointed blast at Goldwater said the GOP had "no right to sell out to the modern expediencies of the easy answer, the fast draw, the quick solution."

Acknowledging that he shared responsibility with other moderates who had waited "dangerously long" to assert the "century-old progressive history" of the GOP, Scranton nevertheless declared that the party's delegates must go to San Francisco "to hold a convention, not a coronation" or "a wake."

The convention, he said in another thrust at the Arizona senator, could not possibly "embrace a

Meany Asks Action to Curb duPont Estate

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged Congress to end its "favored treatment" of the Alfred I. duPont estate—a vast Florida-based banking and industrial empire — and bring it under the Bank Holding Company Act. Its industrial holdings include the struck Florida East Coast Railway.

The estate, which controls a chain of 31 Florida banks, has a special exemption from a 1956 law prohibiting bank holding companies from owning non-banking enterprises. Edward Ball, administrator of the estate, serves as board chairman of the FEC line, which has operated with strikebreakers since early 1963.

Meany's call for passage of legislation to bring the duPont estate under the Bank Holding Company Act was made in a statement to the House Banking & Currency Committee. Companion bills have been introduced by Committee Chairman Wright Patman (D-Tex.) in the House and by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) in the Senate.

"The law should not play favorites," the AFL-CIO president de-

Job Market Braces for Youth Surge

The strong job gains registered so far in 1964 will be put to the test when some 3 million young people begin pouring into the labor force, as schools close, the Labor Dept. has warned.

The note of caution was included in the detailed job report for May, which said non-farm payroll employment jumped by 500,000 to 58.4 million in May.

The largest increases were recorded in construction, services, trade and manufacturing.

In its earlier summary job report, the Labor Dept. reported the key seasonally adjusted jobless rate had dropped to 5.1 percent in May from April's 5.4 percent. This is the lowest rate in four years, but

CWA Ups Per Capita, Eyes 1 Million Members

By Eugene A. Kelly

Cleveland, O.—An organizing goal of 1 million members was proposed to the Communications Workers by Pres. Joseph A. Beirne in a report summoning the union's 26th annual convention to enlist in the "war on poverty," help mend the ravages of automation and take an active role in the AFL-CIO's 1964 register-and-vote campaign.

The 1,190 delegates, in their first rollcall, voted by a 2-1 margin to raise the per capita dues paid by the locals to the international from $2 to $2.50 a month. The first such increase in five years, it will finance a stepped-up organizing campaign and increased union operating expenses.

Pres. Johnson, given a tumultuous welcome by 7,500 CWA members and visitors in Cleveland Public Hall, announced that in cooperation with labor and business he will take further positive steps toward establishment of a national manpower policy—a policy, he said, which will "assess APPRENTICESHIP INFORMATION centers, an innovation a year ago, have proved their worth in channeling young workers into lifetime careers, Undersec. of Labor John F. Henning (right) told a meeting of the National Advisory Committee on Equal Opportunity in Apprenticeship & Training in Chicago. Those attending included (from left) Joseph Corcoran, training director for the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters; Alex Bauer, assistant to the president of the Machinists, and Alan Burch, assistant research and education director of the Operating Engineers.

Henning Praises Work Of Apprentice Centers

Chicago—Apprenticeship information centers after a year of trial have "all the earmarks of a new and better way to match people and desires to jobs and careers," Undersec. of Labor John F. Henning told the first meeting of the National Advisory Committee on Equal Opportunity in Apprenticeship & Training held outside Washington.

The committee as part of its one-day program here inspected the Chicago Apprenticeship Information Center, one of seven set up in major cities since the program was pioneered in Washington last year.

"From the experience we have gained," Henning told the meeting, "I am convinced that these information centers will be most effective in expanding employment opportunities for everyone, regardless of race or creed. . . . By this time next year we hope to have 15 apprenticeship information centers located in our heaviest areas of industry and population." The latest such center was recently opened in Cincinnati.

The committee had morning round table discussions on information centers and on apprenticeship entry rules. Participants included Joseph Corcoran, who described the training program for apprentices and journeymen he directs for the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters; Alex Bauer, assistant to the president of the Machinists; and Alan Burch, assistant director of research and education for the Operating Engineers.

During its tour of the local apprenticeship information center—which Henning said would be impossible without "the sincere cooperation of organized labor and top management and community leaders"—the advisory group met with Chairman Oran Brown and Vice Chairman Thomas J. Nayder of the Chicago advisory committee. Brown is executive vice president of Rand-McNally's industrial relations division and Nayder is secretary-treasurer of the Chicago Building & Construction Trades Council.

Young Negroes Jobless

After Henning had told the opening session that federal rules prohibiting discrimination in apprenticeship and training programs will be strictly enforced, State Employment Security Administrator Samuel C. Bernstein said two of every four Negroes and young people in other minority groups cannot find work because of lack of training. Among 18- and 19-year-old white youths, he said, one of every four is unable to find a job because he is untrained.

Top Officers Re-elected by Typographers

Colorado Springs, Col. — Pres. Elmer Brown and four other top officers of the Typographical Union won re-election to new two-year terms in a unionwide membership referendum.

Brown will start his fourth consecutive term as ITU head on July 15. Leader of the union's Progressive Party, he defeated Fred R. Hunt, Jr., of Chicago, member of the Independent Party.

Other winners were Sec.-Treas. William R. Cloud over John J. Conley; 1st Vice Pres. John J. Pilch over Jesse Manbeck; 2d Vice Pres. A. Sandy Bevis over Nicholas Williams; 3d Vice Pres. Joe Bailey over John Hancock. All the winners were members of the same party ticket.

The final official vote count was: Brown 40,945, Hunt 38,094; Cloud 44,380, Conley 33,905; Pilch 41,999, Manbeck 36,463; Bevis 41,383, Williams 36,287; Bailey 41,860, Hancock 36,118.

Safety Week Call Issued by Johnson

Pres. Johnson called on all American workers to work safely and to safeguard their fellow-workers in a proclamation naming the week of June 21 Job Safety Week.

The week was selected because the ninth biennial President's Conference on Occupational Safety meets in Washington June 23-25, with the President addressing the expected 3,500 delegates. Several hundred unionists have been invited to attend.

The AFL-CIO Committee on Safety & Occupational Health is sponsoring an all-day safety conference to be held June 22 in Washington's Mayflower Hotel.

'Ladies Day' Picket Line Draws Wives

Thibodaux, La.—Every Thursday is "Ladies Day" on the Packinghouse Workers picket line at the Thomson Machinery Co. here.

That's the day that the wives of the 100 UPWA members who have been on strike for more than four months demonstrate their solidarity by marching under parasols printed with a union message.

Their target is a company owned by an Ohio lawyer, Edward Lamb, who made his early reputation as an attorney for unions and liberal causes. The Thomson firm, one of 26 Lamb now controls, is the largest producer of equipment for cultivating and harvesting sugar cane.

The UPWA won bargaining rights last October and is striking for a first contract. Wage rates in the plant, the union said, average $1.60 an hour and range as low as $1.25.

Canadian Labor College Opens Second Session

Ottawa, Ont.—Canada's cooperative Labor College has opened for its second seson with more than 100 students expected to enroll—including a number from Africa, Asia and the West Indies.

Classes in economics, history, sociology, political science and the theory and practice of trade unionism are given in English and French.

Toronto, Ont.—Gower Markle, Canadian education and research director for the Steelworkers, has been elected president of the Ontario Welfare Council, the first union man to hold the post.

'Hot Cargo' Case:

Union Right to Sue Wins in Court Test

New Orleans, La.—A "hot cargo" union contract clause, valid under the construction industry proviso of the Taft-Hartley Act, can be enforced in the courts regardless of the act's blanket ban on "coercion" to force an employer to refrain from doing business with any other person, the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled.

The decision upset a judgment of a U.S. District Court in Alabama that court action constitutes coercion which is barred by the act. The appellate court remanded the case for proceedings in line with its reversal of the lower tribunal.

The dispute involved Sheet Metal Workers Local 48 and the Hardy Corp., a construction industry firm under contract to the union. The agreement required the company not to subcontract any work performed at the jobsite to any other contractor who failed to live up to provisions of the union contract, including hiring, wages, union security and other matters. The company subcontracted certain work to the Backus Engineering Co. without requiring it to comply with the contract.

Local 48 took up the matter as a grievance. The circuit court noted that there was disagreement as to whether a binding decision resulted, but shortly afterwards the union sued for damages, charging breach of contract.

One section of Taft-Hartley makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to threaten, coerce or restrain an employer when the purpose is to force or require him to cease doing business with another person or firm. Another section outlaws as an unfair labor practice a "hot cargo" clause in which the employer agrees to cease from using, selling or transporting the products of any other employer, or to stop doing business with another—but specifically exempts agreements in the construction industry relating to subcontracting to be done at the jobsite.

'Coercion' Defined

The case hinged, Circuit Court Judge Griffin B. Bell noted, on "whether judicial enforcement amounts to coercion as that term is used" in the act. The clause in the Sheet Metal Workers contract was valid, he observed, although it could not be enforced by threats, coercion or restraint. Although the District Court held that judicial enforcement was tantamount to coercion, the appeals court was inclined to take the opposite view, he said.

"This will avoid the anomalous situation of an agreement, left valid under one section of the act but unenforceable by threat, coercion or restraint under another section, being rendered of little or no value by an interpretation of 'coercion' to embrace the use of the courts," he said.

"These sections were enacted concurrently and we think clear language would be necessary to convey a congressional intent that a party to an otherwise valid labor agreement may not turn to the courts for relief upon its breach."

Bell wrote that the legislative history of the 1959 amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act support the Circuit Court's view that Congress intended "coerce" to mean "no more than non-judicial acts of a compelling or restraining nature, applied by way of concerted self-help consisting of a strike, picketing or other economic retaliation or pressure in a background of a labor dispute."

Court Orders End Strikes By Trainmen

A series of strikes called by the Railroad Trainmen over local disputes halted service on six southwest and midwestern railroads for a day before court orders sent 7,000 BRT members back to work.

A union spokesman said the strikes were called by the membership on each railroad because of "a long list of abuses" by management, including infringements on seniority, unilateral changes in working conditions, cancelled vacations and other grievances.

The railroads struck were the Missouri Pacific, Texas & Pacific, Southern Pacific's Texas and Louisiana lines, the Missouri-Kansas-Texas, the Houston Port Terminal, and the Texas Mexican Railway.

The struck railroads quickly obtained temporary restraining orders from federal and state courts barring continuation of the strikes pending further hearings.

Pogy Boatmen Win First Contract At Gulf Coast Fish Processing Firm

Cameron, La.—The first union contracts negotiated on the Gulf Coast for pogy boatmen—crews of the boats that fish the Gulf of Mexico for menhaden—have been signed by the Meat Cutters Seafood Div. and the Gulf Menhaden Co.

The contracts provide a major gain for some of the men, mainly Negroes, who all their lives have gone to sea for menhaden—a fish producing oil for paints and plastics and, when ground with other ingredients, produces animal feed with a high protein content.

Union security and job security clauses were spelled out. A bonus of 2 cents per 1,000 fish, payable at the end of the fishing season, was guaranteed. Discarded was a past practice of the employer deducting 10 percent or more of each man's wages every pay day in order to pay extra crew members.

Chief union negotiator was H. L. Mitchell. The union has organized crews of 45 pogy boats on the East Coast and has won contract protection for about 600 fishermen. Also it represents 100 workers at one of the industry's 20 fish factories—the one at Amagansett, L. I. On the Gulf Coast, it so far has won 18 of 22 elections supervised by the National Labor Relations Board. One election was lost and the results of three are in dispute.

To date the union has won contracts for 350 fishermen out of the 1,200 men who work these waters in some 75 boats. A major problem is that most companies own fish mills and docks, but claim not to own the boats. Each boat is incorporated as a separate legal entity with a limited tax liability and the union must contract with these allegedly independent corporations.

For the first time, pogy boatmen under contract have a type of grievance procedure and the right to check the scales on which fish are weighed for accuracy. The agreements call for sanitary and safe conditions, guarantees of wholesome food and other precautions.

Negotiations are coming up with the Quinn Menhaden Co. at Duloc, La., for the crews of five boats and 25 more NLRB elections among 400 workers have been scheduled.

Results of elections to date were hailed by Howard Harity, president of the Port of Sabine Pass branch of Fishermen's Local 300 of the Meat Cutters. He said, "we're with the union 100 percent. It's the only way we have to get a fair shake."

Same Right as Employer:

Separate Bargaining Upheld For Unions

A union has the same right as management to withdraw at an appropriate time from bargaining with a group and instead to bargain individually with each employer in the group, a National Labor Relations Board aide has found.

Upholding Detroit Printing Pressmen's Local 13 in its right to bargain separately with the Detroit Free Press and the Detroit News, examiner Paul Bisgyer recommended that the newspapers be ordered to bargain collectively with the union in separate bargaining units and, if an understanding is reached, sign separate contracts.

The decision, said Bisgyer, "turns on the novel question whether a labor organization should be accorded the same right as that enjoyed by employers to withdraw at a proper time from an established multiemployer unit."

He concluded that it should, noting that the issue has not been settled by the NLRB or the courts and that the Supreme Court expressly reserved a decision on the point in its Buffalo Linen ruling permitting employers to defend themselves against union "whipsaw" strikes.

The issue will have to be decided by the NLRB itself, as Bisgyer's recommendation is the exact opposite of a ruling made a few weeks earlier by Examiner George J. Bott in a case involving the same newspapers and another Pressmen's local made up of paper-handlers.

Bott held that the handlers' local could not withdraw from the joint bargaining arrangement, although he conceded that employers have been allowed to do so under similar conditions.

The second case arose when Local 13, after 25 years of bargaining with the publishers jointly or with their Detroit Newspaper Publishers Association, notified the publishers last Dec. 27 that it wanted to negotiate contract changes and asked that negotiations be conducted "separately and individually" but not jointly. The association refused, and the union filed unfair labor practice charges last Feb. 25.

Bisgyer noted that, under past board decisions, employers have had to meet two conditions for withdrawing from group bargaining: one, the withdrawal must be timely; second, it must not be a "mere sham or pretense." In this case, he said, Local 13 met both conditions.

The examiner pointed out that the newspapers want to maintain group bargaining because this permits them the use of the lockout weapon but "there is certainly nothing fundamentally unlawful" in the union's attempt to strengthen its bargaining position and to regain the unhampered right to strike individual employers.

"It is not for the board to select that type of unit which will tend to balance the bargaining strength of the parties," he wrote, because Congress did not give it that right. He added that if the board wishes to reconsider its rules for withdrawing from group bargaining units, the new rules "will have to apply equally to employers and unions."

CORNERSTONE of addition to the Philip Murray Building, international headquarters of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, was laid at ceremonies in Washington. Wielding the trowel is Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson of the Newspaper Guild, which also has its headquarters in the building. Next to IUE Pres. James B. Carey (right) is Pres. Walter P. Trial Examiner Orders Backpay of $160,000

A New Orleans clothing manufacturer owes $160,849 in back pay to 166 workers for wages lost 10 years ago during a strike caused by the firm's unfair labor practices, a National Labor Relations Board aide has ruled.

The long delay in calculating back pay, after the NLRB found in 1956 that the J. H. Rutter-Rex Mfg. Co., Inc., had provoked a strike of Clothing Workers, was blamed by company management in part on the office of the NLRB general counsel from 1957 into 1960. Trial Examiner Owsley Vose rejected this change, declaring:

"In view of the company's widespread failure to fulfill its statutory obligations" to rehire returning strikers and lay off strikebreakers, it "comes with ill grace for the company to charge the general counsel with failure to cooperate in the investigation" of backpay amounts due.

Vose directed the firm, which makes shirts and pants, to pay sums ranging from $5 to $6,940 and averaging $969. Execution of the order could be delayed further by appeals to the board and the courts. It provides for the payment of 6 percent interest and may be supplemented by a further backpay directive for periods after June 30, 1961, not covered by the present order.

The employer complained that between Nov. 7, 1957, when it sent a letter to the board offering to cooperate, and Nov. 11, 1961, when the first backpay order was issued, it heard not a word from the general counsel's office except a request for employe records.

The examiner pointed out that the U.S. 2d Circuit Court of Appeals had previously ruled that "the mere fact of delay alone does not defeat backpay claims." Besides, he said, the problems management complained of were "largely of its own making" and "the company simply refused to dismiss replacements [strikebreakers] to make a place for the returning strikers."

The board ruled in its 1956 decision that, though the strike may have been economic in nature, it was unfair labor practice strike because of management's conduct. The 5th Circuit Court of Appeals enforced the board's decision Aug. 19, 1957, with an order that the strikers be reinstated with backpay. The first backpay finding was made four years later, and the latest one more than two years after that.

The strike ended officially on Apr. 6, 1955, when the company received a union letter with the names of 113 employes who offered to return to work. Later 40 more names were added by the union but management refused to act—wrongfully, the examiner ruled—without an individual application from each striker.

Unionists Complete Counseling Course

St. Louis—Sixty-nine union members who successfully completed a union counseling course received their certificates at a graduation dinner at which Assistant Dir. Robert Rosekrans of the AFL-CIO Community Service Activities was the principal speaker.

The course was sponsored by the St. Louis AFL-CIO and was conducted by its Community Services Committee. The certificates were presented to students who attended six of eight sessions held on weekday evenings.

Surge of Youth into Labor Market Seen Testing Non-Farm Job Gains

some 3.6 million still remained jobless.

The extremely high level of teenage unemployment, 15.9 percent in May, continued to darken the job picture. This was pointed up by the Labor Dept.'s review of the gains so far this year and the May-July labor force projections.

The January-May employment increases totaled 1.2 million, the department said, outrunning the civilian labor force growth of 900,000. As a result, the total unemployed declined by about a quarter-million.

"The strength of the recent expansion in job opportunities," the department then added, "will be put to the test next month (June) when large numbers of young people enter the labor market for the summer."

Adult Picture Better

The first five months of 1964 failed to show improvement for teenagers, the report said, while the job picture brightened for both adult males and females. The number of 14- to 19-year-olds in the labor force grew by 350,000 from January to May, it noted, but only two-thirds of them found jobs while the other third joined the ranks of the unemployed.

The report said some 3 million youngsters aged 14 to 24 are expected to be seeking jobs this summer, 800,000 of them on a permanent basis. This influx may well offset the job improvements shown so far for adult men, a Labor Dept. spokesman said.

In a separate report on its monthly survey of the nation's 150 major job centers, the Labor Dept. said the total with 6 percent or more jobless remained unchanged at 39 in May. Beaumont-Port Arthur, Tex., was taken off the list of areas with "substantial unemployment" and Muskegon-Muskegon Heights, Mich., was added.

The detailed employment report said the April-to-May gain of 500,000 was "slightly better than seasonal." At 58.4 million, the nonfarm payroll total stood about 1.4 million higher than in May 1963.

The May report showed over-the-month gains of 157,000 in construction; 81,000 in manufacturing, with steel picking up 10,800 jobs; 92,000 in retail trade and 106,000 in the service industries.

Workweek Lengthens

The factory workweek and overtime hours rose seasonally by 12 minutes to 40.7 and 3 hours, respectively, the report added. These were the highest levels for May in almost a decade, it noted.

State insured unemployment dropped by 300,000 to 1.5 million in mid-May, the report said, continuing the better-than-seasonal improvement of recent months.

Part-time employment for economic reasons held at 2.1 million in May, unchanged over the month and year.

The total labor force, at 77.5 million, was 1.6 million above May a year ago, the report said. The average over-the-year rise for the first five months of this year is running a little better than forecast by long-term trends, it added.

Subcontracting Dispute Ordered to Arbitration

The 2d U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has ordered the General Electric Co. to arbitrate a dispute on subcontracting with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Applying a Supreme Court precedent, the appeals court upheld, 2-1, a lower court finding that a dispute over GE's action in hiring an outside contractor to relocate certain company manufacturing facilities at Bridgeport, Conn., was a proper subject for arbitration.

GE had argued that subcontracting was not mentioned in the contract between the parties and that later discussion was foreclosed because the contract contained a "wrap-up" clause stating that certain named parts of the contract are "intended to be and shall be in full settlement of all ths issues" which had been discussed in negotiations.

Judges Sterry R. Waterman and Thurgood Marshall ruled for the majority that the Supreme Court had held that in the absence of any express agreement that a particular subject shall not be involved in grievance procedure or arbitration, only the most direct evidence of an intent to exclude the claim from arbitration shall prevail.

Earlier Opinion Cited

The majority said: "The court [itself] has framed the rule in the following terms under the standard labor arbitration clause: 'Every grievance is arbitrable unless the provisions of the collective bargaining agreement concerning grievances and arbitration contain some clear and unambiguous clause of exclusion, or there is some other term of agreement that indicates beyond a peradventure of doubt that a grievance concerning a particular matter is not intended to be covered by the grievance and arbitration procedure set forth in the agreement.'"

The judges rejected company arguments that there was nothing in the agreement forbidding or restricting subcontracting; that a National Labor Relations Board order in another phase of the dispute ruled out arbitration; and that strike after the firm refused to arbitrate had shut out the union from thereafter turning to the arbitration processes.

In a dissent, Chief Judge J. Edward Lumbard held that there was no agreement to arbitrate any dispute arising out of subcontracting for a plant expansion. Further, the contractor rejected a GE suggestion the GE employes might do some of the work and the contractor's employes would not work alongside IUE members, he said.

Kenin Sees Music Threatened By Decline in Job Opportunities

Portland, Ore.—The nation "faces another kind of 'silent spring' in which the sound of music will be stilled" unless more opportunities can be provided for young Americans to make a living as musicians.

This warning was sounded by Musicians Pres. Herman Kenin at the union's 67th annual convention here this week.

For Kenin, re-elected without opposition to a seventh term, the convention was the vehicle for a triumphal return to his hometown. Prior to ascending to the leadership of the 275,000-member union, he was for 20 years the president of Portland Local 99.

His annual report stressed the substantial wage and hour gains made for musicians in the fields of phonograph recording, network radio and television broadcasting and theatrical and motion picture production. He emphasized the importance of federal legislation to provide governmental recognition and financial support for the performing arts.

Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N. J.), sponsor of cultural development legislation, was cheered when in describing the unemployment plight of musicians, he expressed hope that the present Congress would adopt aiding legislation.

A similar chord was struck by Daniel P. Moynihan, assistant secretary of labor, who said that of more than 2 million jobs created in the last year, few have fallen to musicians. Moynihan recalled the late Pres. Kennedy's efforts for cultural advancement and read a warm letter of greeting to Kenin and the AFM from Pres. Johnson. The President's letter said the promotion of music and the arts "is a goal to which this Administration is committed."

Message from Johnson

"This Administration is aware that, as part of our economic society, you were among the first mass victims of automation, and the long periods of unemployment your members have known point up the need for wider job opportunities," the President's message said. "Today our prospering and expanding economy provides the opportunity for greater enjoyment of culture through the performing arts."

The nearly 1,000 delegates representing approximately 700 locals in the U.S. and Canada, re-elected their three top officers without opposition—Kenin, Sec. Stanley L. Ballard and Treas. George V. Clancy.

Ballard reported a drop in membership of some 7,500 in the past year, but despite this the union operated in the black.

Clancy said the federation has $9.2 million in its comparatively new pension fund.

Kenin recalled to the delegates that a group of dissident orchestra leaders centered in New York had succeeded in court actions in knocking down a per capita dues increase passed at the 1963 convention and the union's tax on traveling musicians. This deprived the federation of its basic source of revenue, according to AFM officials.

Per Capita Hike Urged

Kenin urged the delegates to show solidarity by supporting a proposed increase in the per capita tax and initiation fees when those resolutions come before the convention.

Thompson has introduced a bill in Congress to relieve casual music performances from onerous regulation by federal law, as now interpreted by the courts, as a step toward ending some of the internal union discord.

Stressing the importance of legislative activity by unions, Kenin reported that the federation is continuing its efforts toward elimination of the cabaret tax and the easement of Internal Revenue Service regulations covering business entertainment deductions.

The need for union solidarity and the importance of political awareness by unionists was seconded by Richard Walsh, president of the Theatrical Stage Employes.

'Discotheques' Discussed

On the controversial subject of "discotheque," which makes use of combinations of recorded and live music, Kenin reminded delegates that the union has no power under the law to halt the use of records.

Some locals, he said, have found it advantageous to join forces with "discotheque" fans, thereby achieving the use of live supplemental music in establishments where musicians have not previously been employed. Essentially, he said, it is a matter for local ground rules.

Kenin's return to Portland was celebrated with a community dinner in his honor on the eve of the convention's opening. More than 600 persons attended to pay tribute to the lawyer-musician-labor leader.

Petrillo Cheered on Visit To Musicians' Convention

Portland, Ore.—James Caesar Petrillo, one of the "old curmudgeons" of the American labor movement, received a standing ovation when he made his first appearance in six years before an annual convention of the Musicians, which he headed for many years.

The 76-year-old elder statesman of the AFM had not attended a convention since 1958 when he left the presidency and was succeeded by Herman Kenin.

Reminding the cheering delegates that he had recommended Kenin, Petrillo said: "I told you he was honest and fair. Thank God, I have been right."

Earlier, at a community dinner in Kenin's honor, Petrillo said: "I stuck my neck out when I asked the 1958 convention to support Kenin, but I am proud to say that he has never let me down. He has taken his place on the AFL-CIO Executive Council with the great labor leaders of the country."

In praising Petrillo's historic contributions to the AFM, Kenin recalled that it was by his predecessor's efforts that the Music Performance Trust Funds were set up. These have provided $50 million worth of free music for worthy public causes since 1950. The free public project is financed through small royalties on the sale of recordings and television film.

Organizing Aid Seen:

Rail Telegraphers Vote Name Change

Miami Beach—The 78-year-old Order of Railroad Telegraphers will become the Transportation & Communication Employes Union next Jan. 1. The new name, ORT Pres. G. E. Leighty told convention delegates, reflects the changed skills of the craft and is designed to assist the union in an expanded organizing campaign.

The constitutional change of name carried by the required two-thirds majority with votes to spare after a debate in which both supporters and opponents expressed regret at the passing of the era of the old-time telegrapher who punched out messages in Morse code.

Leighty was re-elected by acclamation to a new four-year term as president. Lemuel H. Freeman of Montreal was elected secretary-treasurer, succeeding E. M. Mosier, who is retiring July 1 after 22 years in office. Freeman, a general chairman on the Canadian National Railways, won on the fifth ballot under a procedure which eliminated the low man after each ballot until a candidate achieved a majority.

In other constitutional changes, the convention:

- Authorized committees on each railroad to negotiate agreements under which seniority would terminate at age 65—in effect establishing a mandatory retirement policy. Before entering into such negotiations, however, the committee would be required to secure referendum approval from the membership on the railroad involved and permission from the ORT president. The plan would apply only in the United States since Canadian railroads already have a 65-year age limit.
- Directed that future quadrennial conventions of the union be held in the headquarters city of St. Louis to reduce expenses, except that one out of four conventions will be held in Canada.

Delegates contributed some $4,000 to a fund to relieve hardship among strikers on the Florida East Coast Railway and many took turns on FEC picket lines in the Miami area.

In a report to the convention, Leighty said the railroad industry could increase both business and jobs "by adopting progessive and aggressive methods and developing some initiative." Instead, he charged, "most railroads are still engaged in reducing their services and depriving the public of the transportation they need."

Among the speakers were presidents of two railroad unions—Harold C. Crotty of the Maintenance of Way Employes and C. L. Dennis of the Railway Clerks—and Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept. Delegates also heard Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.).

Fox praised Leighty's leadership as chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association and chief negotiator for the non-operating unions. Urging continued teamwork by rail unions, he stressed that "when you work together and stay together, you get things done."

Top Conductors Listed By Congress of Strings

New York—Four noted conductors will instruct 100 talented young string instrumentalists selected through community auditions to participate in the sixth annual Congress of Strings summer school sponsored by the Musicians.

The school will be held June 21-Aug. 15 at Michigan State University, East Lansing, AFM Pres. Herman D. Kenin said. The union pays all expenses of the winners, who come from all parts of the U.S. and Canada.

Conductors Listed

The conductors, who also will lead their students in a series of public concerts, are Mishel Piastro, conductor of the Longines Symphonette, who will occupy the podium during the first week; Alfred Wallenstein former conductor of the Los Angeles Symphony, who will conduct for three weeks; Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Boston University Symphony, and Victor Alessandro, conductor of the San Antonio, Tex., Symphony, who will work with the student orchestra for two weeks each.

"Through this method of extended orchestral instruction and public concert experience," said AFM Sec. Stanley Ballard, String Congress project director, "the students will enjoy a wide and varying musical experience, in addition to individual and class instruction in their respective instruments by a faculty of first-chair musicians from principal American symphony orchestras."

Kenin recalled that over the past five years about 500 young musicians have benefited under the Congress of Strings programs of instruction by experts and the experience of playing under their direction.

"They have experienced the rare privilege of playing in a full concert orchestra in nationwide television programs under the batons of such masters as Eugene Ormandy, Eric Leinsdorf and Josef Krips," he said.

"Most important, many of them today are playing members of such proficient symphonic organizations as the Boston Symphony, the San Francisco, Houston and Minneapolis orchestras, to name a few. These achievements are ample reward for the time, effort and money expended in helping to insure the cultural future of American music."

Dr. Paul M. Oberg, chairman of music and music education at the University of Minnesota, again is dean of the summer school.

Johnson Names Mediation Advisers

Pres. Johnson has named two new members of the national labor-management panel for the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and has reappointed two others for two new terms.

Newly appointed are Jack T. Conway, executive director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., and H. S. Hank Brown, Texas AFL-CIO president. Brown succeeds the late Jesse C. McGlon, vice president of the Machinists. Conway replaces Auto Workers Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock, who resigned because of the press of union business.

New three-year terms were given to Pres. John H. Lyons, Jr., of the Iron Workers, and Marvin J. Miller, assistant to Pres. David J. McDonald of the Steelworkers. The board has 12 members.

Venezuelan Heads Conference:

Safety Standards Top ILO's Agenda

Geneva—Andres Aguilar of Venezuela, unanimously elected president of the Intl. Labor Organization's annual conference here, told the ILO delegates they could best pay tribute to the late world leaders, Pres. Kennedy and Prime Minister Nehru of India, by seeking "to come a step nearer to the ideals for which they fought."

A member of Venezuela's permanent delegation to the ILO, Aguilar was chosen to head the 48th session of the conference without opposition after African and Asian delegates withdrew the nomination of Hashim Raza, Pakistan government official. U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl seconded the nomination of the Venezuelan.

More than 1,100 government, worker and employer delegates are attending the three-week session of the United Nations specialized agency.

On the U.S. worker team, besides Faupl, are AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany; AFL-CIO Vice Pres. George M. Harrison; Assistant Pres. John McCartin of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters; Pres. Ralph Reiser of the Glass & Ceramic Workers; Directing Business Rep. James McDonald of Machinists Dist. 8; Pres. Miles C. Stanley of the West Virginia AFL-CIO; Edward J. Hickey, Jr., attorney for the Railway Clerks; Bert Seidman, AFL-CIO European economic representative; Mrs. Maida Springer of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs.

New regulations for the protection of workers the world over are on the agenda for the conference. Final action is to be taken on rules covering benefits for on-the-job accidents and diseases and on the hygiene to be observed in shops and offices.

A first draft of new standards to protect young workers employed in mines of all types will also be prepared by the parley. The projected measures will update and extend to all forms of underground mining the action already taken by the ILO on behalf of young coal mine workers.

The delegates are also scheduled to take a fresh look at the special problems women workers face in a rapidly changing world. An ILO report found that the movement from farm into non-agricultural jobs was the most significant development of the last 50 years in the field of women's employment.

South Africa's recent decision to withdraw from the ILO took most of the significance out of constitutional amendments before the conference for action.

Constitution to Be Amended

One amendment would permit the suspension or expulsion of any member state against which similar action had been taken by the United Nations.

A second would permit the barring from ILO conferences of any member state found by the UN to be "flagrantly and persistently pursuing by its legislation a declared policy of racial discrimination such as apartheid."

African delegations at last year's conference conducted a campaign to drive out South Africa. At present no constitutional provision permits the ousting of a member state.

STUDENTS AND FACULTY of the American Institute for Free Labor Development visited Tamiment as guests of the non-profit educational camp adjoining the Ladies' Garmen Workers' Unity House in Pennsylvania's Pocono Mountains. They were addressed during a dinner by Ben Josephson (speaking), camp director. Also at the head table, left to right, are Sam Haddad, AIFLD program director; Mrs. Josephson; Serafino Romualdi, AIFLD executive director; Mrs. Romualdi, and Dr. Siegfried Ciccoti of Italy, AIFLD lecturer.

Beirne Urges Million-Member Goal As CWA Delegates Hike Per Capita

our future need" and help aim all private and government programs of training and education toward meeting the nation's needs.

This is the way to "great society based on prosperity and compassion," he declared, repeating a theme he has emphasized in recent speeches.

Job Loss Cited

Johnson recalled that he proposed legislation to set up a special commission on automation and noted that more than 2 million jobs a year are being taken over by machines. In the next decade alone, he said, "26 million young people will seek their first jobs and 10 million will not even have a high school diploma."

"But this is not a job for government alone," he continued. "Industry has a demand for skills and a duty toward men and women that are displaced. Labor needs training for its members. America needs full employment to sustain prosperity and has an obligation to give every citizen a chance to work."

Declaring that future job seekers will enter a market "almost closed to the man without a skill," the President, in a speech interrupted two dozen times by applause, asserted "the challenge to our leadership is clear: We must continue to expand our economy, creating new jobs. We must provide our workers with education and training to meet the needs of a new dynamic industry."

The convention shouted "Yes" when Johnson asked if his program for jobs and training and hospital care for the aged under social security was "your program too."

"If this is so," he concluded, "lets roll up our sleeves and get to work to pass these programs before this Congress adjourns" because "poverty and injustice and disease will not wait."

Johnson Praises Beirne

The delegates cheered loudly when Johnson praised Beirne for his leadership. The CWA leader presented the President with an honorary life membership in the union and two pastel "princess" telephones for his daughters.

The hike in per capita had been called for by a rank-and-file finance committee, Beirne and other officers and executive board members. The final tally was 172,687 votes in favor, 100,533 opposed and 3,559 votes not cast.

The motion set Jan. 1, 1965, as the effective date of the increase and provided also for intensified organizing efforts by every member and a more vigorous campaign to educate telephone workers to the importance of the union's COPE program and the need for adequate COPE financing.

Beirne and Sec-Treas. W. A. Smallwood both underscored the need for increased operating income in the face of mounting costs, two raids by the unaffiliated Teamsters within recent months and a long strike at General Telephone Co. of California. The union won all three contests but exceeded its income in so doing, Smallwood said.

In his keynote speech, Beirne said automation has cost 80,000 jobs in the past five years in the Bell Telephone System alone "and no one seems to know what the total effect of these new devices will be on our nation."

He referred to a report by a study group that "the day may be coming sooner than we expect when automation will have so many people permanently unemployed that our society will have to consider paying full salaries to families even though nobody in the family is able to find work at a paying job."

Asking "what do we do if there is no fair day's work available?" he added: "Is it worse to pay a salary to a family so they can live decently than not to pay them at all so they will starve and get sick and commit crimes and become a burden on the community?"

The CWA head said proper planning can transform the threat of insecurity and mass unemployment into great benefits for the nation and its citizens. He called for the creation by Congress of the automation commission proposed by Johnson.

On organizing, Beirne assured the delegates that "to do our job right, we've got to grow. Our employers are growth companies in a growth industry." CWA, he said, represents 60 percent of Bell workers.

"We can't stop organizing," he added. "If every local organizes, we'll grow. Frankly, I believe CWA should grow to a million members. We either move forward and grow, or we lag behind and die."

President Endorsed

Beirne expressed thanks that the nation has in Pres. Johnson a man equipped to "carry on the great work started by John F. Kennedy" and declared that in his first six months Johnson has "demonstrated a wondrous vitality and deep concern for the welfare of all."

The convention subsequently voted overwhelmingly to endorse Johnson in the November election.

Earlier Beirne had declared "we in CWA do not want for President a man determined to repeal the progress of the 20th century in favor of the powdered wigs, silk knee breeches and the industrial feudalism of the 18th century." Workers, farmers, small businessmen, professional persons and pensioners "have nothing to gain from Sen. (Barry) Goldwater," he said.

He reminded the delegates that "if we fail to organize, if we fail to register, if we fail to vote in this critical presidential election our sentiments won't mean a thing." The many functions of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education must be carried out effectively to assure success in legislation and national defense, he said.

"This is one way we can help Congress to pass the bills America needs," he declared.

Community Drive Urged To End Bias in Housing

New York—Community resources and skills must be pooled if present discrimination in housing is to end, Boris Shishkin, secretary of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee, told the Averell Harriman Equal Housing Opportunity Award luncheon here.

Four veterans of the fight for open housing occupancy were presented with plaques honoring their services in the years 1959 through 1962. The awards were made by Modern Community Developers, Inc., non-profit organization which seeks to promote equal housing opportunity for all people.

Shishkin declared that nothing in the pending civil rights bill advances civil rights "in this most vital sector" of housing equality, and called for a "crusade to stamp out discrimination in housing from American community life."

Recipients of the awards were:

For 1959, Max Weinrib, Chicago builder and executive vice president of Progress Development Corp., MCD's Chicago branch, who organized the Deerfield, Ill., open housing project and led a four-year court battle to prevent its site from being condemned for parks.

Surgeon Honored

For 1960, Dr. Arthur G. Falls, Chicago surgeon and board chairman of the Progress Development Corp., who at the same time was a leader in the Deerfield project and a pioneer in a campaign to end racial bars in Chicago hospitals.

For 1961, Eliot D. Pratt, New Milford, Conn., editor of Current, monthly magazine on frontier problems and founding chairman of the National Committee on Tithing in Investment, for starting MCD and its Chicago subsidiary on a program of acquiring apartment houses.

For 1962, Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., Washington, civil rights attorney who served as volunteer chief counsel in the Deerfield case. Rauh's award was accepted on his behalf by Mrs. Rauh.

FATHER'S DAY HONORS as the Worker Father of the Year were won by Wallace R. Martin, a member of the Glass Bottle Blowers at the Owens-Corning Fiberglas plant in Anderson, N. C. Helping him relax are his wife, Laura, and 16-year-old son, Brent, as well as the family dog, Jo-Jo. An assistant scoutmaster and a Sunday school teacher, Martin was chosen for his participation in civic and community affairs as well as for his union activity.

The States Get the Word

THE SUPREME COURT in its decisions on state and congressional reapportionment has been placed in the same quandary that it has endured for 10 years about civil rights issues: it has been compelled by congressional and state legislative inaction to bear almost alone the full burden of protecting the constitutional rights of large groups of citizens.

The court has gone all the way in its decision in the six state cases on which it ruled that legislative apportionments presented in a variety of guises somehow could be made to mesh with the constitutional guarantee to every citizen of "equal protection under the laws." The court majority said bluntly that all of them failed—including the recent Colorado reapportionment drafted by the state legislature and sent to a referendum by the voters, who approved it.

Chief Justice Warren said caustically for the court majority that the referendum vote had "no significance," legally. The issue involved, he pointed out, is the right of each citizen to have his vote counted with equal weight as that given the votes of other citizens, and "a citizen's constitutional rights can hardly be infringed simply because a majority of the people choose to do so."

The high court served warning early in 1962 that the federal courts were going to examine state legislative apportionments with an eye to determining their constitutionality. The legislatures went into a ferment of activity, but in few of them were there any genuine efforts to revise the districting so as to come honorably in line with the "equal protection" clause of the 14th Amendment.

Instead, there was a tendency to turn to gimmickry. One house would be based on population perhaps, but the power blocs that had long controlled the state assemblies could not bear to yield utterly, so the districting for the other house was cunningly designed to look like reform that might pass muster with the Supreme Court.

THE HIGH COURT in its new decisions met this challenge squarely. If a state chooses to have a bicameral legislature, it must apportion both houses so that the districts for each contain as nearly as possible the same number of people. To rule otherwise, said the court, would permit a minority of voters to control one house and produce "stalemate or frustration" of the majority of the state's voters.

The court said it was not demanding "mathematical exactness" in applying the rule of one man, one vote. It acknowledged that identical districting would be a "practical impossibility." Chief Justice Warren wrote that somewhat more "flexibility" might be allowable in state apportionments than in congressional districting.

But a state "must make an honest and good faith effort to construct districts, in both houses of its legislature, as nearly of equal population as practicable," the court ruled.

It is the history of civil rights all over again: only now, 10 years after the historic school desegregation decision, is Congress moving to declare its support of the principle in federal law. The states flubbed their chance in legislative reapportionment.

A modicum of good faith in meeting the plain implications of earlier decisions would have spared all the pain and trouble that the court has now felt compelled to upset, and the conniving obduracy inside the state legislatures is no credit to anyone involved.

'I Want to Help':

Woman's Letter on Civil Rights States the Case with Eloquence

Sen. Mike Mansfield, the Senate Democratic leader, closed the debate leading up to the vote of cloture on the civil rights filibuster by reading a letter from one of his constituents. Excerpts from the letter follow:

DEAR SEN. MANSFIELD: I am a lifelong resident of Montana, I am 29 years old, and the mother of four children. I am white. In general, I have considered myself a good citizen of my country. I have voted in every election since my 21st year, I have tried to learn the issues and policies of each candidate, of each party. But through it all, I realize I have been a listener, a receiver, an appreciator, a bystander.

How can we, as responsible Americans, continue talking, arguing, bickering over civil rights as though the privileges, responsibilities, and birthrights of a great percentage of our people were favors or rewards to be handed out by a few? . . .

I was conceived by a pair of good, respectable, hard-working white parents. I was allowed to grow and mature, to have faith in myself and my future, and when I married and gave birth to my lovely children, to have faith in them and their future.

I know that my children may go to the school nearest our home. I know that when I give my children a coin to buy an ice cream cone, that coin is good in any store in town. When we are traveling, we can stop at any hotel or motel of our choice. When we go out to eat, we may do so in any cafe or club we wish and can afford. I can sit in any vacant seat in a bus, I can use a public restroom, and if I am thirsty, I may quench my thirst at any public drinking fountain. These things I consider my rights. I take them for granted.

This morning, the thought occurred to me, that by that same accident of birth, I could have been conceived by a pair of equally good, respectable, hard-working Negro parents. The process is the same, but what immense differences there would have been in my life.

How heartbreaking it must be for a child to have to learn that his future is sharply limited even if his intelligence and his ability are not. How confusing it must be for a child to learn that he may not buy an ice cream cone or a coke in the same shop as a lighter skinned child, even though his dime has the same value as the other. How could my parents have logically explained to me that a dime from a white hand is worth 10 cents, but that same coin in a brown or black hand is "unacceptable"?

Civil rights, Negro rights, is an inflammatory issue everywhere. I hear hate and prejudice and ignorance spouted off in any gathering of people. Everyone has a different reason for feeling that liberties should be denied to colored people. I have heard many, most of them are personal, involving a single bad experience he or she or one of his or her friends or acquaintances once had. . . .

MY OPINIONS were recently brushed aside by an acquaintance when he gently reminded that I do not know Negro people and so have no personal knowledge of the problem. He was right. I can count the number of Negro people I have known on the fingers of both hands.

I did not know a single one of the millions of Jews enslaved and murdered by the Nazis during World War II, but I have the right to deplore and renounce those atrocities. I did not personally know Pres. Kennedy, but I experienced a genuine grief and a deep personal sense of loss when he was killed. So, while it is true that I know little of Negro people, I cannot believe that I remain immune from the civil rights struggle.

We, as white Americans, may certainly point with pride to our society which produces such personalities as Roosevelt, Eisenhower, MacArthur, Kennedy, Johnson, Henry Ford, Helen Hayes, Jacqueline Kennedy, the Barrymores. But this list of fine Americans would not be complete without including George Washington Carver, Dr. Ralph Bunche, Jesse Owens, Jackie Robinson, Frank Yerby, Bill Robinson, Willie Mays, Nat "King" Cole, Louis Armstrong, Sidney Poitier, Marian Anderson, Harry Belafonte.

I am proud of all these people, I am proud to share a heritage with them. I am proud of being an American.

But at night, when I kiss my children good night, I offer a small prayer of thanks to God for making them so perfect, so healthy, so lovely, and I find myself tempted to thank Him for letting them be born white. Then I am not so proud.

And that is why I don't feel that this is a southern problem, it is a northern problem, a western problem, an eastern problem. It is an American problem, for all Americans. It is my problem.

I am only one person, one woman. I wish there was something I could do in this issue. I want to help. The only way I know how to start is to educate my children that justice and freedom and ambition are not merely privileges, but their birthrights. I must try to impress upon them that these rights must be given, not held tightly unto themselves, for what cannot be given, we do not really have for ourselves. . . .

Morgan Says:

Johnson Cites Federal Values While Ike Mourns for States

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

ROCHESTER, N. Y.—By sheer coincidence, Lyndon Johnson and Dwight Eisenhower recently engaged in a kind of presidential debate by remote control. Their subject might have been billed as, "Resolved, that the federal government has too much power and the states too little," with Gen. Eisenhower taking the affirmative and Pres. Johnson the negative.

Morgan

Delivering the commencement address at Swarthmore College, a distinguished Quaker school in Pennsylvania, the President rebutted the contention that the national government had become an evil of bigness which threatens, Big Brotherlike, to engulf its citizens in a morass of regulations and inhibit their freedom with bureaucracy. "The truth is," Mr. Johnson said, "far from crushing the individual, government at its best liberates him from the enslaving forces of his environment."

The key phrase, of course, was "at its best." Certainly there is no virtue in governmental bigness per se. But the Johnson argument, explicit and implicit in turn in his text, was that in area after area where state governments would not or could not act, Washington had moved.

He stressed the battle for civil rights and, as if taunting the impending conservative leadership of the Republican party by Sen. Goldwater, the President asked rhetorically if people really thought it was sinful for the federal government to furnish school lunches, bring electricity to the farm, provide social security, increase flood control, broaden the protection of wilderness areas, and so on.

At the annual governors' conference in Cleveland, ex-Pres. Eisenhower harped on one of his favorite themes: the need for state governments to bestir themselves to better meet their peoples' needs instead of "running to Washington."

"Our best protection against bigger government in Washington," the general said, "is better government in the states." Then, almost plaintively, he added, "time and again over the earlier years of my administration I had met with state governors. . . . Invariably we agreed on the theory of returning more power, more responsibility, more tax revenues to the states. In practice, however, difficulties—sometimes apparently insuperable—always presented themselves."

Rightly or wrongly, virtuously or in sin, the fact is that the former President and other like-minded citizens are bucking what, for the present at least, is an irreversible trend. Indeed that sincere advocate of states' rights and implacable foe of Big Government, Barry Goldwater himself, is pushing for federal funds for the billion-dollar Central Arizona Project. And as the Wall Street Journal's Henry Gemmill pointed out in a masterful reportage on the governors' conference, the one proposal of Goldwater's spokesman at the conference, Arizona's Gov. Paul Fannin, was to call for a new program of federal aid to the states to maintain the highways that the Eisenhower Administration set out to build.

EMOTIONALLY, Gemmill wrote, many governors are all for turning back the federal tide, "but there is little indication they hope to do it, and practically they want more from Washington rather than less."

Another fact is that with all its brimming hopper of glaring faults, Congress is less inefficient, less venal, less irresponsible than any state legislature —many of which have almost literally been bought and sold in the past by the oil industry, the railroads or other powerful lobbies. And the Washington bureaucracy, callous, arrogant and bumbling as it can be, is still, on the whole, several cuts above the quality of bureaucracy on the state level.

All of which gives more than a small smack of unreality to Gen. Eisenhower's suggestion that one way to improve government is to apply an unused provision of the constitution whereby state legislatures can force Congress to call a convention to amend the constitution. That, disturbingly enough, is one of several proposals that extreme right-wing organizations have been pushing in many state capitals.

Despite the arguments, the federal government is just not going to get any smaller, barring the unlikely prospect of world disarmament. Even then the continued population explosion would make more, not less, demands on Washington. But this simulated Johnson-Eisenhower debate on the issue provides a key to the so-called mystery of the general's refusal to continue a stop-Goldwater effort of sorts which he himself had been persuaded to start. The fact is that with the notable exception of some areas of foreign policy, the political thinking of the man from Denison, Tex., and Abilene, Kan., and the man from Phoenix, Ariz., is remarkably alike.

Washington Reports:

Extension of Hill-Burton Act Urged to Meet Hospital Needs

REP. JOHN B. BENNETT (R-Mich.) termed the Hill-Burton Hospital Construction Act "one of the finest federal aid programs in my many years of experience here" as he urged enactment of House-adopted legislation to extend and improve the act.

Bennett was interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations, with Rep. John E. Moss (D-Calif.), who said that the Hill-Burton Act already has increased the proportion of hospital beds from 50 percent of the nation's needs to 85 percent. Bennett added that the legislation has provided "much-needed hospital facilities for communities that otherwise wouldn't have them."

The amendment passed by the House, Moss reported, would provide $250 million a year in assistance for modernization, continue federal participation in underwriting costs of hospitals, increase the authorization for long-term care facilities from $40 million a year to $70 million, aid in establishment of rehabilitation, diagnostic and treatment centers.

Moss said he hoped the Senate would improve the amendment by making modernization funds available in 1965 instead of 1966 and by setting up a formula to aid in long-term financing of nonprofit hospitals.

Bennett pointed out that areas get funds on the basis of need, with each state surveying its needs and submitting requests to the U.S. Public Health Service, which determines priorities.

He described the measure as nonpartisan noting that the act was initiated by a Democrat, Sen. Lister Hill (Ala.), and a Republican, former Sen. Harold Burton (Ohio), later an associate justice of the Supreme Court.

DURING EARLY YEARS of the act, Moss said, the need was to provide and develop hospital facilities in remote areas. Now, he said, the need is for modernization and for service through regional hospitals which could reduce hospital costs to communities.

"Another means of reducing costs," he said, "would be to improve methods of financing the portion of the cost not met by federal or state grants," perhaps through long-term loans at low interest rates.

Modernization, in Bennett's opinion, would include expansion where needed to permit hospitals such as the 40-bed facility in his home town on Michigan's northern peninsula to provide greater service.

Long-term care facilities, such as nursing homes, will be of increasing importance, Moss said, because of the growing proportion of persons in the higher-age brackets.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

WHATEVER IMPELLED Pennsylvania's Gov. Scranton into the Republican presidential race—an issue of conscience, the northeastern GOP apprehension that nomination of Sen. Goldwater would bring a party disaster—it is almost certain that he moved too late.

The arithmetic of the upcoming Republican convention favors Goldwater overwhelmingly. He had 677 first-ballot committed delegates before picking up Montana's 14, as he was expected to do, with only 655 votes needed to nominate.

These "committed" delegates are not all solid, by any means. Given time, Scranton might be expected to separate some of them from the Arizona senator. Given time, old-line party leaders might be expected to rally behind the Pennsylvania governor as Lodge's campaign managers did, as Gov. Rockefeller of New York did most warmly and generously.

Scranton's problem, however, was at the beginning and will remain up until the convention a matter of time and arithmetic. He doesn't have much time and the arithmetic is against him.

The 58-vote Ohio delegation offers an example. The delegation is slated to vote on the first ballot at the San Francisco convention for Gov. James A. Rhodes as a favorite son, but about half the delegation is reported to be privately friendly to the Goldwater candidacy.

To Scranton, the Ohio delegation is vital: He must have all of it, or nearly all of it, and all or nearly all of the favorite-son delegations in Michigan and Wisconsin, all or nearly all of the thus-far uncommitted delegates from scattered states before he has a chance to halt a first-ballot Goldwater victory. And in addition he must make inroads on the Arizona senator's claimed delegate strength.

A majority of Ohio's 58 delegates could be swung to Scranton, it is reliably reported, if the state's top GOP leaders decide to swing them. But not all of them, in all probability. There are about 15 hard-core Goldwater supporters reported in the delegation who might not swing even if importuned by Gov. Rhodes plus Ray Bliss, the party's state chairman, plus Robert Taft, Jr., its Senate candidate.

A switch of three-fourths of the Ohio delegation would not do Scranton any good. If Rhodes releases the 58 votes from his own control, it might simply add about 15 to the Goldwater first-ballot total, and these 15 have not been counted in the compilations giving the Arizona senator more than a majority on his own.

The same thing is true of other favorite-son delegations such as Gov. George W. Romney's from Michigan and the Wisconsin 30-vote bloc formally pledged to a first-ballot vote for Rep. John W. Byrnes. Both delegations are seeded with Goldwater supporters, and these Goldwater men are not going to be switched to Scranton—not willingly, not without the most powerful and insistent pressure. For Romney and Byrnes to set their delegates free from their favorite-son posture seems likely to add more votes to what must now be assumed to be the Goldwater first-ballot majority.

THERE ARE FORCES within the Republican Party that could bring the pressures and supply the influence—if they chose—to move the Republican convention in behalf of Scranton. What we would see then is a convention similar to that in 1940, when the banking, industrial and communications power elite forced the nomination of Wendell L. Willkie.

But in 1940 a factor was working that is not at work now: There were a number of candidates, such as Sen. Taft and the then-young Thomas E. Dewey, who had some strength but never enough to win a majority. There was time enough for a shaking-out of minority contenders, so that deserters from one camp could be swung to Willkie's and his nomination came on the sixth ballot.

Powerful intervention by Gen. Eisenhower, the party's only presidential winner since 1928, might crumple Goldwater's strength, might give Scranton the chance to build up a majority of his own after two or three ballots. But the General had a chance to intervene—indeed, he was believed to have already intervened—in behalf of Scranton during the recent Governors' Conference. Instead he called Scranton off, warning him against becoming part of a "cabal" against the Arizona senator.

THE HILL-BURTON ACT, which brings hospital and other health facilities to communities, should be extended and improved by enactment of a House-passed amendment, Rep. John B. Bennett (R-Mich.), left, and Rep. John E. Moss (D-Calif.) asserted in interviews on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

July Sales and Clearances Offer Chance to Save on Family Needs

By Sidney Margolius

JULY IS ONE of the best months for shopping, with many sales and clearances offering an opportunity to save 10-30 percent on important needs.

Among the sales are standard brands and styles of shoes, women's dresses and sportswear, men's shirts and other furnishings, refrigerators, curtains and drapes, and, late in the month, the annual furniture sales. Used cars take their traditional drop right after July 4. This month, fuel dealers also offer special concessions to fill your tank or bin, and storm window installers, now between seasons, offer lower quotations.

Here are tips to help:

Used Cars: Prices have been higher than usual this year, averaging $866 compared to $832 last year and $802 the year before, according to the National Automobile Dealers Association. But with more concessions expected in July, a good used car is still an excellent investment if it is thoughtfully selected.

A late model used car avoids the big first year depreciation of 30 percent or more which can amount to $600-$750 on moderate price cars. But used cars do need to be bought with care. In general, it is usually safer to put your money into a smaller, late model car than a larger, older one.

Most frequent mistake of used car buyers is to buy without a test drive. Second mistake is to concentrate on the price rather than the condition of the car. (Make sure the dealer has an adequate service department to back up his claims of reconditioning and guaranty). A third mistake is to overpay for the financing.

Auto finance companies usually charge more for financing used cars than new ones. You may get a reasonable price on a car itself but pay $100-$200 more than necessary for the financing. Credit unions and banks have a clear advantage here. A credit union or bank rate generally is no more than $6 per $100 and sometimes less. But various state laws permit rates ranging from $10 per $100 for cars less than two years old, to $13 per $100 for older cars, and sometimes more. This is the equivalent of almost 20-26 percent per annum. In the southern states that have regulatory laws, lenders and finance companies are permitted to charge effective per annum rates of 25-30 percent on older cars.

Especially beware of high pressure dealers who advertise such offers as "$1 Down," "$5 Down;" "No Money Down," "We finance anyone," etc.

The St. Louis Better Business Bureau reports a survey found that almost never was the customer actually given such terms but often was compelled to negotiate a side loan to make up the standard down payment finance companies require.

It is to the discredit of the daily newspapers that they permit such advertising. In a similar racket reported from Canada, some used car dealers got buyers to sign agreements to purchase without any written reference to financing, giving the buyers the verbal impression that if would be available. But when the finance companies refused to accept some of the purchasers, they had to produce the rest of the purchase price themselves or forfeit their deposits.

Clothing Clearances: You get most for your money in separates, which can be mixed or matched, and market reports by Research Dir. Lazare Teper of the Ladies' Garment Workers, indicate that wage earners nowadays are buying wisely. Women are tending to select the more versatile suits and separate blouses and skirts, and when they buy dresses, are choosing better quality ones.

UPHOLSTERED FURNITURE: The quality of upholstered furniture fabrics has developed into a major source of conflict between consumers and retailers, according to Home Furnishings Daily. The retailers in turn blame the manufacturers, and report that even expensive fabrics sometimes don't live up to consumers' expectations. The chief complaints are premature wear, fading and staining.

We have several times recommended buying upholstered furniture treated with soil-resistant and liquid-repelling finishes such as Scotchgard and Syl-Mer. They are worth the extra cost, often $10-$20, for furniture that will get hard use.

However, these finishes merely protect against soil and some stains (not all). They will not add durability to a thinly woven fabric, even though they are offered on some low quality furniture coverings. In shopping mid-summer furniture sales, you will need to make sure that fabrics are durable. Ask to see a sample if possible; hold it up to the light to judge the closeness of weave; pull it both ways to judge the strength in both directions.

Food Buying Calendar: Some meats are going up in price, especially pork and lamb, but beef remains relatively reasonable for July, and there are other low cost alternatives to help keep down family food bills this summer. Both broilers and oven-ready turkeys currently are excellent values (useful for lunch boxes and salads, too). Canned tuna is so cheap it is the buy of the year. Canned pink salmon is in heavy supply and relatively reasonable, due to good catches and large stocks.

Union-Made Bats Hit Those Homers

LOUISVILLE, KY.—When those baseballs rattle off the fences of the nation's ball parks this summer you can be sure they're being swatted by union-made bats.

In the major, minor and the midget leagues, virtually all the sluggers swing for distance with bats made by members of Steelworkers Local 3931 here.

The local functions at the plant of the Hillerich & Bradsby Co., makers of the "Louisville Slugger" bat which is almost as famous as the game itself.

Super-stars of the past and present have used the "Slugger" since the founder of the firm got into bat-making by accident 'way back in 1884. Stars of the future will almost certainly do the same.

Pete (Old Gladiator) Browning, the hitting hero of the then Louisville Eclipse team, had broken his favorite "wagon-tongue" and a crisis set in. John (Bud) Hillerich, son of the owner of a well-established wood-turning shop, persuaded the sports hero to let him turn out a new bat, according to Browning's specifications.

Bud's dad thought this was frivolous nonsense but he changed his mind as the bat-making caught on and finally became the firm's chief sales item.

You name 'em. In the ensuing years, all the top baseball stars had their bats made to their own specifications at the Louisville plant. That includes Honus Wagner, Ty Cobb, Tris Speaker, Babe Ruth and all the other Hall of Famers of past years.

It goes on right into the present. Stan Musial swung a "Louisville Slugger" during his rise to immortality in baseball. Willie Mays, Hank Aaron, Roger Maris and Mickey Mantle do the same. Add Carl Yastrzemski, American League batting champ of 1963, and Tommy Davis, his National League counterpart, and almost all major and minor leaguers.

THERE ARE some 400 employes at the plant, most of them union production workers.

Hillerich & Bradsby doesn't enter into the perennial argument over which sport is the "national game," but it's made a "double play" on two of the most popular. The firm now makes fine golf clubs as well as baseball bats. They got into golf club making because two of the family firm owners took up the game in 1916 and saw the potentialities.

Bat-making and golf club fashioning are jobs that require many skills and a great deal of careful workmanship. The union provides both at the plant. About 60 operations are required to turn out a baseball bat which meets the standards of the players and the people who turn 'em out.

The bats for the "pros," great and near-great, are tailor-made to specifications. But the same skills are applied to all bats turned out. The Little Leaguers thus can get a weapon as superbly crafted as that used by Mickey Mantle—and, in fact, bearing his autograph—or that of any other "big leaguer" they fancy. Even the small souvenir bats are carefully turned from separate blocks of ash, instead of from splinters, or splits, from the regular billets.

Major league and pro teams order a yearly supply and these are restocked wherever needed from storage bins bearing the players' names. Specifications are kept in a fireproof vault. These include the "specs" for every player who ever swung a "Louisville Slugger."

PTTI Union Seminars Held in 3 Latin Nations

The Postal, Telegraph & Telephone Intl., international trade secretariat which represents 720,000 workers in North and South America, is deep in a broad program of trade union education seminars in Latin American nations.

Six sessions were held in Ecuador, with 119 workers in the postal and telecommunications fields attending. The instructor was Cristobal Herrera M., a 1959 graduate of the Front Royal (Va.) Trade Union Institute cosponsored by PTTI and the Communications Workers.

In Brazil 159 workers attended seminars held in five states during the first three months of 1964, the majority in the telephone or telegraph fields.

A series of 15 seminars is being held in Bolivia, with 162 students having participated in the nine classes which have been completed.

The curriculum varied only in minor detail from one seminar to another.

EQUAL PAY CONFERENCE panelists discuss enforcement of new law requiring equal pay for men and women doing the same work. Left to right, Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther F. Peterson; Pres. Virginia R. Allan of the National Federation of Business & Professional Women's Clubs, and Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks.

Johnson Sees Landmark In New Equal Pay Law

President Johnson hailed the nation's first federal equal pay for women law as a landmark in America's progress toward a society of decency."

The law, passed last year, went into effect June 11 and several hundred persons took part in an all-day conference of the National Committee for Equal Pay before assembling at the White House to hear the President.

Johnson told the group that America has been made "stronger—not softer—as we have laid aside, gradually one by one, the old biases and ancient prejudices against the equality of women."

The new law, which applies to employers and workers covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act, requires that men and women performing equal work be paid equal wages. It prohibits lowering salaries for men in order to equalize rates.

Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks served as a member of a panel discussion on administration of the new law, which followed an address to the conference by Wage & Hour Administrator Clarence T. Lundquist, whose staff has the responsibility for enforcing the statute.

Earlier Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.), a principal sponsor of the equal pay bill, called for extension of the Fair Labor Standards Act, with both its minimum wage and equal pay provisions, to additional groups of workers "so it will have meaning for those women who are on the lowest rung of the economic ladder.

Noting that fewer than one out of three working women is currently covered by the law, she called for action to help "the millions of women who make 70 and 80 cents an hour working in laundries, department stores and domestic work."

Lundquist assured the group that the new law will be administered vigorously.

Pay Policy Notice Upsets Election

Saginaw, Mich.—Posting of new pay policies for salaried employes of the Lufkin-Rule Co., just four days before a representation election, has been held by the National Labor Relations Board to have been an interference with the exercise of free choice by employes.

The board set aside elections lost by the Auto Workers in the clerical and engineering departments and ordered a new vote, UAW Regional Dir. Ken Robinson and Dir. Douglas Fraser of the union's Technical, Office & Professional Dept. announced.

The UAW protested company actions during a 1963 union organizing campaign and a trial examiner upheld one union objection. The board, upholding the examiner, said the company-announced method of initiating salary reviews was a change from the former method and an unfair practice.

Province Hit For Proposed Work-Relief

Ottawa, Ont.—The proposal of the new Liberal Party government in Saskatchewan that relief recipients be made to work for their welfare benefits is a "flagrant contradiction" of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and a violation of the Intl. Labor Organization forced labor convention, Executive Vice Pres. Joe Morris of the Canadian Labor Congress has charged.

Announced by Government

The provincial government announced its plans to get able-bodied people off the relief rolls by putting them to work on federal-provincial cost-sharing projects.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Morris pointed out, provides not only that "everyone has the right to work . . . to just and favorable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment," but also to "free choice of employment."

"The CLC supports 'work instead of relief,' not 'work for relief,'" he said. "The difference between a free man and a slave is the right to payment for his labor, and from this flows the right to collective bargaining and the right to withdraw one's labor. Work for relief is no better than forced labor and Canada has, in that regard, ratified the 1957 ILO convention.

"The CLC believes that workers should be hired on the basis of their ability, not their dependence on relief, and this organization trusts that no other government, federal or provincial, would even think of adopting such an anti-social policy."

Meany Asks Congress To Curb duPont Estate

clared. "If most bank holding companies are regulated, then the duPont estate bank holding company should be regulated too. Just because the duPont estate is so big and powerful is no excuse for giving them special favored treatment."

Convention Cited

Meany called the committee's attention to a resolution adopted at the 1963 AFL-CIO convention which declared that the duPont estate's exemption from the banking law gives it "immense and unjustified industrial, financial and political power in the state of Florida."

The resolution pointed out that former Pres. Eisenhower, in signing the holding company law, warned that the "exemptions and other special provisions will require the further attention of Congress."

Meany told the committee that a provision for the estate's income to go to a charitable foundation after the death of Mrs. Jessie Ball duPont and other annuitants "offers no excuse for continuing the duPont's estate's exemption from the Bank Holding Company Act."

The holding company law, he pointed out, "aims at preventing actual or potential abuses of financial power. Such power exists, and will continue to exist, in the duPont estate no matter where its incomes goes," he stressed.

He cited as an example of "abuse of power" Ball's "steady refusal to accept the recommendations of presidential boards for settling the FEC railway strike and his equally persistent refusal to arbitrate the strike issues."

The "record shows," Meany said, that "the duPont estate has in fact operated as an aggressive, expansive business enterprise, enjoying all the advantages of the holding company form while avoiding the regulations applied to holding companies."

Senior Citizens' Group Presents Awards to 4

New York—Four pioneers in the service of the elderly received Senior 65er Awards from the Retired Members Local of Retail-Wholesale Dist. 65 at a ceremony in the union

The honors went to Norman Thomas, six-time Socialist candidate for President, for demonstrating that age is no handicap in vigorous espousal of progressive social trinking; Sen. Harrison Williams (D-N. J.), for the special attention he has given problems of the aged in his service on Senate committees; Elizabeth Wickenden, nationally known consultant on problems of the aged, and Leo Laks, director of the Council Center for Senior Citizens in Brooklyn.

Morgan to Boost Library Week

Edward P. Morgan, whose news and comment program is sponsored by the AFL-CIO Monday through Friday evenings on ABC radio, has been named to the steering committee for the eighth National Library Week.

Morgan has frequently commented on his program on National Library Week activity and American reading habits in general. Library Week each year has also been the subject of AFL-CIO announcements urging support.

The committee seeks to stimulate more reading and to encourage increased use of and support for all the nation's libraries.

Rollcall in House on Federal Pay Bill

Here is the rollcall by which the House passed the federal pay raise bill, raising salaries of 1.7 million government workers and providing deferred increases for top executives, federal judges and members of Congress. The vote was 243-157. Voting for the bill were 184 Democrats and 59 Republicans; opposed were 111 Republicans and 46 Democrats.

On labor's scoreboard a vote for the bill was a right vote (R), while a vote against was a wrong vote (W). Other symbols: A—absent; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; NV—not voting. Numerals denote districts; AL—at large.

Goldfinger Cites Buying Lag:

Wage Guideposts Held 'Unworkable'

The wage-price guideposts set by the Johnson Administration's Council of Economic Advisers are neither equitable nor workable, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger has declared.

"The wage guidepost is rather precise," he explained. "It has a number—a 3.2 percent figure—indicated by the Council of Economic Advisers as the size of wage increases. There is no precise guidepost for prices, and there is no mechanism for getting the price cuts which the Council of Economic Advisers itself says are necessary in order to achieve overall stablility of the price level."

Wages should be determined by buying power, not dollar figures, Goldfinger emphasized in an interview on Labor News Conference, broadcast over the Mutual Broadcasting System's radio network. He was questioned by Frank Porter, national economics reporter for the Washington Post, and Alan Adams, Washington labor reporter for McGraw-Hill Publications.

Goldfinger pointed out that in recent years the nation's productivity has increased at a rate of about 3.2 percent annually but the buying power of all workers in the private economy, including salaried executives, has increased only about 2.3 percent a year.

Buying Power Lags

"There is a considerable lag between the increase in the buying power of the workers' wages and the increase in productivity," he noted.

He conceded that the Administration's restraints and the emphasis on the 3.2 percent figure have proved a "limiting factor" in union bargaining for wage increases "because one of the things we have to remember is that wages are not set by workers—they are not set by unions."

"Wages are established through collective bargaining—jointly by the union and the employer—so that there is built-in opposition to increases through the employer's resistance. Now, in addition to that there is the factor of the Council of Economic Advisers' guidepost with its 3.2 percent figure.

"On the other hand, prices are not determined by unions or workers at all—prices are set by the employers. The actual experience in recent years has been that the relatively high level of unemployment, the spread of automation, the threat of job displacement, in addition to the employer's usual feelings about granting wage increases—all of these factors have worked against workers obtaining substantial wage increases.

"Real wages—that is, the buying power of wages—have actually lagged behind the rise of productivity ever since the middle 1950s."

Goldfinger added that the buying power of wage increases also has been eroded by the prices consumers have to pay for their purchases—particularly the prices of services, which have increased steadily as the wholesale prices of commodities have remained stable.

TRADE UNION ACTIVITIES were outlined for these students from Hunter College High School, New York, when they visited AFL-CIO headquarters during a trip to Washington. Speaking is John Connors, assistant to Pres. George Meany.

High Court Sets Equal Districts As State Legislature Standard

application of the court's 1962 decision, ruled for the majority that the legislative apportionments of all six states involved in the cases—Maryland, Alabama, New York, Colorado, Virginia and Delaware—were invalid. Comparable challenges to state apportionment are pending in 30-odd other states.

The court had already ruled that a Georgia "county unit" plan for selecting party nominees to the U.S. House of Representatives was unconstitutional, the majority opinion pointed out. Any congressional districting law weighing the votes of citizens in one area favorably and the votes of other citizens unfavorably defeats the basic principles embodied in the Constitution, the court had decided then.

Six Opinions Written

The court majority in Warren's opinions—he wrote six of them, one for each state involved—applied the same doctrine to the districting of state legislatures. He was joined by Associate Justices Hugo L. Black, William O. Douglas, William J. Brennan, Jr., Byron R. White and Arthur J. Goldberg.

Justice John Marshall Harlan filed an impassioned dissent, as he had in the 1962 case that established the power of federal courts to intervene to correct unbalanced districts in state legislatures and as he did again in the Georgia "county unit" case covering unbalanced congressional districts. Harlan was joined in his dissent, although in less fiery terms, in some of the state cases by Justices Tom C. Clark and Potter Stewart.

Dissents Brushed Aside

Warren brushed aside the dissents by pointing out that the courts obviously would not hesitate to intervene if a state attempted to "entirely prohibit from voting" certain classes of "otherwise qualified voters."

"If a state should provide that the votes of citizens in one part . . . should be given two times, or five times, or 10 times the weight of votes of citizens in another part of the state, it could hardly be contended that the right to vote of those residing in the disfavored areas had not been effectively impaired," he said in the Alabama case, the vehicle of the key decision.

It is "inconceivable" to imagine that the court would sustain a state law providing "that the votes of citizens in one part of the state would be multiplied by two, five or 10 while the votes of persons in another would be counted only at face value," he wrote.

"The effect of state legislative districting schemes which give the same number of representatives to unequal numbers of constituents is identical," he declared.

The basic aim of legislative apportionment, the majority ruled, is the achieving of "fair and effective representation for all citizens, and any "dilution" of such representation for some citizens "impairs basic constitutional rights," the Chief Justice wrote.

He dealt with the arguments against judicial intervention with state legislative apportionments in these terms:

'Complex and Many-Faceted'

"We are told that the matter . . . is a complex and many-faceted one. We are advised that states can rationally consider factors other than population. . . . We are admonished not to restrict the power of the states to impose differing views as to political philosophy. . . . We are cautioned about the dangers of entering into political thickets and mathematical quagmires."

Our answer, said Warren, is that "a denial of constitutionally protected rights demands judicial protection; our oath and our office require no less of us."

The majority also brushed aside the state argument that under the federal system by which Congress was created—the House based on population, the Senate having two members from each state—a precedent had been created allowing states to apportion at least one house upon geography.

The composition of Congress, Warren wrote, "is one ingrained in our Constitution" and grew out of political compromises considered necessary when 13 originally sovereign states agreed to yield part of their sovereignty to the Union. It was part of the price paid the smaller states, he noted, for joining in the act of unification.

Never Sovereign Entities

The various counties within a state, he said, "never have been considered as sovereign entities." Every political subdivision within a state—county, city or whatever—exists under state authority alone, and "the relationship of the states to the federal government could hardly be less analogous."

The majority directed lower courts to frame decrees applying the decision and warned that it would be an "unusual case" if the decrees should not guarantee citizens against further elections under an invalid districting system.

The Chief Justice noted in his opinion, however, that lower courts "might" be justified in delaying action "where an impending election is imminent and a state's election machinery is already in progress."

Israeli Labor Award Presented to Randolph

New York—The National Labor Committee for Labor Israel gave its 11th Histadrut Humanitarian Award to A. Philip Randolph, a vice president of the AFL-CIO and president of the Sleeping Car Porters.

At a dinner attended by some 500 trade union leaders, Randolph said he was accepting the award "in the name not of or for myself alone, but of and for the members of the organizations I have the honor to be associated with." Among these he mentioned his own union, the AFL-CIO, the Negro American Labor Council, and the participants in the civil rights march on Washington in August 1963.

He called the cloture vote that ended the 75-day Senate filibuster a prelude to enactment of "meaningful civil rights legislation."

Characterizing Histadrut as "one of the great social forces of these times," Randolph drew a comparison between American and Israeli workers, asserting that they have close ties. He praised Histadrut for having conceived and built its Afro-Asian Institute and for teaching many young men and women of Africa and Asia how modern Israel has handled the problem of building "from scratch."

Theodore W. Kheel, New York attorney and leading labor mediator, cited Randolph as a major figure in the struggle to win passage of the Administration's civil rights bill.

Dr. Sol Stein, executive director of the National Committee for Labor Israel, held that Randolph's life had been one of "profound, unyielding, passionate commitment to the under-privileged, the denied, the circumscribed by man's inhumanity to man."

Other speakers included Avraham Harman, Israel's ambassador to the United States, and Moe Falikman, chairman of the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut. Congratulatory messages were received from Pres. Johnson, New York Senators Jacob K. Javits and Kenneth B. Keating, and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, a previous recipient.

Proceeds from the award dinner will be used for scholarships in the name of Randolph at the Afro-Asian Institute for Labor Studies in Israel. The institute trains young trade union leaders from the new nations in the democratic solution of social, economic and labor problems.

Also shown are Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, United Nations Ambassador Adlai Stevenson and union leaders and delegates speaking during the sessions. It may be rented, on three weeks advance notice, for $3 or purchased for $35. Apply to the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, 815 Sixteenth Street, N.W., Washington 6, D.C.

Last-Minute Plunge:

Scranton Makes Bid To Stop Goldwater

cause which has written off most of America and has been written off by the rest." It must unite, he declared, behind its traditional principles, "not some weird parody on our beliefs."

The belated entry of Scranton, coming six days after a television appearance in which he had refused to declare himself during the Governors' Conference in Cleveland, got warm and magnanimous support from New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, who withdrew his own candidacy and urged "all leaders in the moderate mainstream" to unite behind Scranton and a moderate platform.

Scranton got backing also from leaders of Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge's undeclared presidential thrust.

Eisenhower Hedges

But from the one party leader whose open and powerful support he clearly needed, Gen. Eisenhower in Gettysburg, Scranton got only a comment that "free, fair and active competition" for the nomination would be "good for the health and vigor of the party."

Former Vice Pres. Nixon, who had bitterly assailed Goldwater's record on five "key issues" during the Governors' Conference and had insisted that the race for the party's presidential nomination was still open, was cool if not hostile to the Scranton announcement. The Pennsylvania governor had given a "very weak impression" on the television program, Nixon commented.

Two powerful midwestern Republican governors, Gov. James A. Rhodes of Ohio and Gov. George W. Romney of Michigan, remained silent after Scranton's announcement.

Scranton nevertheless began his last-minute drive to change the shape of the convention with appearances in Iowa, Missouri, Minnesota and Colorado.

Beneficiary of the nationwide organizational network created by Rockefeller, he was not able immediately to announce a nationally known party figure as his campaign manager. He had conferred after his Maryland announcement with former Republican National Committee Chairman Leonard W. Hall and with Fred Scribner, GOP national committeeman from Maine, who played major roles in the Eisenhower campaigns of 1952 and 1956.

Goldwater's mountainous advantage was increased when he scored a total triumph at the Republican state convention in Texas, picking up a pledged delegation of 56 votes for a total listed by the Associated Press at 677—22 more than the bare majority of 655 needed for nomination. He was expected to get 14 more in Montana.

Scranton's problem thus was to make direct and specific inroads on the Goldwater delegates—to take away enough to deny the Arizona senator a first-ballot nomination—and to win for himself the powerful Ohio and Michigan delegations and those listed for other favorite sons as well as all or nearly all the 187 delegates already chosen but officially uncommitted to anybody.

Goldwater's forces, fighting to hold what they had, produced a statement from 54 conservative Republican House members that the Arizona senator was the leader best equipped to build party unity and furnish leadership. It was an answer to a statement by eight liberal Republican senators calling, in effect, for nomination of a different candidate.

PHILADELPHIA AREA Steelworkers, visiting Washington for a legislative conference stressing civil rights legislation, meet with an elated Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) shortly after the Senate cloture vote which assured passage of the bill. Humphrey was Democratic floor leader in the bipartisan civil rights fight.

Civil Rights Passage Imminent, Crippling Amendments Crushed

of speeches, most of the Dixie bloc spent only a minute or two to explain amendments, which were routinely voted down by margins of two-to-one and better.

As amendment after amendment was disposed of, Sen. George D. Aiken (R-Vt.) expounded what quickly became known as "the Aiken rule." He told the Senate that if the sponsor of an amendment takes less than five minutes to discuss it, "it is obvious that he does not care whether I understand his amendment or not. So I vote 'nay.' It is a very simple formula, which is available to any senator."

"It is a wonderful rule," Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R.I.) quickly commented. "I applaud it."

With only minor modifications, acceptable to the leadership, being adopted, interest switched to the votes of Arizona's Sen. Barry Goldwater, front-runner for the Republican presidential nomination.

On many of the amendments for which he was present, Goldwater voted with the hard-core southern opposition and against the overwhelming majority of his own party.

Goldwater was one of only five Republicans who voted with the Dixie bloc to kill the entire public accommodations section of the bill, the others being Senators Norris Cotton (N.H.), Wallace F. Bennett (Utah), Edwin Mechem (N.M.) and Milward L. Simpson (Wyo.). Ranged against him on the 62-23 vote were 25 Republicans, including GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.).

Another amendment on which Goldwater stood with a small minority of his party would have used the civil rights bill as a vehicle for voiding union shop agreements if a union is found to have discriminated racially. Both Democratic and Republican senators pointed out in opposing the amendment that the bill already carried a clearly enforceable ban against discrimination by unions as well as employers, and that the proposed amendment was a roundabout way of attacking the union shop.

One of the closer votes by which a leadership-opposed amendment was defeated was a 51-47 rejection of an attempt to delete authority for a single member of the proposed Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to bring a question of discrimination before the commission on behalf of an individual. Civil rights supporters regard this as a means of helping individuals who are afraid of reprisals if they act on their own.

Except for the jury trial amendment adopted shortly before the cloture vote, the only significant change was acceptance of an amendment barring double prosecution of a person as a result of the same alleged violation of the civil rights law. The leadership agreed to support this change after modifications were made in the original wording of the amendment.

In the form in which it was before the Senate for passage, the civil rights bill included these main provisions:

VOTING: Registrars are prohibited from giving more difficult literacy tests to Negroes than to whites, or otherwise using discriminatory standards. Voters could not be rejected for minor errors on applications. Anyone with a 6th grade education is presumed literate in the absence of evidence to the contrary. The government is given new power to speed court action on voting cases.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATION: Virtually all major establishments serving the general public are barred from discriminating against customers because of race or religion. If a state or community has a public accommodations law, federal action can not occur until the local law has had a chance to operate.

JOB DISCRIMINATION: Effective one year after enactment, employers, employment agencies and unions are prohibited from discriminating because of race, sex, religion or national origin in hiring, firing, promotions, job referrals and admittance to union membership or apprenticeship programs. This would initially apply to establishments in interstate commerce with 100 or more workers, dropping over three years to cover firms with 25 or more employes. State laws would first be given a chance to function, a federal Equal Employment Commission would seek to bring about voluntary compliance, and then court action could be taken if voluntary methods fail.

Other sections of the bill authorize cutoff of federal funds for state and local programs which discriminate, give the Attorney General power to bring suits to end school segregation, permit an appeal to higher courts if a federal judge refuses to take jurisdiction in a civil rights case removed from state courts, and permit the Attorney General to sue to open city or state facilities to Negroes.

Goldwater Decides —At Last Minute

Sen. Barry Goldwater (Ariz.), prospective Republican presidential nominee, climbed off the fence on the civil rights bill by announcing just before the Senate action he would vote against it.

On the Senate floor Goldwater said that the public accommodations and fair employment sections were in violation of the Constitution and that he would violate his oath of office if he voted for a bill containing such provisions.

National Automation Commission Approved by House Labor Group

A House Labor subcommittee has approved legislation establishing a broad-based National Commission on Technology, Automation & Economic Progress—a move long urged by the Administration and the AFL-CIO.

Incorporating suggestions made by the AFL-CIO, the subcommittee bill provides for representatives from both labor and management on a "broadly representative" 14-member commission, to be named by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Subcommittee Chairman Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.) said the commission's responsibilities would specifically include recommending steps to be taken by the federal government to "share the costs and help prevent and alleviate the adverse impact of change on displaced workers."

Technological progress can mean "misery" for millions of workers, the AFL-CIO stressed in a statement to the House subcommittee shortly before it approved the bill.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller charged that rapid automation, instead of bringing "a golden age of abundance," has contributed to persistent, high unemployment.

Skills Made Obsolete

"Men have been displaced by machines, skills acquired over a lifetime have become obsolete, entire communities have been turned into islands of depression reminiscent of the 1930's and the frustrations of the Negro people and the youth and the poor of all races have grown in intensity," Biemiller said.

In addition to the commission, made up of persons outside the government, a federal inter-agency committee would be established by the bill to provide technical assistance and advisory services.

Both groups are needed, Biemiller said, and would lend encouragement to the hope "that the nation will soon begin to meet the enormous social problems created by the revolution in technology with the same zeal which has marked our pioneering efforts in the physical sciences."

'Imbalance' Cited

Much of the problem of adjustment to automation, he declared, has resulted from "a fundamental imbalance in American policy during the past decade."

Until recently, he said, there has been "an almost single-minded concern for the advancement of technology and productive efficiency" with "little attention to the serious human problems created by rapid technological change."

Biemiller cited investment credits and accelerated depreciation allowances "to subsidize the spread of automation . . . while little was done to aid in the development of adequate adjustment of people and communities to radical technological change."

He contrasted the modest funds available to the Dept. of Labor for its research programs on automation's social impact with "the expenditure by the federal government of billions of dollars on research and development in the physical sciences."

He cited the AFL-CIO's reiterated support for a broad automation commission, in convention resolutions and Executive Council statement. He emphasized, however, that there should be no postponement of known and needed programs during the commission's study.

"Measures are needed now," he said, "to create jobs and alleviate the conditions of the poor and the aged. These include public works, the anti-poverty program, hospital care for the aged under social security, an increase in the minimum wage and extension of the Fair Labor Standards Act to workers not yet covered."

Even if all these programs were immediately enacted, Biemiller added, there would still be need for the proposed automation commission to provide "a rational approach to meeting the problems of tomorrow, as well as the problems of today."

The subcommittee bill authorizes a $2 million appropriation for the commission's work, sets Jan. 1, 1966, as the date for a final report but permits interim recommendations before then. The commission's title is broadened from the original bill by inclusion of the phrase "economic progress."

Meany Hails 'Historic' Civil Rights Vote

House Set To Accept Changes

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany hailed Senate passage of the civil rights bill as "a truly historic legislative victory" and called for a broad-based drive "to translate the bill's promises into reality."

As the bill progressed to the threshold of final enactment in the House, Meany urged the civil rights coalition of Negro, labor and religious groups to work "with equal fervor" for full employment, decent wages, housing, medical care and "unlimited" educational opportunities.

"All of us must enlist for the duration," he said in a message to the convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. "I pledge to you that the AFL-CIO will never abandon this fight."

The 73-27 Senate vote for the civil rights bill was a credit to the leadership of both political parties, the AFL-CIO president declared, and reflected "the overwhelming consensus of the American people." It was a "victory," he said, "not just for Negro Americans, not just for oppressed minorities, but for the nation."

Quick Approval Seen

House leaders, meanwhile, put a stamp of approval on the Senate-amended rights bill and set in motion a procedure to accept the Senate amendments and send the bill directly to the President's desk.

House Rules Committee Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.), a foe of the bill, agreed to a June 30 meeting of his committee to clear the way for a House vote. A majority of the committee would have been able to force a meeting if Smith had not acceded to the request. If no snags develop, the bill should reach the White House in time for a July 4 signing ceremony.

On the final Senate vote for passage, 46 Democrats and 27 Republicans supported the bill; 21 Democrats and six Republicans opposed passage.

Only one non-southern Democrat voted against the bill—Sen. Robert C. Byrd (W. Va.). His vote was balanced by that of Texas Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough, who supported passage.

The Republican votes against the bill came from Sen. Barry Goldwater (Ariz.) and five of his political supporters.

Credit for the massive bipartisan support in the Senate, Meany said in his message to the NAACP, belongs to the leadership of both parties—Senators Mike Mansfield (Mont.) and Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.) among the Democrats and

Senate Vote Sends Bill to White House

By David L. Perlman

The Davis-Bacon fringe benefits bill, a major legislative goal of the AFL-CIO, has been passed by the Senate and sent to the White House to be signed into law.

It requires contractors on federally-financed construction projects to match prevailing area standards of fringe benefits as well as wages, or add the cash equivalent to hourly pay.

The Administration-backed measure was approved by voice vote as the Senate dug into the backlog which had piled up during the three-month civil rights filibuster. The House passed the bill in January by a 357-50 vote.

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. hailed the fringe benefit bill's final passage as "the greatest legislative victory for the building trades in the past decade." Similar bills had been introduced in every Congress since 1955.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wrote each senator before the vote that the bill "is essential to protect local wage rates and local community living standards."

Meany pointed out that in 1931, when the Davis-Bacon Act was adopted, "fringe benefits such as health, welfare, insurance and pension plans scarcely existed."

Currently, he said, there are "more than 5,000 health, welfare and pension funds covering more than 70 percent of the building and construction trades workers. . . . These fringe benefits are as much a part of the wage structure as the cash wage payment itself."

Meany stressed that the employer who does not pay fringe benefits "clearly has an unfair advantage in bidding on federal

Michigan Is 1st State to Redistrict

Lansing, Mich.—Possibility of Republican action to block Michigan's legislative districting was raised by Gov. George W. Romney as election officials moved to implement "one man, one vote" edicts by the U.S. and State Supreme Courts.

The Michigan court ordered into effect for the 1964 elections an equal population plan for both Senate and House districts just hours before the U.S. court threw out that portion of Michigan's new constitution calling for a Senate based on a combination of area and population. Michigan thus became the first state to redistrict under the Supreme Court's equality of population mandate.

Romney termed the new plan "a districting monstrosity" and charged it was devised "for the advantage of Democrats."

Most political observers predict that the reapportionment will result in a Democratic majority in the House and a standoff in the Senate. Republicans now have majorities in both houses.

Health Care Sidetracked:

Mass Transit Bill Passed by House

The House gave a lift to commuters in traffic-clogged cities by approving a large-scale program of federal grants to help metropolitan areas develop and improve mass transit systems.

Added to the bill on the House floor were labor-supported amendments protecting transit workers against loss of jobs, seniority, pensions, bargaining rights and other contract provisions. Similar protections had been included in the bill passed by the Senate more than a year ago.

The vote was 212-189, with 173 Democrats and 39 Republicans supporting the bill. Opposing were 128 Republicans and 61 Democrats.

While the Administration was winning this major victory on the House floor, it met with a sharp setback in the House Ways & Means Committee on another top-priority bill — hospital care for the elderly under social security.

The committee sidetracked the King-Anderson bill, after more than three months of closed door meetings which had raised hopes that Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) would switch his decisive vote to support some version of social security health care.

Union Disaster Teams Aid Flood-Hit Regions

AFL-CIO union members swept into ravaged areas of Montana and Nebraska in the wake of recent floods to take over a major clean-up and rehabilitation job with cooperation of the Red Cross.

In one community after another union members—often from miles away—answered the Red Cross call for help and gave outstanding assistance in aiding the rain-drenched, mud-soaked victims as they struggled to get rid of dirt and debris, Red Cross officials reported.

In Montana 300 union members, most of them from Great Falls, moved into stricken areas under the coordination of Business Manager Peter Gilligan of Plumbers & Pipe Fitters Local 139, a Red Cross volunteer labor consultant.

Volunteer disaster teams were developed under the direction of State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. James S. Umber. He was assisted by

Lodge Returns to Aid Scranton Delegate Drive

By Willard Shelton

The last-moment drive of Pennsylvania's Gov. William W. Scranton to win the Republican presidential nomination got the aid of a long-time party leader, retiring Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, as Scranton himself sought to woo away delegates previously considered announced for or pledged to Sen. Barry Goldwater.

Lodge announced in Saigon that he was resigning as U.S. ambassador to Vietnam to assist in Scranton's campaign. The Pennsylvania governor, whose present delegate strength is far behind Goldwater's, said he was "simply delighted" at Lodge's action.

Goldwater was still rated as the front-runner for nomination at the Republican National Convention opening in San Francisco July 13. The Associated Press credited him with a total of 680 delegates either committed or "favorable," well above the 655 needed for a majority.

Goldwater commented that Lodge was to be "congratulated" for having borne up so long under what the senator called the Administration's "indecision and vacillation"

CHEERING Communications Workers surround President Johnson at CWA convention in Cleveland Public Hall. An audience of 6,000 waved Johnson placards and roared their applause as Johnson made his way to platform for talk asking their support. Next day they voted to endorse his candidacy.

CWA Delegates Set New Goals In Organizing, Contracts, Politics

Cleveland, Ohio—The Communications Workers completed their 26th annual convention here one day ahead of schedule after setting new goals in organizing, collective bargaining and political action.

With membership at an all-time high in 1964, the 1,188 delegates set their sights on organizing the remaining 20 percent of contract-covered workers now in CWA jurisdiction and the many thousands of technical, clerical and other white-collar workers not in any union.

The convention, with all but a few delegates rising to vote, "wholeheartedly" endorsed Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson for election to his first full term. The action came after Johnson, in a personal appearance, asked their help in getting Congress to enact his legislative program on civil rights, relief of the poverty-stricken, extension of minimum wage coverage, and health care for the elderly under social security.

In a final speech, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne said the union, in wage reopening negotiations in the Bell system this fall, will seek "reasonable" wage increases and relief from the "hodge-podge of unwieldy, thoughtless wage zones" now existing in the industry as a relic of an old management policy of "meeting community wage levels"—a practice now outmoded, Beirne asserted.

In other action, the convention:

- Voted to accept a finance committee report raising the per capita dues paid by the locals to the international from $2 a month to $2.50, effective next Jan. 1.
- Urged Congress to hurry action on legislation setting up an automation study commission after a report that 17,000 jobs a year were lost in the Bell system alone during a five-year period when the number of telephones in use increased by more than 16 million.
- Adopted a program for economic action and a legislative program put forward by CWA Vice Pres. John L. Crull with an appeal for "full cooperation" by every member in the AFL-CIO COPE register-and-vote campaign.
- Paid tribute to the memory of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy and heard his last speech to the AFL-CIO convention on sound film.

The convention received a committee report declaring that the "greatest field for organizing" now exists in new groups of technical and clerical workers and that the labor movement must plan to welcome them into membership. Earlier, Beirne had set CWA's membership potential at 1 million.

Sec.-Treas. W. A. Smallwood reported that 1964 was the best COPE collection year in CWA history with $87,362 donated by members of the union in gifts of about $1 each. COPE awards for best performance were awarded to Denver District 8, Local 1301 in Wellesley, Mass., and Local 6222 in Houston, Tex. Some 290 other locals also received awards for reaching or surpassing their quota of $1 donation per member.

The CWA "good citizenship" award for leadership and effort was given to Mississippi State Dir. W. O. Stanley.

The convention gave a rising vote of thanks to delegates from New York Telephone Co. plant locals who defeated a 1964 raid by the unaffiliated Teamsters, and also saluted delegates who won a 150-day strike against General Telephone Co. of California.

State Sen. Frank King, new president of the Ohio AFL-CIO, told the delegates that Ohio labor will go all-out for political action this year and will help set up voter registration centers throughout the state to "elect Pres. Johnson, Sen. Stephen Young" and other endorsed candidates in November.

CWA Delegates Use Phone to Get Floor

Cleveland, O.—Labor reporters at the Communications Workers convention called unique the system the union has developed to enable delegates to get the floor without shouting or waving.

The convention had three floor microphones, clearly labled Motions, Privilege, and Yes or No. Any delegate may pick up a telephone under the nearest microphone, tell the platform clerk who answers what he wants to talk about, and then walk to the appropriate microphone when the chairman calls off his name, local union number and point at issue from a written memorandum.

Delegates also may use the telephone to ask the convention parliamentarian for advice or information on rules of order. To make sure the system works fairly, three rank-and-file monitors are chosen daily to sit on the platform and listen to the calls as they come in.

WCFL Observes 38th Anniversary

Chicago—One of the labor movement's most successful excursions into commercial radio is celebrating its 38th birthday.

WCFL was founded on June 26, 1926 and is owned and operated by the Chicago AFL-CIO.

Featuring music and more sports than any other city station, WCFL has become increasingly popular and powerful, now boasting 50,000 watts.

The station will soon move into new studios in the modern Marina City, nearing completion in downtown Chicago under the sponsorship of the Building Service Employes.

AGVA Picks Johnny Woods For Top Post

New York—Johnny Woods was elected national administrative secretary of the American Guild of Variety Artists at the four-day 17th annual convention.

Woods, who has been second vice president, was chairman of a five-member interim committee which has been administering the union for the past several months.

The convention for the first time chose an assistant national administrative secretary, picking for the post Dick Jones, eastern regional director and also a member of the interim committee. Jay Lester, national board member, was named to Jones' old post and Roy Davis, AGVA New York branch manager, was elected to assist him.

The new post of southeastern region director was created and Ernie Fast, a member of the interim committee and at one time midwestern region director, was elected to fill it.

Margie Coate, national director of sick and relief, was given additional duties as personnel director.

Elected to fill vacancies on the national board were Kathy Kohls of the Denver branch; Ann Terri, San Francisco; Bob Mitchell, Philadelphia, and Carlo Corelli and Milt Moss, New York branch. The top officers headed by Pres. Joey Adams were elected last year for two-year terms.

Rev. Robert Perrella, O.S.M., pastor of Our Lady of Mt. Carmel Church, Watervliet, N. Y., was elected the first national chaplain in AGVA's history.

'Chord of Solidarity'

Dues Increase Voted By AFM Convention

Portland, Ore.—Responding to the leadership of Pres. Herman Kenin, the Musicians wound up the union's 67th annual convention here on a chord of solidarity.

Nearly 1,000 delegates, representing some 175,000 members in nearly 700 locals, voted to raise AFM dues $6 per annum and lifted the ceiling on local initiation fees from $100 to $150.

Approval of the dues increase had the effect of closing the union's ranks against action of orchestra leaders who attacked in the courts a similar increase in per annum dues voted by the 1963 convention.

Kenin and former Pres. James C. Petrillo had lashed out at dissident elements in their convention speeches and had urged passage of the dues increase as a display of majority solidarity.

In another key action, the delegates unanimously upheld an executive board order calling for a merger of white and Negro locals in Chicago. The white Local 10, which has some 11,000 members, did not oppose the merger on principle but raised numerous objections to the implementation plan.

After Petrillo's address, the convention voted to ask him to return to active duty with the union in whatever assignments Kenin deems suitable for his talents. Petrillo said he was deeply moved by the offer but asked time to consider it.

Debate 'Discotheque'

Spirited debate was sparked by the controversial "discotheque" music issue—featuring the simultaneous use of juke box recordings and live musicians. The convention reaffirmed previous policy of letting individual locals decide the issue in their jurisdictions subject to executive board concurrence. Some locals argued it provided employment not otherwise available.

"We're making a deal to play at our own funeral," said a Toronto delegate whose local is opposed to discotheque.

The "Beatles" got brief attention during a discussion of the union's efforts, now supplemented by the government, to preserve work opportunities for U.S. and Canadian musicians. Kenin assured the delegates that a working arrangement now exists to process exchanges across the Canadian border and that new job opportunities have been created abroad on an exchange basis with British musicians.

A key resolution eliminated a constitutional provision which beginning in 1965 would have instituted conventions in alternate years, rather than annually. Minneapolis was chosen as the site for the 1965 convention.

Fiscal Policy

Henry Kaiser, AFM general counsel, discussing the lawsuits attacking the union's fiscal structure, said the dissident orchestra leaders' goal is to buy musicians' services for less pay. He said the locals are free to proceed with their traditional financial policies as directed by the international until and unless the Supreme Court rules otherwise.

Kaiser also reminded delegates that the AFM has never been found guilty of an unfair labor practice or a violation of the National Labor Relations Act.

Job Injuries Rise Above 1963 Rate

Disabling on-the-job injuries in manufacturing occurred at the rate of 11.9 million manhours in the first quarter of 1964, according to preliminary data compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Labor Dept.

The rate is unchanged from the final three months of 1963, but was up from 11.6 in the first quarter of last year. January rates in both months were the same at 11.7. In February 1964 the rate increased 3 percent to 12.1, and in March dropped slightly to 12. The respective rates in 1963 were 11.6 and 11.3.

The report was the first in a new series in which the industry breakdowns conform to the 1957 edition of the Standard Industrial Classification Manual and to the other statistical series maintained in the BLS. All data for 1963 have been retabulated to permit valid comparisons.

4,000 Win Pay Hikes:

Philco Strike Saves Gains of 30 Years

Philadelphia—Improved economic benefits and stabilized working conditions for 4,000 Philco workers have been won by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers after a seven-week strike.

Successful in preserving work rules and conditions won step by step over a 30-year period, members of IUE Locals 101 and 102 ratified a three-year pact with the Philco Corp., now a wholly owned subsidiary of the Ford Motor Co.

The agreement, hailed by IUE Pres. James B. Carey as one that "fortifies the rights of senior employes against layoffs," gives Philco workers these benefits:

- Wage hikes of 3 percent a year and a minimum of 7 cents an hour.
- An increase in pension benefits from $2.25 per year of service to $2.50 immediately and to $2.75 next Jan. 1, with the top figure retroactive for all service years.
- Improvements in life, sickness and accident insurance.
- More safeguards against time standard changes and arbitrary medical examinations.
- Protection for past practice on plantwide seniority, two 15-minute relief periods and other conditions.

The agreement also calls for company payment of hospitalization and surgical insurance premiums for the strike period.

The new contract provides that furloughing of workers will, for the first time, be done on the basis of seniority. At Philco, furloughs—as differentiated from normal economic layoffs—are limited to 10 days a year but the union agreed that the number of times a worker may be furloughed can be increased from four to seven a year.

Another gain was an agreement that workers may not be compelled to work overtime when they offer a reasonable excuse.

'. . . in Dignity and Honor . . .'

A union official summed up the settlement by saying "Philco workers will continue to work in dignity and honor—that is what they fought for and what they achieved."

Local 101 is Carey's home local. Final settlement was achieved after a 16-day stalemate in negotiations when U.S. Mediation & Conciliation Commissioner John R. Murray brought the negotiators back to the bargaining table for a 17-hour session. The union spokesmen included Carey, IUE Dist. 1 Pres. Harry Block, IUE Gen. Counsel Ben Sigal and others.

"It is a good contract for us and for Philco," Block said. "We can both live with it in honor."

Local 101 Pres. Leonard Hinz said the pact "spells out, more precisely than ever before at Philco, policies on seniority, work practices and productivity measurement."

Pres. Stanley Slovitsky of Local 102 declared the contract "achieves job security for our people."

FLOODED TRAILER CAMP at Millard, Neb., home to many union members, was cleaned up by their union brothers with the aid of the Red Cross after heavy rains swamped it. Pres. Robert Danze of the Omaha AFL-CIO, in straw hat at left, and Charles Harvey (on right, pointing), AFL-CIO Community Service Activities staff aide from Des Moines, Ia., who served as a Red Cross advisor, helped direct the work.

Public Affairs Award Given Union Writer

Portland, Ore.—An article on unsavory aspects of a county coroner's office has brought honors to an Oregon Labor Press staff writer and a likelihood of reform to that political institution.

Gene Klare received the American Political Science Association's 1964 award "for excellence in public affairs reporting."

Klare's article in the May 1 issue of the Oregon Labor Press pointed to "unsavory fringe benefits" in the country office, including the method of referring bodies to funeral homes. Multnomah County, which includes Portland, had been exempted from a 1959 reform law.

The article pointed to a need for reforming the department by electing a physician-pathologist as coroner and by placing the office under the state medical investigator.

Klare, who is president of the Portland Newspaper Guild, was a reporter for the Portland Oregonian prior to the Portland newspaper strike in 1959. The Oregon Labor Press is owned by 11 AFL-CIO unions and councils in Oregon.

CSA Department To Move Offices

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Service Activities will be transferred from New York City to the organization's Washington headquarters, Federation Pres. George Meany has announced.

Meany said it is now possible to provide space in the headquarters building for the department, the only national staff department that had not previously been housed there.

Leo Perlis, director of the Dept. of Community Services Activities, and his staff will move to Washington on Aug. 1.

Month-Long Strike Saves Alcoa Jobs

Massena, N. Y.—A month-long strike of 2,400 members of the Aluminum Workers, called to prevent the threatened abolition of the jobs of eight members, ended when the strikers ratified a settlement providing that no jobs will be lost at the Alcoa plant here.

The settlement, worked out at a St. Louis meeting called by Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, permits the reclassification and reassignment of some workers in the union bargaining unit but preserves all jobs and work crews, according to a union statement.

Masena unionists struck May 23 when management declared too many workers were manning the pots used in smelting aluminum and prepared to abolish eight jobs without regard for grievance or arbitration procedures.

Under the settlement, the workload on potroom workers will be substantially the same as before, but one worker per shift will be given a new classification at a wage rate 5 cents higher than his former rate.

The union said it believes the remaining crewmen will not have their workload increased and no one will lose his job. Existing crewmen will continue to work as a team and not be asigned to "float" from one room to another.

The union negotiators were headed by AWIU Pres. Eddie R. Stahl and included representatives from all other Alcoa plants with AWIU contracts. Strikes at the other plants had been scheduled but were called off when negotiations were resumed in St. Louis.

Union Disaster Teams Aid Flood-Hit Regions

Murray McNichols of the Machinists, a member of the Red Cross board who will serve on the Red Cross Disaster Advisory Committee. More than 3,000 man-hours were worked with the end not in sight.

Two AFL-CIO Community Service Activities staff men directed the assistance of union members when more recent floods caused by heavy rains hit the Omaha area of Nebraska. Pres. Robert Danze of the Omaha AFL-CIO named Wallace Nelson, full-time labor liaison man with the Omaha United Fund, to serve as labor coordinator with the Red Cross. Charles Harvey, CSA staff man, was summoned from Des Moines, Ia., to act as Red Cross building advisor.

Trailer Camp Hit

More than 100 union volunteers moved into Millard, Neb., one of the hardest hit areas, where a particularly bad spot was a trailer camp where many union families had had their portable homes.

Water that surged through the camp upset trailers that had to be righted and dragged to higher ground before they could be cleaned of the mud and debris. With the aid of Business Agent Leonard Schaeffer of Laborers Local 1140 and Pres. Frank Vondra of Local 1974, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, three bulldozers, two draglines and nine three-ton trucks were obtained for use in the operation.

The Red Cross located the trailer-homes of those in greatest need and assigned them priorities for righting and relocation. Labor coordinators included Tom Hendrick of the IBEW. Two Red Cross canteens were kept at the site to supply the volunteers and the victims with food and drink during the long days of work.

AFL-CIO aid in the two operations was based on the Statement of Understanding between AFL-CIO Community Services Activities and the Red Cross Disaster Service.

3 Union Heads Named To Sea Advisory Unit

The presidents of three maritime unions and the executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany have been named by Pres. Johnson to a newly created maritime advisory committee.

Labor representatives on the 14-member committee are Pres. Joseph Curran of the National Maritime Union, Pres. Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen, Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers, and Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to Meany.

The committee is an outgrowth of long-standing differences over U.S. maritime policy, which reached a climax in March when the ILA carried out a boycott of Soviet wheat shipments.

The boycott was lifted when the government gave assurances of a thorough re-examination of its wheat shipment policy, the so-called "50-50" law and other maritime problems.

To Consider Policy

In announcing the committee, the White House stated it would "consider such matters of policy and administration of government programs affecting the maritime industry, including policies and practices which may be followed by labor, management or the government for strengthening the trade, national defense, manpower and labor relations programs of the industry."

Chairman of the committee is Sec. of Commerce Luther H. Hodges. Also representing the government is Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

Management members are Joseph Andrea, Humble Oil Co.; H. Lee White, Marine Transport Lines; J. Paul St. Sure, Pacific Maritime Association, and William B. Rand, U.S. Lines.

Representing the public at large are James J. Healy, professor of industrial relations, Harvard University; Lewis A. Lapham, former president of Grace Line and now president of the executive committee of the Bankers Trust Co.; Dean Waldo Malott, former president of Cornell University, and Theodore W. Kheel, New York lawyer and arbitrator.

IUE Fights GE Attack On Wage Incentive Plan

Delegates from 65 local unions of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers have pledged "complete support" of an all-out drive by the IUE to prevent the General Electric Co. from scrapping an incentive system at the Schenectady, N. Y., plant.

The union's protest against the change, which would, it said, cut wages by up to $1.50 an hour for 3,000 of the 9,000 Schenectady workers, was carried by IUE Pres. James B. Carey to Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

Assurances Demanded

The conference board at a Washington meeting denounced the change in a statement saying the GE action would in effect "tear up the contract" negotiated only six months ago and demanded assurances from GE officers that the contract be observed in its entirety or be renegotiated.

The management action "poses a threat to the wage standards of every GE employe covered by a union contract," said the statement, adding that if GE can change the wage payment method and the earnings of members without securing union consent, "not only wages but all other conditions of employment" will be reduced in value.

Earlier Carey had said in a statement approved by the IUE executive board that GE management at Schenectady has "made an outrageous demand upon IUE Local 301 that the incentive system be abandoned and all operations go on daywork."

The Schenectady local has offered to negotiate any rates that are "out of line," the union said. and has proposed alternative programs such as cost-sharing. But, it added, management "once again bargaining by ultimatum, refuses to entertain any modifications of its autocratic demands."

Dates Shifted for Wisconsin Convention

The Wisconsin State AFL-CIO has shifted the date for its 1964 convention to Oct. 6-9. The convention, to be held at Green Bay, was originally set for Oct. 5-8.

BREAKTHOUGH IN SAFETY is the goal of organized labor, John D. Connors, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Committee on Safety & Occupational health, told a Washington meeting of union safety experts. Among those who spoke at the one-day AFL-CIO Conference on Safety was Robert M. Wilkins (right), manager of the National Safety Council's labor department.

Wirtz Asks ILO Stress On Human Resources

Geneva—The worldwide "drive for human dignity cannot succeed without full development of human resources," U.S. Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told the annual conference of the Intl. Labor Organization here.

Addressing the 48th session of the ILO conference, Wirtz observed that "history has taught that unless there is development of a nation's resources for all of its citizens there will be economic discrimination, which leads to social discrimination."

He urged the government, worker and employer delegates to the 110-nation organization to approve a U.S. resolution calling on the ILO "to take the lead" in developing human resources. The resolution calls for a study of work being done in the field by all United Nations agencies, including the ILO, to arrive at a "coordinated strategy."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and the federation's European economic representative, Bert Seidman, are members of the conference committee dealing with the proposal.

In other developments, the entire slate of worker candidates backed by the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions was elected to the conference's key steering committee, despite an attempt by Soviet bloc delegates to bargain for seats on the committee.

Earlier, at the opening plenary meeting, Communist delegates had endorsed the candidacy of Hashim Raza, a Pakistan government official, for the conference presidency. Raza's nomination was withdrawn by the African and Asian delegates, however, who acknowledged Latin America's claim on the presidency under the unofficial "rotation rule."

The conference went on to elect Andres Aguilar of Venezuela as president without opposition. Worker delegates chose British trade unionist Harold Collison as their conference vice president.

At the pre-conference meeting of the ILO Governing Body, U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl of the Machinists was nominated for a three-year term on the board of the ILO's Turin Center for Advanced Technical & Vocational Training. The center at Turin, Italy, will open in April 1965 and provide vocational training for workers from the underdeveloped countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

Shishkin Cites Labor Support For Housing

The AFL-CIO and its unions have given vigorous support to housing programs for low-rent and moderate-income families, Sec. Boris Shishkin of the federation's Housing Committee reported to the Committee on Housing, Building & Planning of the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe.

Representing the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions at the Washington, D. C., meeting, Shishkin described the role of American labor in initiating and helping develop a low rent public housing program for low-income families, and labor's emphasis on cooperative housing for those of moderate income.

He listed the various types of union-sponsored housing projects in this country, and reported on the AFL-CIO's participation in labor-backed housing projects in Mexico, Colombia, El Salvador and other Latin-American lands where the free labor movement of each country has been aided by sister organizations in this hemisphere through the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

The committee held its 25th session in the U.S. capital, Shishkin said, for a first-hand study of American housing programs and American methods of urban planning, building construction and community development.

Roland M. Sawyer, housing consultant for the Steelworkers, is a member of the U.S. delegation on the committee.

Armstrong Locals Ask New Contract

Akron, O.—Four Rubber Worker locals have given the Armstrong Rubber Co. notice of their intent to negotiate new pension and insurance provisions in current contracts. The locals are at Hanford, Calif., West Haven, Conn., Des Moines, Ia., and Natchez, Miss.

If negotiations are not concluded by July 22, the locals will decide whether to give notice of contract termination, URW Pres. George Burdon said. The current agreement was signed in 1959.

3,500 Attend Conferences:

Safety Experts Seek Steps To Stem On-Job Injuries

The problems of protecting workers from becoming victims of today's complex industrial machines and processes occupied the attention of 3,500 labor, management and government safety experts in Washington this week.

In a one-day AFL-CIO Conference on Safety for union representatives and in the President's Conference on Occupational Safety which followed, there was general agreement on a need for broad re-examination of current safety practices, particularly in view of the growing use of new materials, machines and methods.

Speaking before the AFL-CIO conference, Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers said that America's unions are stepping up job safety efforts to turn back a rising tide of work-connected deaths and injuries. Finding the best approach is the first hurdle, he said.

Wharton, who was a conference leader in the AFL-CIO meeting and vice chairman of the President's Conference, said the problems of industrial use of nuclear energy, the rising problems of noise and outdated workmen's compensation laws are major safety issues to be resolved.

"In most states there are a great deal more game wardens to protect animals than there are safety inspectors to protect our citizens," Wharton stated.

The AFL-CIO conference was sponsored by the AFL-CIO Committee on Safety and Occupational Health. Chairman is Richard F. Walsh, president of the Theatrical Stage Employes. Moderator for the conference was John D. Connors, executive secretary of the committee.

In a panel discussion of the Walsh-Healey Act's safety standards, which affect contractors who provide government goods, there was strong objection to "farming out" inspection duties to the states.

"In too many cases state factory inspectors know more about poolrooms than about toolrooms," stated panelist J. George Eichhorn, representative of the Machinists.

The AFL-CIO Conference was also warned of growing radiation dangers to workers. Alan F. Burch, assistant director of research and Education for the Operating Engineers, saw hazards in the trend by the Atomic Energy Commission to turn over more unregulated radioactive materials to the state and in the increased use of radioactive materials by relatively inexperienced persons.

"Radiation machines in a few years," he said, "will be as common as welding machines are today." He noted that thousands are already in use by industries in such tasks as cigarette packaging, food processing and road building, most without any control whatsoever.

The conference was also told of the health hazard from loud and high frequency noises. Michael Wood, coordinator for the Boilermakers, said that deafness has become one of the most widespread industrial hazards in modern technology.

The danger is not in the loud noises alone, he said but also in sustained high frequency sounds, such as the whir of a textile mill.

The level of danger is nearer than suspected, he indicated, pointing out that an average office has a sustained sound level of 50 decibels. A work area where the noise rises to 90 decibels can cause damage if sustained over a period of time.

The magnitude of the problem, Wood declared, is revealed by the $3 billion in claims filed nationally involving industrial hearing loss. "The growing number of claims is indicative of a lack of effective preventive control programs," he said.

Delegates at the opening of the President's Conference on Tuesday were told by Pres. Johnson that "there is a common denominator between your work and mine." His number one job, he explained, is to preserve human safety in the nation and in the entire world.

Among those to address the President's Conference was Pres. Cornelius J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building and Construction Trades Dept., who scored public "apathy and disinterest" in preventable accidents.

The entire nation was shocked by the Alaska earthquake and rushed immediate assistance, he declared, yet by contrast American workers face a far more serious loss of life, injury and property destruction each year which could be prevented by an interest in planned safety.

Haggerty told the conference that little is being done to prevent the continued high accident toll in bridge, dam and building construction.

He urged joint employer-union safety programs, to be recommended to the workers by the union. He also urged pre-job safety conferences where the entire job is mapped out and every participating worker briefed.

PLAQUE OF APPRECIATION for services as safety instructor is given to Jake Gold (left), safety engineer with the U.S. Bureau of Labor Standards. Making the presentation is Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers, in behalf of 18 IUOE representatives who completed the four-week resident safety training program at the AFL-CIO National Safety Training Institute.

Railroad Telegraphers Vote To Hike Per Capita

Miami Beach—Delegates to the Railroad Telegraphers convention approved a $6-a-year increase in the union's per capita tax and adopted a legislative and bargaining program for the United States and Canada.

The per capita increase, effective next year, will boost the payments to the grand lodge from $22 to $28 a year. It was approved with only a scattering of opposition.

In another constitutional change, the convention authorized re-elected Pres. G. E. Leighty to serve his full four-year term. Delegates voted to waive the existing age limitation which would have required him to step down in 1966.

Major resolutions adopted included:

- Endorsement of a bill by Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.) which would have the effect of splitting up the Alfred I. duPont Estate, which controls the struck Florida East Coast Railway.
- Support for legislation in the Canadian Parliament to compensate rail employes adversely affected by automation, closing of stations and abandonment of branch lines.
- A proposal to permit voluntary retirement of rail workers with full pension after 35 years of service regardless of age, and full benefits for wives of retired employes at age 62.
- A call for national negotiations for a supplemental pension plan on the railroads, financed by the carriers.
- Endorsement of hospital care for the aged under social security and railroad retirement programs.
- A proposal for a guaranteed system of annual sick leave on a cumulative basis.

Two new vice presidents were elected, A. Robert Lowry and H. D. Smith, to succeed retiring Vice Presidents R. K. Anthis and J. F. Young. Eight other incumbent vice presidents were reelected.

Delegates approved a recommendation to merge the brotherhood's insurance program into the Woodmen of the World Life Insurance Society.

Community Honors Given UAW Official

Windsor, Ont.—Canadian Dir. George Burt of the Auto Workers was one of six Windsor residents presented with a citation by the Greater Windsor Foundation for "distinguished activity within the community."

School Is 'In' for Trade Union Students

TRI-STATE LABOR SCHOOL brought local union leaders from Virginia, North Carolina and South Carolina together for a week of study covering topics ranging from practical politics to labor law. The school was held at Camp Rockmount in Black Mountain, N. C., one of the first of the 1964 season.

HOURS IN CLASSROOMS were matched by hours spent in preparation for classes. But there was no reason to hunch over a desk with the whole outdoors available.

THIS CLASS is studying "Problems of Unemployment." The instructor is Marvin Friedman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research. Manuals used by the students were prepared by the federation's Dept. of Education. Films supplemented text material.

DISCUSSION CONTINUES during a coffee break as COPE Area Dir. Wilbur Hobby makes a point. In off-hours, as in classes, students learned from each other as well as from their instructors.

FACULTY PLANNING SESSION brings together, from left, William Pollard of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, Sec-Treas. E. T. Kirkland of the South Carolina State AFL-CIO; COPE Area Dir. Daniel A. Powell; George T. Guernsey of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education; COPE Area Dir. Wilbur Hobby; Pres. Harold B. Boyd, Virginia AFL-CIO, and Marvin Friedman, AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

TEAM CAPTAINS prepare for ball game between Virginia and the Carolinas. That's John Lambros of the CWA, Winston-Salem, N. C., and Irving Cosby, Tobacco Workers, Richmond, Va.

GOOD FOOD and plenty of it was among the most popular courses at the Tri-State Labor School. More than two-thirds of the students were attending a full-scale union summer school for the first time. An advanced course was developed for those who had already covered the basic subject matter.

Mississippi's Failure

PRES. JOHNSON sent Allen Dulles to Mississippi to discuss with the governor of that state, Paul Johnson, what Dulles himself described as "problems arising from the law enforcement situation." The President acted after three young civil rights workers—one a Negro, two white—disappeared and their burned-out automobile was found near a swamp.

At a moment when the nation is awaiting final congressional action on the Civil Rights Act of 1964, it can be acknowledged that laws alone cannot change the hearts of men. It is equally true that ranking political leaders of Mississippi have failed most grossly to take the leadership in acknowledging that the time has come for change in racial attitudes, in making it clear that citizens exercising their right to promote human liberty in the state must not be terrorized, beaten, or subjected to other violence.

It is most profoundly to be hoped that the three missing men should be found safe and unharmed. It is regrettable indeed that a Mississippi senator as widely respected as John Stennis should speak of the planned visits of civil rights advocates to the state as an "invasion" of territory "where they were not welcome nor invited."

It is regrettable that Mississippi's citizens have been given the example of a recent governor seeking to bar execution of the court-ordered admission of a Negro into the state university, most regrettable that the possibility of violence against civil rights advocates should be blamed on the visitors, not the violent ones, in a Senate statement that the "blood will be on [their] hands."

Speed in the Senate

SOMETIMES THE SENATE can act with remarkable speed, and it acted with speed when it took up House-passed amendments to the Davis-Bacon Act, approved them on a voice vote, and sent the bill to the White House for signature. It also restored equity to a law that had become to a degree outmoded.

The original law, enacted under a Republican President, required that contractors holding federal government construction contracts pay the prevailing area wage rates as determined by the Dept. of Labor.

Decades have passed, and a great many provisions have been written into union contracts which are in the nature of fringe benefits rather than dollars-and-cents wages. Some provide for pensions, some for health and accident insurance. All of them have value to the workers and may be considered in a sense as deferred wages. The rights of workers to these benefits are enforceable.

But for the determination of Davis-Bacon prevailing wage rates, fringe benefits were not taken into account. The employer without a union contract, without the health and welfare benefits paid by other contractors, had a built-in advantage in bidding on construction contracts. His total labor costs were lower.

This inequity has now been corrected by passage of the amendments. The contractor seeking contracts for federally-financed construction must hereafter pay the prevailing area fringe benefits or add the cash equivalent to hourly pay.

The Senate acted fast—and in the interest of guaranteeing a greater measure of protection to workers.

Rights Debate Finale:

'An Inexorable Moral Force' Carries Mankind Forward

Following are excerpts from closing speeches in the Senate civil rights debate by Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.), Minority Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.), Democratic Whip Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.) and Republican Whip Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.):

SEN. MANSFIELD: This is the first anniversary of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy's submission of the present legislation to Congress . . . Pres. Kennedy asked for a law to provide "reasonable men with the reasonable means" to soothe the nation's racial malady "however long it may take and however troublesome it may be."

The Senate is about to fulfill its responsibilities in the resolution of the most divisive issue in our history. The attainment of this moment, in my judgment, is perhaps of even greater significance than the outcome of the vote itself, for it underscores, once again, the basic premise of our government—that a people of great diversity can resolve even its most profound differences, under the Constitution, through the processes of reason, restraint, and reciprocal understanding.

What has been done in the Senate on the issue of civil rights can and must be done throughout the nation. The differences on civil rights run as deep in this body as elsewhere; but no blood has been shed in this chamber, and blood need not be shed elsewhere.

Like other exceptional accomplishments of this body, this moment is the work, not of one, but of both parties. . . .

SEN. DIRKSEN: The legislative mill . . . grinds slowly but it grinds exceedingly fine. What has happened in "the year that was" is a tribute to the patience and understanding of the country. . . .

The mills have ground before where a moral issue was involved . . . in the field of child labor . . . the Pure Food, Drug & Cosmetic Act . . . the Social Security Act . . . the civil service system . . . the minimum wage. . . .

These are programs that touch people. Today they are accepted because they are accepted as a part of the forward thrust in the whole effort of mankind to move forward.

It required no constitutional change to bring this about, because it appeared there was latitude enough in that document, the oldest written constitution on the face of the earth, to embrace within its four corners these advances for human brotherhood. . . .

In the history of mankind, there is an inexorable moral force that carries us forward. . . . No matter what the resistance of people who do not wish to change, it will not be denied.

It has been long and tedious; but the mills will continue to grind and, whatever we do here tonight as we stand on the threshold of a historic rollcall, those mills will not stop grinding.

SEN. HUMPHREY: Eighty-three days ago, the Senate began consideration of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The longest debate in the history of this body is now about to conclude.

These have been difficult and demanding days. I doubt whether any senator can recall a bill which so tested our attitudes of justice and equity, our abilities as legislators, our sense of fairness as individuals, and our loyalty to the Senate as an institution of democratic government. . . .

For the first time in recent history the Congress of the United States will say in clear and unmistakable terms: "There is no room for second-class citizenship in our country." Let no one doubt the historical significance of this ringing affirmation which we now deliver to the nation and to the world. . . .

So much remains to be done in America. We must bring economic dignity and hope to the lives of the poor, the aged, the homeless, whether Negro or white. . . . The war against poverty and illiteracy must be waged and won.

As we enact the Civil Rights Act of 1964, then, let us be exalted but not exultant. Let us mark the occasion with sober rejoicing, and not with shouts of victory. And in the difficult months ahead, let us strive to preserve our sense of oneness, our attitude of mutual dependency.

SEN. KUCHEL: We have seen in this chamber, during long dreary days of debate, the birth throes of a sublime and endless American ideal.

Just a century ago, this country was torn and trembling by the fire and strife of civil war, but the union survived. What we seek here now, in civil peace, is the full measure of equal dignity for each of our fellow citizens, under the Constitution and before the law. . . .

The sham and shame of unequal justice are about to be sheared away, for they have no place in our American system. This piece of legislation will help to accomplish just that. . . . And all around the world, the American banner of human dignity will stand, bold and resolute, for the doctrine of freedom we preach is the doctrine of freedom we practice.

Morgan Says:

Automation May Give Men Time To Be Human to Other Humans

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

IT HAD TO HAPPEN. An 18-year-old Florida boy has taught an IBM computer, a rather retarded computer at that, how to manufacture poetry. Walt Whitman, Bobbie Burns, the Bard of Avon and other bards of established dimension may not be immediately threatened but I can see technological unemployment looming for those anonymous and hard-working rhymesters in the greeting-card business.

Morgan

What this teen-ager from Tallahassee did, when he should have been out fishing or taunting girls or pursuing some other respectable delinquency, was to feed his machine a limited assortment of nouns, verbs, adjectives, adverbs and phrases. Then he pushed a button. Several things came out including the following lines of free verse:

"Darkly the peaceful trees crashed
In the serene sun
"While the heart heard
The swift moon stopped silently."

Richard Ragan, the mathematical mechanic who fathered these metered expressions, explained a little apologetically that while speed poetry is no problem to his IBM-709—it can do 42,000 additions in a second—the model is really behind the times. There are already other computers which go much faster than that. Ragan, who will be a freshman next fall at Florida State, confesses he is even now thinking of rigging up the memory monster to translate Spanish poetry.

Whatever challenge this may be, I can picture the scene in the stationery stores and gift shops of tomorrow. Instead of rows of birthday and get-well cards in their vertical pigeonholes there will be this streamlined contraption in the corner called, naturally, an Iambic Pentam Meter, in which you drop a quarter and fabricate the sentiment of your vicarious choice.

But why dwell on such fanciful trivia when there are so many other urgent things to talk about ranging from Cyprus to Saigon? The staggering fact is that the computer may conceivably affect your life and mine more markedly than any crisis extant in the world today.

"The electronic computer," said Pres. Ray Eppert of the Burroughs Corp. in an article in a recent issue of Fortune Magazine, "has a more beneficial potential for the human race than any other invention in history."

Its beneficience is not without its threats. Automation, abetted by electronic brains, is replacing human hands and human heads with machines. Production per man-hour is soaring. The critical question is whether the computer will boost the present rate of productivity growth so explosively that our economy won't be able to absorb people as fast as they are displaced.

But there are exciting prospects on the positive side. Bell Laboratories' Richard Hamming says the difference between doing a calculation by hand and by computer is the difference between having $1 and having a million.

THE FORTUNE piece defines a computer as "basically a device for ingesting, judging, and otherwise processing or usefully modifying knowledge. Thus it enlarges brainpower even as other man-made machines enlarge muscle power." The staggering implication is that man's mistakes may now be minimized. ". . . Practically all the wrong decisions over the centuries," says the article, "from Darius' attack at Marathon to the birth of the Edsel, have been at bottom the result of insufficient or inadequately processed knowledge."

But now the computer, as a kind of universal disciplinarian, has already profoundly altered the techniques of science, provided a new basis for the strategies of national defense and has even begun to make government efficient. Although the controversy is intensifying over how much human damage is involved in the readjustment process, Fortune makes the valid point that, while it is often forgotten, "machines immemorially have not merely replaced men, but freed them to do other things. . . ."

"Some talk of the immortal brain," Fortune reports, "or a computer whose external memory store can be expanded indefinitely, to include the wisdom of the ages. This computer would be a paragon of intelligence, able to relate all its stored knowledge accurately, to reason without being corrupted by emotion, to discover new relationships between old things, to solve more of the world's problems than anyone solved before, even to create works of art."

There is something weirdly fascinating and a little mocking about the whole process. Man endows the phrase "deus ex machina" with literal meaning, creating a kind of god in a machine to do the jobs he has failed to do properly himself. And, who knows, relieved of these other burdens, man may have time to smell a flower, read a poem and be human to other humans.

Washington Reports:

Full Foreign Aid Appropriation Predicted When House Votes

REP. OTTO E. PASSMAN (D-La.) will not be able to reduce the $3.5 billion foreign aid authorization approved by the House this year, according to Rep. Clement J. Zablocki (D-Wis.) and Rep. Frances P. Bolton (R-Ohio).

Passman in the past has always been able to bring about drastic cuts in foreign aid appropriations, Mrs. Bolton and Zablocki recalled. But this year the authorization is so close to basic needs he cannot do it, the two members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee predicted in interviews on the AFL-CIO public service program, Washington Reports to the People, heard on 700 radio stations.

"It is my understanding that Rep. Passman will try to cut the bill by half a million dollars to a round figure of $3 billion," said Zablocki. "The question is: Where can he cut? If he cuts the military, how will that affect our commitments to Vietnam? Our committee, at the request of the Executive, added $125 million specifically for Vietnam. Would Otto Passman cut that too?"

Zablocki said the authorization was approved in committee and on the floor without change for the first time in the history of foreign aid "because this was the lowest authorization request the Executive ever made."

"WE ARE FIGHTING Communist aggression and subversion with the cooperation of the people we assist," he declared. "If we had to do this on our own, the cost to the taxpayer would be 10 times as much."

"I think it is unfortunate that we have not been able to get over to the people of this country," Mrs. Bolton commented, "that by helping these other countries to become strong, we are defending ourselves.

"We still hear those ridiculous words, 'You can't buy friendship.' We're not trying to buy friendship. We are trying to make it possible for other countries to share in what we have, freedom and the good things of life."

Mrs. Bolton pointed out that only 1 percent of foreign aid now goes to Europe—all to Greece—and that Western European nations, as well as other countries like Japan and Israel, are now themselves offering foreign aid. West Germany doubled its assistance program this year, Zablocki said.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE BIPARTISAN HEROES in the Senate civil rights battle are so numerous that to cite all of them would be impossible. As a footnote to history—and in grateful memory of the summons to conscience the late Pres. Kennedy gave the nation—six senators should be cited for a special reason. They, too, are bipartisan; five of them are Democrats, one a Republican.

They are the senators from Wisconsin, Indiana and Maryland—three states where Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama shot into the Democratic primaries and rolled up a certain amount of votes, enough to have frightened the fainthearted.

The two Democratic senators from Wisconsin, Proxmire and Nelson, ignored the noises Wallace had made and voted for cloture to shut off the southern filibuster and move to a final vote on the issues. So did the two Democratic senators from Indiana, Hartke and Bayh. And so did the two senators from Maryland, Beall, Republican, and Brewster, Democrat.

All six of the senators—five Democrats and one Republican—voted also for passage of the bill, which is assured of final approval by the House and scheduled for Pres. Johnson's signature at the time the nation is celebrating the anniversary of its Declaration of Independence, its affirmation that all men are created free and equal.

A good many years ago, when John Fitzgerald Kennedy was a first-term Massachusetts senator recovering in a hospital from war injuries that had brought him to the point of death, he occupied his mind and his taste for the essential in American history by writing a book titled Profiles in Courage. It was a book celebrating the particular moments at which famous men—whatever their other deficiencies might be—had stood up on their legs and defied clamor and prejudice among their own constituents, and voted for what they believed the national interest.

Wallace of Alabama got some votes in Wisconsin, Indiana and Maryland, on an anti-civil rights drive that appealed to the worst in voters rather than the best. The six senators vetoed him. They voted their convictions, as they had a right and duty to do, as they were elected to do. Mr. Kennedy would have admired them.

THE ADVOCATES of Sen. Goldwater of Arizona as the Republican presidential nominee have a potent threat—that unless he is nominated a good many of them will withdraw sulking to their tents, that they will sit on their hands in the campaign leading up to the November election.

What shall be said if the senator from Arizona is nominated, as present prospects indicate he will be, with his recent record of having voted against the civil rights bill?

A senator has a right to vote his conscience. But when his conscience directs him to join a small minority in his own party, to reject the beliefs of an overwhelming majority of Republican senators led by Sen. Dirksen of Illinois, the thought inevitably arises that perhaps the "southern strategy" discussed early in the Goldwater campaign has not been forgotten or abandoned.

This "southern strategy" was based on what was felt to be the unpopularity of the late Pres. Kennedy in the southern states on the civil rights issue. It presumed a nomination substantially based on southern delegates to the Republican convention and an attempt to win the election by winning the southern states among others in November.

The issue of conscience and of national obligations would at least be clearly drawn, in southern and northern states, in the agricultural areas and in the great cities, with a Goldwater nomination. It is not to be presumed that 27 Republican senators led by Dirksen voted for the rights bill in defiance of their own consciences. It is not to be thought that Pres. Johnson believed the bill to be unconstitutional, as the senator from Arizona declared he did.

FOREIGN AID as passed by the House has been cut "so close to the bone," Rep. Clement J. Zablocki (D-Wis.), right, stated, that Senate approval without change is assured. Rep. Frances P. Bolton (R-Ohio) predicted that the full amount authorized would be appropriated.

How to Buy:

New Anti-Pollution Detergents Are Safe, Effective and Scarce

By Sidney Margolius

A READER ASKS about a new kind of detergent she has been using, and which, in a few months, most of the rest of us will be buying.

Mrs. John Pasquarello has been buying a "bio-degradable" detergent from a company which sells it house to house at a price of $5 for 14 pounds. This new kind of detergent solves the problem of stream pollution and foaming cesspools caused by older detergents. The bio-degradable detergents are known as "soft" because they break down or "degrade" in the soil or when sewage passes through treatment plants.

In contrast, the standard detergents are called "hard" or non-degradable because most contain a substance which does not decompose readily and thus has caused foaming in household sewage systems and waterways, and even foaming of household drinking water, in some towns.

While Mrs. Pasquarello has found that her wash seems to be as clean when she uses the bio-degradable detergent, and even softer, she is worried that since the product is not widely known, "I may be harming my clothes eventually or affecting my family's health."

She need have no fears. In fact, by the end of 1965 most families will be using the new "soft" detergents. As Beatrice B. Schalet reported in Nationwide Minutes, a group of U.S. senators alarmed by the pollution of waterways in many parts of the country had proposed a law to ban non-degradable detergents. As an alternative, the Soap & Detergent Association offered a voluntary program to change over to soft detergents by December 1965.

The manufacturers said the delay was necessary to be sure of "efficiency, safety and economic practicability", and because of the "billions of pounds of products involved."

However, trade sources have told us that the large manufacturers have agreed to wait until after Jan. 1, 1965, and to introduce the bio-degradable detergent gradually, so as to avoid pushing up the prices of the raw materials.

Meanwhile, some areas already have enacted regulations controlling the use of "hard" detergents to go into effect next year, including Dade County, Fla., and the states of Maryland and Wisconsin.

Too, some smaller producers already have come on the market with a bio-degradable detergent and have been selling it for months. Consumer co-operatives were first on the market with the new type of detergent. Most consumer co-op stores now sell their own brand Co-op Controlled Suds Detergent for $5.98 to $7 for 50 pounds (depending on the distance of store from factory). The co-op price of 12 to 14 cents a pound is a sharp contrast to the 34 cents a pound Mrs. Pasquarello has been paying, and the usual 24 cents for the national-brand detergents which are heavily advertised on television.

A number of other chain supermarkets have introduced their own brands of bio-degradable detergents at prices of as little as half the cost of the national brands. Colgate also is reported to be packing bio-degradable detergent under its AD brand.

The big companies plan to make the changeover quietly. But at least one reason soap makers are moving so slowly, Cooperative News Service says, is that they're unwilling to write off heavy investments in present facilities.

Unfortunately, if the big soap manufacturers make no announcement you may not know whether you are buying a non-degradable or bio-degradable detergent for the rest of this year and 1965.

Nor need you pay any premium price. T. J. Castner, head buyer for Mid-Eastern Cooperatives, reported that the wholesale price of the bio-degradable detergent is the same as for the older hard type.

Women sometimes value a detergent by the amount of suds it makes. High suds, as has been pointed out many times, provide no additional cleaning power. Mrs. Schalet reported that at recent hearings, one U.S. senator asked a representative of Lever Brothers if high suds are really necessary "for good cleaning or will low suds work as well?" The answer was: "We can make detergents work just as well with no suds, but we cannot seem to get anybody to buy them. High suds are not necessary".

As far as the new bio-degradable detergent is concerned, cleaning power seems to be the same if not better, Castner reported.

Expense of Colleges Continues to Go Up

THE COST of a college education continues to increase.

A survey of 92 percent of public and private colleges and universities by the U.S. Office of Education, and of charges for tuition, fees, board and room during the academic year ending in June, showed:

- Male undergraduates attending private colleges and universities paid $1,399 for the two semesters, 5.1 percent more than a year ago. Women paid $1,425 compared with $1,364, an increase of 4.5 percent.
- Male undergraduates attending public institutions outside their own states paid $1,084, nearly 1 percent increase from $1,039 of 1962-63. Coeds were charged $1,042 compared with $1,036.
- Costs for male students in public colleges in their own states jumped 4.2 percent from $758 to $790. Coeds had about the same proportionate increase, from $755 to $784.

Dir. Lawrence Rogin of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education pointed out that each tuition rise deprives many talented students of educational opportunities and that one answer would be passage of a comprehensive federal student aid bill, such as one proposed by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), and a bill to assist servicemen, such as the "Cold War GI Bill" introduced by Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.).

"Real equality in higher education," Rogin declared, can be achieved by adequate state and federal appropriations to permit tuition to be lowered, and by providing classrooms within commuting distance of more students while they live at home.

"A start in this direction," he said, would be to implement a proposal, in a resolution adopted by delegates to the 1963 AFL-CIO convention, guaranteeing "the opportunity for two years of free post-high school education for all American" youths.

In addition to tuition, room and board, costs for clothing, transportation, textbooks and recreation ran between $500 and $1,000, the Office of Education said.

Tuition alone is the same for both sexes though women sometimes pay more for room and board. Students in public colleges in their own states paid only $191, an increase of $21. Students in out-of-state public colleges were charged $449, virtually the same amount as last year. Undergraduates at private colleges saw a $44 increase, from $690 to $734.

Tuition fees were highest in the Northeast, whether the student chose a public or a private college. In that section, tuition at private colleges reached $893. Non-resident students in public institutions paid $598, and resident students were charged $298.

The large number of two-year public colleges in the West and Southwest charging little or no tuition made these areas the most economical for those attending a public institution. Resident students in those areas paid only $141. Non-resident students paid $426.

For those attending a private college, tuition fees were lowest in the Southeast. Median tuition there was $556.

Small but significant differences in the amounts charged men and women for board and room persisted. Women were obliged to pay $249 for lodging and $442 for board in a private institution while the male student was charged only $237 and $428 for the two items.

In public colleges and universities women were charged $381 for board, compared to $389 for men. Dormitory charges, however, favored male students by a slight margin, $199 as compared to $204.

This'd Be a Wonderful World If It Weren't for the Optimists

By Jane Goodsell

NEVER LISTEN to an optimist:

"Oh, let's not bother to make reservations. Motels aren't crowded this time of year, and I'm positive we won't have any trouble getting accommodations. It's so much more fun being footloose and fancy free."

* * *

"Kittens? Don't be ridiculous! How can a male cat have kittens?"

"Say, honey, why don't we invite the Thompsons and the Martins for dinner Sunday night? I'm going salmon fishing on Saturday, and we can't possibly eat a whole Chinook all by ourselves."

* * *

"Yeah, I see the NO PARKING sign, but it'll only take me a couple of minutes to dash into the drugstore, and the cops never come around this neighborhood."

"Hey, Mom, remember when you promised me $5 if I got an A in biology this term? Well, report cards aren't due till next Friday, but I've got that A sewed up tight, and I could sure use that $5 this weekend. Okay, huh? Honest, Mom, I've got that A in the bag!"

* * *

"Honey, will you quit worrying? I know it's a snazzy joint, but I've got almost $15 on me, and dinner for two can't possibly cost more than that. So just relax."

* * *

"What DO YOU MEAN, you're afraid to tell her she can't go to an all-night party after the senior prom? You're her mother, aren't you? You've got a perfect right to lay down the law. Besides, she's a sensible girl, and I'm sure she'll listen to reason if you explain to her that you're thinking of her own best interests."

"Poison ivy? Oh, I'm sure you're mistaken. Poison ivy doesn't look at all like that."

"I've invited Uncle George and Aunt Esther to stay with us when they're in town for Susan's wedding. It's just a gesture, really, because I know they won't accept my offer. What with Uncle George being on a salt-free diet and Aunt Esther having so much trouble with stairs, they'd much prefer to stay at a hotel."

"Naw, don't bother to check the oil. I'm sure it's okay, and I'm in a hurry."

9 More States Affected:

High Court Extends Reapportion Order

The Supreme Court has given further impact to its recent historic "one man-one vote" reapportionment decision by ordering nine more states to elect both houses of their legislatures solely on a population basis.

The court decision brings to 15 the number of states now directed to reapportion on an equitable population basis. The court's follow-up decision will provide greater representation in the state legislatures by residents of the more populous cities and suburbs.

Cases Sent Back

The court acted by referring back to lower courts the nine cases for more proceedings. It is expected the courts will settle the issue on the basis of the Supreme Court's citing of the "equal protection of the laws" clause of the 14th amendment.

States involved are Michigan, Florida, Washington, Ohio, Oklahoma, Illinois, Connecticut, Idaho and Iowa. The earlier cases involved Maryland, Alabama, New York, Colorado, Virginia and Delaware.

Consistent support for the equalization of voting rights has been voiced by the AFL-CIO which, in its 1963 convention, called for apportionment of both houses of state legislatures and the U.S. House of Representatives on an equitable population basis.

In the nine latest cases, the Supreme Court reversed three-judge panels in Florida, Ohio, Illinois, Michigan and Idaho and affirmed their actions in Washington, Oklahoma, Connecticut and Iowa.

Concurrent with its reapportionment decision the court also announced it had denied petitions for review in three labor cases and had let stand decisions of lower courts.

In Realist, Inc., an NLRB election was set aside when the company president told his employes that they did not need a union and that another company had shut down when the same union organized its workers.

Refunds Required

In Houston Maritime Association, Inc., the employer associations, the companies and the union were held jointly liable to reimburse nonunion workers a portion of the money they paid to secure employment through the union hiring hall.

In Shelby County, Tenn., an injunction was allowed to stand against pickets whose signs stated a contractor did not employ union members. The county court held the purpose was to bring about a union shop in violation of Tennessee's so-called "right-to-work" law.

Michigan Court Orders 1 Man, 1 Vote Districts

A check of 1962 election results shows that 1,282,305 Republican votes elected 23 senators while 1,346,782 Democratic votes elected only 11. In the House contests, 1,710,742 Republican votes produced 58 representatives and 2,159,151 Democratic votes elected 52.

Commission Split

The plan approved by the Michigan court was one of six submitted to it by the eight-member bipartisan Commission on Legislative Apportionment. The court assumed jurisdiction, by constitutional mandate, when the evenly divided commission could not agree on a single proposal.

The four Democrats submitted a single plan which the court ruled to be the only one adhering to equal population. Average population for Michigan's 38 Senate districts is 205,895. The Democratic formula has a variance of 2,027 between the smallest and largest districts. For the House—where the average of 110 districts is 71,127—the Democratic plan carries a spread of 3,082.

The five proposals submitted by Republican members of the commission had a population disparity of 71,000 in the Senate and 52,000 in the House.

Romney's charge that the court-ordered plan was weighted to favor Democrats was made earlier by Republican members of the apportionment commission when they appeared before the Michigan Supreme Court. Theodore Souris, one of the justices joining in the 6-2 opinion, dismissed that argument with the statement that "the claim of political gerrymander significantly is unsupported by even the barest allegations of fact."

The governor previously had argued that advocacy of equal representation was "an extremist viewpoint" and that "the one man, one vote proposal is just not suited to Michigan." As a vice president of the 1961-62 Michigan Constitutional Convention, Romney had co-authored the districting proposals which now have been ruled in violation of the 14th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Victory for Labor

Monday's double-barreled court rulings were of special significance to the labor movement here because they successfully climaxed long legal battles waged by Michigan AFL-CIO Pres. August Scholle. It was his 1963 suit challenging legislative provisions of the new Michigan constitution on which the U.S. court ruled.

In similar litigation in 1959 Scholle went to court to protest the districting provisions of the state's former constitution under which present senatorial districts have a population disparity of 600,000. He won a favorable ruling in 1962 but Republicans won a stay of execution.

Date of Michigan's primary election had been moved back from Aug. 4 to Sept. 1, in anticipation of new apportionment guidelines.

Goodyear Workers Pick URW at Logan

Logan, O.—Employes at the new Logan plant of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. have chosen the Rubber Workers as collective bargaining representative by a margin of nearly 2 to 1.

The vote in the representation election conducted by the National Labor Relations Board was 142 to 86 in favor of the union, URW Pres. George Burdon reported. About a year ago Goodyear transferred production of automotive crash pads here from its Akron plant.

1963 Median Income Hits All-Time High

The median income of U.S. families jumped 5 percent, or $293, to an all-time high of $6,249 between 1962 and 1963, the Census Bureau has reported on the basis of a population survey conducted last March.

At the same time the number of families under the Johnson Administration's "poverty line" of $3,000 declined 1 percent. Not all of this increase in income constituted a gain in purchasing power, as the cost of living went up about 1 percent during the year, it was noted.

The "median" income is the halfway point, with the incomes of an equal number of families or persons above and below. The survey was conducted among the noninstitutional population and members of the armed services living off-post or with their families on-post in the United States. The study covered cash income only before tax deductions.

The number of families with incomes of $7,000 or more increased by about 10 percent, or 2 million, from the previous year and accounted for 42.4 percent of the country's 47.4 million families, the Census Bureau summary showed.

At the other end of the economic scale 8.8 million families or 18.5 percent of all families, had incomes in cash of less than $3,000 in 1963. This was about 500,000 fewer than the year before.

Incomes between $3,000 and $5,000 were reported by about 8.4 million families, or 17.7 percent, while 21.3 percent, or 10.1 million families, had incomes between $5,000 and $7,000.

Men Higher Paid

The median income of male heads of families was $6,561 and of families headed by women was $3,211. Families in which both husband and wife worked had median income of $7,789. Those with non-working wives averaged $6,039.

A median of $6,935 was reported for families whose heads were employed. Largest family income in this group was $13,302 and was earned by self-employed heads of families. Medians for family heads in other job classifications included: salaried managers and officials, $6,895; craftsmen and foremen, $7,367; and laborers, $5,081.

By industry, the breakdown for families with employed heads last year included: finance, insurance and real estate, $8,222; public administration, $7,709; professional and related services, $7,635; manufacturing, $7,495; and wholesale trade, $7,407.

The median income for white families in 1963 was $6,548, or $7,644 where the head had a full-time, year-round job. Comparable medians for Negro families were $3,465 and $4,847, respectively.

Fish Industry Workers Ask Federal Aid

A special Washington legislative conference of fish and cannery workers has called upon the federal government to take a direct interest in the depressed American fishing industry.

The decline in fishing, an increase in "runaway" canneries and a lack of governmental interest in the industry were cited by the conferees as among problems facing the American fisherman.

The conference represented 10,000 fish and cannery members of the Seafarers on all coasts.

Fish Consumption Up

Lester Ballinger, of San Diego, Calif., chairman of the two-day conference, reported to delegates that the consumption of fish products in the United States had doubled in recent years but had benefited only foreign fisheries. "Executive and administrative action" by the government could do much to reverse the situation, he said.

Throughout the world, Ballinger declared, fishing is a vastly expanding industry. In the U.S. every effort possible will be necessary to "foster, expand and improve American fisheries" and protect the jobs of workers involved.

The conference was the first national gathering of the industry group and followed a series of regional meetings to coordinate legislative and organizational activities.

Canada's Joblessness Dips to 293,000 in May

Ottawa, Ont.—Mid-May unemployment in Canada totalled 293,000, a rate of 4.2 percent of the labor force of 6,901,000.

The figure was 110,000 less than in April and 53,000 fewer than in May 1963. The improvement, in all regions and applying to both farm and non-farm jobs, was attributed to seasonal factors.

Pennsylvania Labor Attacks Radio 'Gag'

Harrisburg, Pa.—The Pennsylvania AFL-CIO has filed charges with the Federal Communications Commission that a Williamsport radio station failed to provide "fair and balanced" programming during the unemployment compensation battle in the state legislature earlier this year.

Pres. Harry Boyer of the state AFL-CIO asked that an investigation and hearing be held on his charge that Station WRAK had flatly refused to provide broadcast time for the labor movement to answer a "bombardment" of spot announcements by a "Jobs for Pennsylvanians Committee" in favor of the bill.

He charged that the station's refusal was a violation of the FCC "fairness doctrine," which provides that where a station's facilities are used to broadcast a controversial issue they must be given to spokesmen of opposing views, at no charge.

"While the state's entire labor movement—more than 1 million members—was united in opposition to the unemployment insurance revision bill," Boyer stated, "we had to remain virtually silent while an anonymous well-financed committee bombarded the airwaves."

He said the charge was not directed at the station's news broadcasts. The issue, he stated, is that "Station WRAK and more than 100 radio stations in the state were broadcasting hundreds and hundreds of paid announcements by the 'Jobs for Pennsylvanians Committee' while opponents were being given no opportunity for rebuttal except by purchasing time."

Boyer told the commission that the complaint was of vital importance because the bill—which was passed by one vote—involved millions of dollars in jobless benefits and will be an issue in the forthcoming election. Boyer also said repeal of the measure would be sought in the next session of the legislature.

"Action is necessary," Boyer noted, "so that in the future there will be a clear understanding of a licensee's obligations to the listening public."

Gamser to Head Mediation Board

The three-member National Mediation Board has named member Howard G. Gamser as chairman for the fiscal year beginning July 1. He succeeds Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., under a board policy of rotating the chairmanship. The third member is Leverett Edwards.

The board deals with labor-management relations affecting 1.25 million workers and all employers in the airline and railroad industries affected by the Railway Labor Act.

Gamser was appointed to the board in early 1963 after serving as chief counsel of the House Education & Labor Committee. Previously he served with the National Labor Relations Board, the Wage Stabilization Board and the New York State Board of Mediation.

PRINTED MATERIAL of interest to older people was distributed by the Will County, Ill., Labor Council from its booth at a Senior Citizens Forum in Joliet sponsored by the Social Security Administration office. It was handed out by (left to right) Pres. Cornelius Craig, Trustee Michael Juricic and Vice Pres. Arthur McGrath of the local AFL-CIO and Henry Errek, a member of the executive board.

Grass-Roots Aid Plans Seen Asia, Africa Need

Unity House, Pa.—The importance of concrete, small-scale projects that can register improvement at the grass-roots level in aid programs for developing nations was emphasized by Mrs. Maida Springer of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs at a weekend conference sponsored by the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut.

Mrs. Springer recounted some of her experiences as a representative of the AFL-CIO in Africa before some 250 union members from eight states who undertook to analyze the role of organized labor in the economic and social life of democratic nations.

In a keynote address Leon H. Keyersling, former chairman of Pres. Truman's Council of Economic Advisers, called Histadrut, the Israel labor federation, a "counterforce to the traditional economics" of this century. He credited it with much of the responsibility for shaping the democratic and cooperative features of the country, and predicted it will play an increasingly important role as it becomes more affluent.

Keyserling suggested that Histadrut is "needed" as an example for workers in the developing nations of Asia and Africa because they are alike in many respects.

Ben-Zion Ilan, Histadrut's special representative in America, called for "unconditional war against poverty around the world." He gave some details of the help Histadrut has given to the training of Asian and African union leaders, officials and students, and declared that "the training of indigenous leadership must remain a focus of international assistance."

Charles S. Silberman, author of "Crisis in Black and White," said the United States could learn much about helping Negro youngsters by studying the Israeli education system, which is designed to help acculturate immigrants in a single generation.

Other speakers included Vice Pres. Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers, at whose summer resort the conference was held; Dr. Ralph Patai, research director of the Herzl Institute, and Lewis Carliner of the Auto Workers. Chairmen of the sessions were Pres. Herrick S. Roth of the Colorado AFL-CIO; Sec. Morris Iushewitz of the New York City AFL-CIO; ILGWU Vice Pres. Moe Falikman and Pres. Sam Meyers of UAW Local 259.

School Film Project Gives Labor's Case

Cincinnati, O.—The Cincinnati AFL-CIO has completed showing the AFL-CIO educational film, "In Common Brotherhood," in the city's eight public high schools and is highly pleased with the success of the project.

Plans for screening the movie were developed, said Pres. Al Bilik of the local AFL-CIO, after labor council officials observed the success of comparable films shown under the auspices of business groups.

"Unfortunately," he said, "we in labor had not taken full advantage of the opportunities available to us through which to present a true picture of our goals and activities to the general public."

First move toward the showing was made last December when Bilik and Public School Supt. Wendell H. Pierce arranged for a preview of several AFL-CIO educational films by three of the school system's audio-visual experts—Secondary Education Dir. Ralph Shauck and Helen Yeager and Jean Tilford, supervisors of social studies for secondary schools.

After each session the students who had viewed the film were encouraged to ask questions of the union group.

"I think this kind of labor presentation rather than 'Joint Council for Economic Education' type approaches," Bilik said, "is the better way for us to compete with the efforts of organized business to get our message into the schools."

Comprehensive, Government-Financed:

Royal Commission Proposes Canadian Health Care Plan

Ottawa, Ont.—A Royal Commission on Health Services, after three years of study, has proposed a comprehensive, government-financed plan that promptly won the tentative endorsement of the Canadian Labor Congress.

The commission's report, which ran to 914 pages, was the first of three planned on the subject.

Its proposal would cover all hospital, doctor and drug bills; free dental and optical care for children up to 18; fluoridation of all community water supplies; special measures to deal with drug addiction, alcoholism and mental illnesses; a prosthetics program and insurance to meet the cost of outpatient services.

It would protect all Canadians regardless of age, residence or ability to pay.

"While it has been impossible for us to make a detailed study of the initial report," commented CLC Sec.-Treas. Donald MacDonald, "it is apparent that the main recommendations are of a nature that warrant the support of our organization. We devoted considerable effort to the preparation and presentation of a brief to the commission, and we are naturally pleased to find the opinion of the commissioners was in a number of instances in agreement with ours.

"There will undoubtedly be some opinions of the commission on which we will have reservations; but we will refrain from making any criticism until we have had an opportunity of studying the report in detail."

The report suggested that the provincial governments administer the proposed program and split its cost with the federal government. It listed a number of possible ways of financing it, including provincial lotteries.

The commission pointed out that Canadians spend about 6 percent of gross national product on health care, including capital expenditures, medicines and education. The cost to most western nations, it added, runs between 4.5 percent and 5.5 percent.

It estimated that by 1971 the cost of the present system "with all its limitations and inadequacies," would be about $178 per person, or $4.015 billion annually. The commission said its program would boost the cost by about $20 per person, or $446 million more. Canada can afford this, it said.

The commission noted a shortage of personnel to make its program work and recommended that training and hospital construction be stepped up sharply, with increased government assistance to doctors in training. It foresaw a need for 7,100 more physicians, 2,130 more dentists, 42,000 more nurses and 60,000 additional hospital beds by 1971.

Freedom of Choice

Patients would have freedom of choice among physicians under the plan, and physicians would be free to accept or reject patients except in emergencies. Payment would be on a fee basis.

MacDonald said the CLC was "very happy" that the recommendations go beyond medical care. The commission's finding that Canada can afford such a program, he said, "cuts the ground from under the feet of some of the strongest opponents."

"The opinion of the CLC, and many other organizations and individuals, that voluntary systems are entirely inadequate has now been confirmed," he added. "The commission's rejection of any form of means test is to be commended.

"We hope there will be no delay in moving toward the implementation of the major recommendations. . . . It should be remembered that the faster adequate health service is provided, the faster thousands of Canadians now suffering from ill health will receive some measure of relief."

Supreme Court Justice E. M. Hall headed the six-member commission. It was established under the Conservative government of former Prime Minister John Diefenbaker, now leader of the opposition.

Scranton Picks Up Lodge Support, Hits Goldwater Vote on Rights Bill

in regard to the war in Vietnam. Lodge said bluntly that he was leaving his post in order to "help" Scranton, and that there were no "hidden meanings."

A movement of state delegations toward casting first-ballot votes for "favorite sons," such as Gov. James A. Rhodes of Ohio and Sen. Thruston Morton of Kentucky, developed as Scranton carried his campaign into additional states in an effort to overcome Goldwater's long lead.

The Delaware delegation decided to support Sen. John J. Williams on the first ballot. Scranton was credited in a New Jersey visit with having checked an immediate swing toward Goldwater, and Pennsylvania's governor flew to Florida in an effort to pick up delegates from a group with grievances from a primary contest.

Gov. George W. Romney of Michigan, who assailed Goldwater's presumed views in a bitterly-worded statement at the recent Governors' Conference in Cleveland, met with the delegations from Missouri and Kansas in an effort to check first-ballot support that might give the senator a speedy victory in the convention.

Lodge is a former Republican senator from Massachusetts, elected both before World War II and after he had completed military service during the war, and was vice presidential nominee with Richard M. Nixon in 1960.

Pres. Johnson, to whom Lodge's resignation from Saigon was submitted, promptly named a high-powered team of Gen. Maxwell Taylor, until now chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as ambassador, with one of the State Dept.'s ranking experts in Asian affairs, U. Alexis Johnson, as deputy ambassador.

The immediate issue in Scranton's campaign was whether he could pull enough delegates away from Goldwater on early ballots to allow a full-scale battle to be waged on both the party's platform and its presidential candidate.

Goldwater was one of only six Republican senators who voted against passage of the Senate civil rights bill, with the remaining 27 recorded in favor of it. In a Senate speech Goldwater said that his conscience did not permit him to support the public accommodations and fair employment sections, and his statement was answered by Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen, the GOP floor leader who had played a major part in drafting the legislation to win maximum support from other Republicans.

Scranton said in a press conference that in view of his civil rights bill vote he did not see how Goldwater in "conscience" could accept a Republican platform that expressed support of the measure Dirksen and the GOP majorities in both houses of Congress helped pass.

In another political development, Attorney Gen. Robert F. Kennedy announced that he would not seek election to the Senate in New York, where if named as the nominee he would have run against incumbent Republican Sen. Kenneth Keating.

Quebec Approves Canadian Pension

Quebec, Que.—The last barrier to introduction of the Canada Pension Plan in Parliament was cleared away when the Quebec Legislative Assembly voted 48-0 to amend the British North America Act to give the federal government authority to give benefits to widows, orphans and the disabled.

Bus Walkout Wins Package Of 35.7 Cents

Los Angeles—Bus drivers for the Metropolitan Transit Authority staged an eight-day strike here to win a package of improvements totaling 35.7 cents an hour over a three-year period.

Members of four lodges of the Railroad Trainmen, representing 2,500 workers, returned to work June 22 after ratifying the new pact. They won wage hikes of 26 cents an hour, including 10 cents retroactive to June 1; paid sick leave ranging from four to 10 days, based on length of service; employer-paid group life insurance; and improved vacations to a maximum of five weeks a year after 25 years of employment.

The transit authority agreed to increase the supplementary retirement benefit from $70 to $100 and to permit voluntary retirement at age 62.

The base rate for drivers, now $2.77 an hour, will rise during the term of the contract to $3.03. A union spokesman said an additional $3 million will go into pay envelopes over the life of the agreement and nearly $2.5 million into other benefits.

The authority transports some 500,00 passengers a day in 1,346 buses serving Los Angeles, Orange, Riverside and San Bernardino Counties. Its contract with the BRT will be taken over Aug. 22 by the Southern California Rapid Transit System, successor to the MTA.

The strike settlement was achieved after a stalemate when Gov. Edmund G. "Pat" Brown (D) called the parties back into session with State Industrial Relations Dir. Ernest Webb. BRT General Chairman Don H. Sheets and Vice Pres. W. G. Parks, in charge of the union's bus division, headed the BRT bargainers.

Toronto Engravers Win 4.5-Day Pact

Toronto, Ont.—The Photo Engravers won a pioneering 4.5-day week and wage increases totaling $21 weekly in a new five-year contract with Toronto's two major commercial printing firms.

The cut in the workweek will be made in two stages. The present 35-hour week will drop to 33.5 hours on Nov. 1, 1966, and to the 21-hour, 4.5-day week on Nov. 1, 1967. Night staffs will work a 30¾-hour week.

Wages rise $5 weekly in each of the first three years of the contract term and $3 each of the last two, the present scale being $153.

2,000 Counselors Sought:

Crash Program Set To Aid Jobless Youth

A nationwide plan to train 2,000 men and women as shock troops for an attack on the problems of unemployed youth has been launched by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

After intensive recruitment and training as counselor aides and youth advisors, they will staff youth opportunity centers for assisting young people without skills or jobs which Wirtz described in testimony before the Senate Labor Committee on Pres. Johnson's anti-poverty bill.

The crash program is necessitated by a shortage of qualified personnel. Eligible for training are college graduates or those with experience in counseling, psychology, sociology, education, the social sciences, social work or related fields, and who are at least 21 years of age. They will receive eight weeks of training, beginning July 13, in some 20 universities and colleges in all parts of the country, and must be unemployed at the time training starts.

Wirtz appealed to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler for aid in finding volunteers. "Your help in getting people to apply who have empathy for and collegiate training or experience in services for disadvantaged youth would be deeply appreciated," he said in a telegram detailing the recruitment program.

Unemployment among teen-agers has been high for years and is expected to worsen as postwar "baby boom" children grow up and enter the labor force. In May, 1.1 million of them were jobless. Their unemployment rate was 15.9 percent, compared to 3.6 percent for adult men and 5 percent for women. It was down slightly from April's 16.2 percent, but Labor Dept. experts did not regard the improvement as significant. Another 300,000 are scheduled to join the labor force as schools close this month and next.

'Only a Start'

Wirtz emphasized that the crash program is only a start toward filling a need for 31,000 full-time advisors and counselors in the next three years—25,000 in public schools, 5,500 in Federal-State Employment Service offices, and 600 for rehabilitation counseling.

Funds for financing the program are coming from Manpower Development & Training Act appropriations. Tuition, room and board, and transportation to and from the college may be paid, and trainees may earn $15 weekly by participating in on-the-job training programs.

The proposed youth centers in which the trainees would work, Wirtz said, will be established in employment service offices in each of the 100 or more labor market areas. Smaller communities will be served by mobile units.

The aides and advisers will work under the direction of trained specialists and will interview youths with the aim of ascertaining their talents and limitations; test them for exact evaluation of aptitudes, and advise them on how to find a job or get additional training.

Referrals would come from schools, draft boards when prospective servicemen are rejected for reasons of education, social agencies and agencies working with young people.

In his testimony before the Senate Labor Committee, Wirtz said that every "undereducated, undertrained youth from a poverty background entering into our work force today will cost us approximately $30,000 in various kinds of welfare payments in the course of his life."

Human Waste Seen

"Either we help the youth or we support the adult," he said in supporting the anti-poverty bill.

"We are right now, at a time of record prosperity, adding between 250,000 and 300,000 boys and girls to a human waste heap every year."

The work and training programs proposed in the bill, he said, would help between 300,000 and 400,000 boys and girls each year. A job-study program would help students who might be forced to quit school for economic reasons, and a job corps would provide training and work camp experience.

Wirtz made what he called a "rash commitment" to put 150,000 young men and women to work in Neighborhood Youth Corps projects within two months of the time funds are appropriated for the programs set up in the bill.

When hearings were held on the bill in the House, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany testified before a Labor subcommittee and urged Congress to pass it "speedily."

He called its proposals "an important step forward," but warned that they "will not end poverty in America." The "real answer," he maintained, is "jobs at good wages for every American who is able and willing to work," emphasizing universal coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act and an increase in the minimum wage to $2 an hour.

Rights Debate Longest In Legislative History

The Senate's civil rights debate was the longest in the nation's legislative history—from Mar. 9 to June 19.

During this period, the Senate was in session for 83 days and talked for 736 hours and 10 minutes about the bill. The debate filled 2,890 pages of the Congressional Record.

It took 17 days—until Mar. 26—for Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) to get a vote on his motion to make the House-passed bill the pending business of the Senate.

On June 10—the 75th day of debate—the Senate took the decisive step to force the bill to a vote. For the first time in history, cloture was invoked to break a filibuster against a civil rights bill. The 71-29 vote was four more than the two-thirds majority required to limit debate.

With talk rationed to one hour per senator, the Senate rapidly voted down most of the 119 amendments put to a vote in the final days. Finally, at 7:40 p.m. on June 19, the debate was over, the roll was called for the last time, and the bill was passed, 73-27.

construction contracts over a contractor who does provide such benefits for his workers."

Under the new legislation, which takes effect gradually over a year, the Secretary of Labor is instructed to include in prevailing wage determinations the area pattern of employer costs for benefits, including medical or hospital care; pensions; life, disability, and sickness and accident insurance; vacation and holiday pay, unemployment benefits, and apprenticeship or similar training programs. Other benefits may be included if they are the pattern in the area.

If benefits are not matched in kind, their cash value is added to the hourly wages for straight time, although not overtime, work.

Although the bill had strong bipartisan support, two members of the Senate Labor Committee—Senators Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) and John G. Tower (R-Tex.)—filed a minority report objecting to any liberalization of the Davis-Bacon Act unless the Secretary of Labor's wage determinations were made subject to judicial review.

No effort was made to attach a judicial review amendment when the bill reached the Senate floor, however. The House had beaten down such an amendment, 297-105.

The bill had been sponsored in the House by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.). Its Senate sponsors included Democratic Whip Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.) and Republican Whip Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.).

Humphrey told the Senate that the existing law was "an open invitation to outside contractors to bring low wages and cheap labor into higher wage communities because these lower labor costs give them a successful bidding advantage on government work."

The same type of bipartisan leadership, Meany said, had been shown earlier in the House by Representatives Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) and William M. McCulloch (R-O.), "who rose above party rivalry in order to serve the national interest."

He said congressional unity stemmed in turn from "the unity represented by the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights," in which the AFL-CIO, the NAACP and other civil rights groups wielded "a force for progress which has few parallels in the annals of our country."

"More than a law is needed," Meany said, to apply the principles of equality to "the daily life of the nation. . . . There must be from this point on a far more intensive effort, in every phase of community life, to build new bridges of understanding, so that the law reflects the affirmative will even of those who feared it."

The civil rights battle was not waged, he stressed, "to win equal rights to unemployment, or an equal distribution of poverty."

Full opportunity requires "jobs at good wages for all," he declared.

"We in the AFL-CIO are deeply dedicated to the full realization of equality in America," he added. "Therefore we call upon all who joined in the great campaign to enact the civil rights bill to join with equal fervor in a broader campaign that is essential for its final accomplishment."

Study Shows Workers Change Jobs Frequently

A new Labor Dept. study indicates that the average U.S. worker will change jobs six or seven times during his working life and may need retraining at any age.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said previous studies have indicated that job mobility is highest in younger workers and that job stability increases as the worker gets older.

The new study, entitled "Job Changing and Manpower Training," highlights a finding that a 55-year-old worker can be expected to stay on one job for an average of seven years—about 1.5 years longer than a man of 20.

In view of this latter finding, Wirtz said, "training an older man for a particular job may provide him with as many years of profitable employment on that job as similar training would provide for a younger worker."

Because the average 20-year-old male worker will change jobs frequently during an average 43 years of working life, the study showed, he will need two types of training during his career:

- Broad and general training in the beginning to provide enough flexibility to meet changing job demands.
- Frequent retraining to meet changing industrial and business processes as old skills become obsolete and new skills are needed.

The report also notes that the average job-life expectancy for a 35-year-old worker is about eight years—2.5 years longer than for 20-year-olds; and that men past 35 usually require more intensive and specific training than younger men because they usually cannot fit into typical beginners' jobs, nor do employers want to hire them if they cannot assume full responsibility on a job.

Other conclusions:

- The average worker at 20 can be expected to spend about 5.5 years on each job during the rest of his working life. However, at least a sixth of the present younger workers will probably stay on the job for more than 20 years.
- A large proportion of men 50 to 55 years of age—12 percent—had begun their current jobs in 1962. Most of those in this age group had been in the labor force for at least 30 years. Some work in occupations where short-term jobs are typical; others have lost a long-term job, and another group may be considered chronic job-changers who cannot find stable employment, the report said.

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Rights Bill Passage

Stage Set in House:

Foreign Aid Funds Face Fight on Floor

A sharp battle within the House Appropriations Committee set the stage for a floor fight over the Administration's foreign aid money bill pitting budget-cutting Rep. Otto E. Passman (D-La.) against the committee's new chairman, Rep. George H. Mahon (D-Tex.).

Mahon won the first round as Passman's subcommittee on foreign aid voted 7-5 against his motion to slash $515 million from the $3.5 billion aid request.

The subcommittee cut some $200 million from the bill but Passman, denouncing the reduction as "only token," stalked angrily out of the meeting and said he will step down temporarily as subcommittee chairman in order to fight for a deeper cut on the House floor.

It was Passman's first rebuff in the nine years he has headed the subcommittee and he exited with a blast at Pres. Johnson, whom he accused of having "worked tricks you couldn't even see in the circus" to prevent deep cuts in the bill.

Mahon, unlike the late Clarence Cannon (D-Mo.) who had shared Passman's opposition to foreign aid, challenged Passman in his own subcommittee and put together a majority of six Democrats and one Republican to resist the slash. Later the full Appropriations Committee approved the bill in a second rebuff for Passman.

Meanwhile, as the Senate Foreign Relations Committee continued hearings on the basic authorization bill—which sets a ceiling on the money which can be appropriated—the AFL-CIO reiterated its support for an aid program larger than the Administration asked.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said a "far greater" program is needed "to help others to help themselves and to win the cold war."

In a statement to the committee, he urged expansion of programs for economic development and technical assistance and a greater emphasis on help to "people's organizations" of farmers, workers and other democratic groups.

Biemiller also urged the committee to follow the example of the House and reject provisions in the Administration bill which would allow the dismissal or "selection out" of employes of the Agency for Intl. Development without regard to civil service regulations and appeal rights.

Labor Backs Full Budgets For Agencies

The AFL-CIO has asked the Senate to appropriate the full amount requested for the Labor Dept., the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and the National Labor Relations Board.

Cuts made by the House should be restored, Legislative Rep. Kenneth A. Meiklejohn urged a Senate Appropriations subcommittee.

"Too often," Meiklejohn said, "Congress has authorized programs subsequently stultified and hamstrung through the denial of sufficient appropriations."

It is "especially important," he said, "that the manpower training, education and health programs authorized by the last session of Congress be allowed to operate at full capacity."

Among the cuts which Meiklejohn urged be restored were $83 million chopped from the manpower training and development program, $1.25 million cut from the National Labor Relations Board budget, and $4 million cut from the amount authorized for the day care center program administered by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

"The need for these programs is so great that any doubts on this score clearly must be resolved in favor of larger, rather than smaller, sums," the AFL-CIO spokesman said.

Parley Maps Citizen Drive On Poverty

A preliminary national conference in Washington has laid the groundwork for the formation in September of a citizens' group working in the anti-poverty program.

Some 150 leaders attended the one-day organizing meeting. They represented labor, church, civil rights, education, social welfare, civic, women, student, rural and other groups.

The conference materialized out of a message last April from Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther to hundreds of well-known citizens across the nation.

Reuther said Pres. Johnson's declaration of war on poverty has won commendation, "but it is clear that government cannot do the job alone."

The one-day founding meeting approved a Temporary Planning and Program Committee. This group has the task of developing a structure for the new organization and formulating a policy and program for the September conference.

ENTHUSIASTIC WELCOME from thousands of union members greeted Pres. Johnson on recent trip to San Francisco. The cheers and placards were part of California's massive greeting to the President.

House Votes Mass Transit Aid; King-Anderson Bill Sidetracked

made the motion to defer action on his bill because, he said, "we didn't have the votes" to pass it. King expressed the hope that the Senate will attach a health care plan to separate social security legislation and that the House would then approve it.

Benefits Up 5%

After putting aside health care legislation, the committee then agreed on an across-the-board 5 percent increase in all social security old age and survivors benefits. This would be financed by raising the wage base on which social security taxes are paid to $5,400 from the present $4,800 and making slight adjustments in the tax rate.

Included in the bill is a provision to include tips as income for social security purposes. Presently, although workers must report tips as taxable income, they do not receive social security credit towards retirement benefits.

A continued drive to enact social security hospital insurance this year was pledged by Pres. John W. Edelman of the National Council of Senior Citizens.

"An increase in social security cash benefits—while long overdue—is not an acceptable substitute for paid-up insurance against the unpredictable costs of medical care," Edelman declared.

The mass transit bill, urged on Congress by the late Pres. Kennedy in 1962 and 1963 and listed as a "must" bill by Pres. Johnson this year, had to overcome heavy opposition from Republicans and Democrats from rural areas.

Bottled Up in Rules

It passed the Senate by a 52-41 vote in April of 1963, and was cleared by the House Banking & Currency Committee a week later. The bill then languished in the Rules Committee for more than a year. Administration leaders made no effort to bring it to the floor until they were able to count the votes needed for passage.

The original proposal for $500 million federal grants over a three-year period—on a two-for-one ratio of federal to local or state funds—was trimmed in both the House and Senate to $375 million. The House bill does not include a Senate provision authorizing the federal government to guarantee up to another $375 million in revenue bonds issued by local governments to finance transit programs.

In urging House approval, the Banking & Currency Committee said the need to improve commuter transportation has "outstripped state and local resources" and "spilled over the boundaries" of cities and counties.

The AFL-CIO, while strongly supporting action to improve transit facilities, had warned in a 1963 convention resolution that it could not support any bill which did not protect the rights and benefits of transit employes.

Workers Protected

One of the major improvements made in the labor-supported amendments added to the bill extended to local transit workers the job and income protection provided to railroad workers in the event of merger.

In other congressional developments:

- The Senate Banking Committee sidetracked the truth-in-lending bill sponsored by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), which had both Administration and labor backing. By an 8-6 vote, the committee sent the measure back to subcommittee for further study.

Douglas has battled for more than four years for enactment of legislation requiring lenders and sellers to disclose interest and credit charges in simple, understandable language. He branded the committee's action "a victory for the usurers and money lenders."

- On largely party-line votes, the House approved bills raising the national debt ceiling and extending unchanged a group of federal excise taxes.
- The House Interior Committee, long a battleground between conservation groups and mining and timber interests over the nature of legislation setting up in a national "wilderness" system, reached unanimous agreement on a compromise bill. It would immediately set aside 9 million acres of undeveloped federal land—as contrasted with 14.5 million in a Senate-passed bill. This could be expanded to some 60 million acres in future years with congressional approval.
- A House Judiciary subcommittee unanimously approved legislation requiring states to set up congressional districts which are compact and contain a population not more than 15 percent above or below the average for that state. The subcommittee action followed a recent Supreme Court decision holding that congressional districts must be approximately equal in population.

6-27-64

- Labor's support for an expanded food stamp program was expressed in a letter to the Senate Agriculture Committee from AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller. He urged the Senate committee to at least double the amount authorized in the House-passed bill—$75 million the first year rising to $200 million by the third year. Pilot programs during the past three years "have demonstrated the practicability . . . of a broad nationwide food stamp program," Biemiller said.

Anti-Bias Pact in Steel Wins Johnson's Praise

Pres. Johnson congratulated the Steelworkers and 11 major steel companies on a new agreement designed to implement the spirit as well as the letter of non-discrimination guarantees in existing contracts.

The union and companies pledged continued efforts to build positive support by both workers and management officials for equal job opportunity without regard to race, color, religion or national origin.

"Policies and contract provisions cannot be as successful as they should be unless implemented by the development of favorable attitudes," the statement declared.

The White House reported that the President considered the agreement "an ideal example of labor and industry rallying together to put an end to job discrimination." Johnson called USWA Pres. David J. McDonald to compliment him on the agreement, a presidential spokesman said.

AFL-CIO Pledges Continued Fight

The AFL-CIO pledged to "continue to put forth every effort" to win enactment of social security hospital insurance for the aged before Congress adjourns.

Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank of the Dept. of Social Security said the increase in basic benefits voted by the House Ways & Means Committee is "most welcome" but is not a remedy for "the still greater need" of hospital insurance.

"It is our fervent hope," he said, "that such a program will be approved by the Senate, thus giving the full House an opportunity to vote on it."

Johnson Signs Rights Act; Meany Pledges Labor's Aid

Youths Swell Labor Force:

June Jobless Rate Hits 5.3 Percent

By Robert B. Cooney

The steady improvement shown in the job picture so far in 1964 came to a sudden halt in June as teenagers and youngsters aged 20-24 flooded into the labor force. The unemployment rate for the month jumped to 5.3 percent from May's 5.1 percent according to the Labor Dept.'s latest summary figures.

Unemployment rose by 1.1 million between May and June, boosting the total jobless to 4.7 million, the department reported. The jobless rise was 100,000 more than expected at this time of year.

"The recovery came to a halt, at least temporarily," said Harold Goldstein, the Labor Dept.'s manpower and job statistics expert.

The Labor Dept. report said the May-to-June increase of 1.1 million unemployed was mainly accounted for by 800,000 teenagers—fewer than was expected—and some 175,000 youngsters aged 20-24, more than was expected. The experts expect the 20-24 group of ex-teenagers to swell from now on.

An increase of 850,000 pushed employment to a record high of nearly 72 million in June. But this was less than usual for this time of year and the rise occurred entirely in the agricultural sector. The non-farm employment total remained unchanged at 66.1 million when it was expected to increase by almost 400,000.

The failure of job growth in the important non-farm sector in June followed a five-month period in which non-farm jobs increased by 1.6 million, on a seasonally adjusted basis, the Labor Dept. observed.

The warnings raised by the June report were reinforced by figures

GOP Heads For Debate On Policies

By Willard Shelton

The Republican Party moves July 6 into the first stages of its San Francisco nominating convention, with Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona the clear front-runner and the convention Platform Committee apparently set to draft a relatively short generalized statement of campaign principles on which Goldwater or any other nominee could comfortably run.

All the observable presidential potentials, including Goldwater and Pennsylvania's Gov. William W. Scranton, are scheduled to appear before the full 116-member Platform Committee in its four days of hearings. So are some of their principal backers.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is scheduled on July 8 to present the federation's platform proposals, which in the week beginning Aug. 17 will be presented in identical form to the Democratic ARTIST'S SKETCH shows the USS Samuel Gompers, destroyer tender which Pres. Johnson has announced will be named in honor of the founding president of the American Federation of Labor. It will be constructed by union workers under a contract between the Bremerton, Wash., Metal Trades Council and the Puget Sound Naval Shipyards at Bremerton.

To Be Built by Union Labor:

Navy Names Ship Samuel Gompers

The first destroyer tender to be built by the Navy since 1945 will be named the USS Samuel Gompers in tribute to the founding president of the American Federation of Labor, Pres. Johnson has announced.

It will be built by union labor under the first agreement signed by a local metal trades council and a naval shipyard—the pact reached in July 1963 by the Bremerton, Wash., union group and the Puget Sound Naval Shipyards.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz and other government and union officials will attend ceremonies July 9 at which time the keel will be laid.

"It is fitting," said Johnson in making the announcement, "that a U.S. naval vessel bear the name Samuel Gompers. A man who believed in and worked for peace, he knew its best guarantee is 'the power of self-protection.'

"Few men represented more effectively the American idea of individual right and responsibility. A leader in the struggle for recognition of workers' rights, including the right to organize and bargain collectively, Gompers set the course for American labor by rejecting outright the concept of the 'class struggle' so prevalent at the time. He determined that working men and women would achieve social justice within the free enterprise system and under the shelter of democratic institutions—not by throwing them down but by improving them.

"The social and economic position of American workers today is to a large extent attributable to the efforts of Samuel Gompers. This ship will bear his name and our nation's flag as well."

Gompers, born in England, was a member of the Cigarmakers when he was elected president of the AFL at its founding convention in

AFL-CIO Conference Planned

By David L. Perlman

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 became law as the House voted final approval and Pres. Johnson signed the historic measure in the East Room of the White House.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a statement declared that enactment of the sweeping rights measure "represents a challenge to American society"—a challenge that calls for "full realization in fact of the rights now established by law."

"The trade union movement, like every other segment of American life, must do its part in meeting that challenge," Meany declared.

The federation president said he would ask the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its meeting scheduled Aug. 3 to summon a national conference of affiliated unions and of state central bodies "to work out a program through which the AFL-CIO can best help to implement the terms of the civil rights law."

In a letter to all affiliated state and local central bodies, Meany called on them to "intensify" their efforts to work with community-wide civil rights programs intended "to accelerate the destruction of racial barriers at every level," a re-

The Board underscored its revocation of certification by indicating it may require an anti-discrimination pledge governing behavior of any union certified in the future. The revocation allows another union to petition for certification.

The board's decision is based on the recommendations of Trial Ex-

Administration Program Advances On Four Major Legislative Fronts

Congress backed the Administration down the line on four major votes, in addition to civil rights enactment, during a three-day burst of action.

The legislative record for June 30 through July 2 shows:

- Senate passage of pay raise for federal employes, government executives, congressmen and judges, with only minor changes from the House-passed measure.

While congressional salaries and pay boosts over $22,500 would not take effect until January, the Senate voted to make the raise for rank-and-file government employes retroactive to July 1. The bill was passed 58-21, after defeat of an attempt to delete congressional pay raises.

- Final enactment of the mass transit bill as the Senate accepted without change the House version, including provisions to protect workers' job, pension, seniority and bargaining rights. The Senate vote was 47-36, with five Republicans joining 42 Democrats to pass the measure.

- House approval of a $3.3 billion foreign aid money bill—the full amount recommended by the Appropriations Committee. Final passage was by a 231-174 vote, but the crucial test—and the big victory for the Administration—was when the House rejected by a 10-vote margin, 208-198, an attempt to slash $247.8 million from the bill.

The budget-cutting recommittal motion was made by Rep. Otto E.

House Labor Group Sets Probe Of Chain Supermarket Lockout

A House subcommittee headed by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) has announced it will conduct hearings to determine whether chain supermarkets in Maryland violated the antitrust laws in a strike and lockout of their 5,000 employes.

The hearings were set for July 21-23 on instruction by Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Education & Labor Committee, to "discuss certain issues" in the dispute between the Retail Clerks and owners of 225 chain stores.

Questions have been raised, said Roosevelt, "which are believed to be of the utmost importance to the administration of the federal labor laws" and their relationship to the laws against conspiracy in restraint of trade.

Roosevelt said his labor subcommittee will invite testimony from employers, the union, and the National Labor Relations Board, which has investigated union charges of unfair labor practices by the employers.

The union struck Acme Markets Apr. 17 in a contract dispute and posted pickets. Six other chains then closed their doors and locked out their employes, members of RCIA Local 692 in Baltimore, the Eastern Shore of Maryland, and lower Delaware.

The lockout ended June 18 when employers called back all employes except at Acme, which reopened with strike-breakers. Union employes picketed Acme with signs advising their former customers that Acme stores "do not deserve your patronage." The chain has suffered a sharp drop in business, according to the union.

Union informational pickets also were posted at Acme stores in other eastern states and at 116 stores of a California subsidiary, the Alpha Beta chain.

Meanwhile employes turned down a management contract offer and negotiations were recessed by federal mediators. After the lockout had ended, Baltimore Circuit Court Judge Wilson K. Barnes issued an order barring all picketing at Acme, but two U. S. Circuit Court judges amended the order to permit up to six pickets at each store.

Legal Maneuvers

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, RCIA attorneys were opposing an Acme management attempt to return the lawsuit to Judge Barnes for another injunction hearing.

Major issue in the dispute with Acme, the union said, was management's insistence on using part-time employes instead of full-time workers, and its refusal to add agreed-upon wage increases to contract minimums.

Settlement of these two issues would remedy union charges that 60 percent of the employes at many stores work less than 29 hours a week, the RCIA said. The union has asked that available work hours be given to present-part time employes on the basis of seniority "to provide more full-time jobs and add to the security and status" of those forced to work short weeks.

Toni Sender Dies at 75, Labor Spokesman at UN

New York—Toni Sender, a mite of a woman who fought Nazis and Communists with impartial zeal when they attacked the rights of workers, died in Beth Israel Hospital here. She was 75.

An active Socialist leader who devoted her action-filled life to international peace and the workers, she was a consultant for the former AFL before the United Nations Economic & Social Council and later was UN representative of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

"Toni Sender was a warrior for freedom, justice and human dignity all her life," said AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. "She personified the inseparable identity of trade unionism with a democratic society; to her they were both the same cause, as in fact they are.

"Although Miss Sender's direct service with the American labor movement began in middle age, her energy, her devotion and her idealism shone as brightly as ever—and continued, undiminished, for all her remaining years. She has richly earned the best of all epitaphs—that the world is a better place because she lived in it."

Miss Sender, who was but 5 feet 2 inches tall, was born in Germany and shocked her middle class parents by going to work in a Frankfurt real estate office at the age of 15. That led her into the trade union movement and to Paris, where she edited a labor magazine until the outbreak of World War I forced her back to Germany.

After the war she was the youngest of 40 members of the Reichstag and soon was locking horns with the Nazis. In 1933 she fled to Czechoslovakia just ahead of Hitler's secret police.

She came to this country after editing a Socialist daily in Belgium, crusaded against the Nazis and assisted European refugees. For a period she was an economist for the UN Relief & Rehabilitation Administration before taking the post with the former AFL.

Miss Sender is survived by two sisters, Mrs. David Fink of New York and Mrs. Rachel Kormis of London.

Struck Firm Loses Vote Count Appeal

Kingsport Press, whose 1,300 union workers have been on strike for 15 months, has lost another round in its fight to prevent the National Labor Relations Board from counting ballots cast last Mar. 10 at the plant in Kingsport, Tenn.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia granted an NLRB motion to dismiss the firm's appeal from a D. C. District Court ruling that the court lacks jurisdiction to interfere with the election.

That left the NLRB regional director in Memphis, Tenn., free to proceed unless management decides to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court. The next steps would be to rule on challenges and then to open and count the ballots.

Company Challenges

Disposing of the challenges may be time-consuming, board sources said. In the bindery alone 1,108 challenges were filed, mostly by management.

Five unions are on strike at the plant, largest hard-cover book manufactory in the United States, and all are waging a nationwide "don't buy" campaign. They are the Bookbinders, Printing Pressmen, Stereotypers, Machinists and Typographical Union.

Union members walked out at Kingsport Mar. 11, 1963, after months of bargaining failed to produce an acceptable contract. The firm has continued to operate with supervisors and strikebreakers, although production and profits have dropped, according to the Allied Kingsport Press Unions.

Last January the unions petitioned for new representation elections to preserve their bargaining rights. The labor board issued an election order but decreed that the ballots should not be opened or counted until all briefs had been filed and all appeals considered. It said:

"We believe that this procedure, although a departure from that normally followed, is warranted by the circumstances and will effectuate the purposes and policies of the (labor relations) act" because otherwise the strikers, under the Taft-Hartley law, could not have voted after one year from the strike's start.

The NLRB overruled all management attempts to block the vote and the courts have refused to interfere. A finding of no jurisdiction was made by U.S. District Judge William B. Jones. It was affirmed by Circuit Court of Appeals Judges Warren E. Burger, John A. Danaher and J. Skelly Wright.

Meanwhile the Bookbinders raised weekly benefits for its strikers from $32.50 to $40 for women and $50 for men as a result of a nationwide vote by union members on increased strike assessments. The same union also picketed the plant of the Nashville Electrotype Co., where plates have been made for the struck plant.

The striking unions have asked the public not to buy books printed entirely or in part by Kingsport strikebreakers. They listed these books: World Book and Childcraft books; Encyclopaedia Britannica, Jr., and Great Books of the Western World; Book of Knowledge Encyclopaedia and the Grolier Council Encyclopaedia.

Fourth NLRB Election Brings UPWA Victory

St. Paul, Minn.—The Packinghouse Workers, after four years of grim fighting and four elections, have won a clear victory in a National Labor Relations Board election for employes of the Tony Downs Food Co., with plants at St. James and Madelia, Minn.

The tally was UPWA 189, no union 168, challenged 8, void 1. The bargaining unit has 476 members.

Following the election, management filed objections with the board, but later withdrew them, assuring certification.

Two of the three previous elections were set aside by the NLRB on complaint of the union. The NLRB regional director recommended that the third also be voided, but was overruled by the board.

The story dates back to early in 1960, when the UPWA launched an organizing campaign. Unfair labor practice charges were filed against the company on Apr. 28 of that year but were withdrawn on May 31 in an effort to expedite an election. The vote was held on June 22 and the union was rejected, 173-103. A week later the UPWA filed unfair practice charges and eventually a new election was ordered.

The second vote was held on Dec. 6, 1961, and again the company's efforts to block the union were successful, the tally being 189-145 for no union. The UPWA protested the conduct of the election and asked that it be set aside. The regional director agreed, but the board itself overruled him and the result was certified on May 10, 1962.

Another campaign got under way last February. Again the company's anti-labor tactics were evident and once more the workers voted down the UPWA—this time by a count of 216 to 188—in an NLRB election on Mar. 26.

The following day the UPWA filed a multiplicity of unfair practice charges against the company and asked that this election be set aside. This time the board agreed and the fourth vote was held June 10 with the union the victor.

AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Carl Winn said that "all of the traditional devices known were used by management."

Principal credit in chalking up the victory, he said, should be divided by AFL-CIO Field Rep. Nicholas M. Siegmund; UPWA Field Rep. Eugene Peterson; Pres. Jeannette Gumm of a UPWA local in Webster City, Ia., who worked during the drive on a temporary basis, and an employe organizing committee that refused to be disheartened.

New Mexico Unionist Named to State Post

Carlsbad, N. M.—Raymond Clark, a member of the executive board of the Stone & Allied Products Workers, has been named a member of the State Welfare Board for a term expiring Jan. 1, 1967.

A long-time resident of Carlsbad, Clark is also a district representative for the union. He was appointed by Gov. Jack M. Campbell (D) to succeed Mayor Henry G. Hutson of Carlsbad, secretary-treasurer of Machinists Local 1265.

Midnight July 9:

Screen Actors Set TV Strike Deadline

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Actors Guild has set midnight July 9 as the deadline for a nationwide walkout against producers of television entertainment films.

The union said in a report to 15,000 members that contract negotiations reached a deadlock after nearly two months of talks "because of the producer and network refusal to make any substantial concessions" in the form of increased rerun compensation and payment for foreign exhibition of TV films, despite increased industry income of more than $50 million a year from foreign showings alone.

SAG's contract with the Association of Motion Picture & Television Producers expired June 30 but the deadline was extended, Acting Pres. George Chandler said, not only to await completion July 7 of a national strike authorization referendum but also to "permit Guild negotiators to make a final effort to avoid a serious work stoppage."

"During the negotiations," Chandler said, "the Guild has made substantial modifications of its original proposals" but despite this "the industry has offered nothing of substance." Its one offer of an increase in one area was minor and "coupled with proposals for reductions in other areas which would more than wipe out any over-all increase," he said.

The SAG board and negotiating committee, which Chandler heads, "stand ready to make an agreement which is fair and economically feasible."

Formula 10 Years Old

"After 10 years under the same residual formula," he added, "growth of the industry justifies reasonable improvements in the Guild's contract. Unless improvements are offered by the employers, rather than deterioration of the Guild's contract, a strike will be the inevitable result."

The union reported that TV network representatives, who first attended negotiating sessions as observers, now are participating as active parties to the talks.

At a meeting here June 22, SAG members voted by approximately 1,200 to 6 to authorize a strike if necessary to "obtain what is fair and equitable." The executive board then set the July 9 date and ballots were mailed to members—stars, character actors, stunt and bit players, singers and announcers.

A majority of at least 75 percent of those voting is required to authorize a walkout. The union said its members never, in the union's 31-year history, have failed to support a strike recommendation by SAG directors.

In a letter accompanying the strike ballots, the board reported that "a complete impasse exists with respect to those proposals which are most vital to the . . . economic welfare of the membership, that is, increased rerun compensation and payment for foreign television exhibition of TV programs."

Profits 'Phenomenal'

Although the present rerun formula has been in effect since 1955, the letter said, and the "growth and profit of the television industry have been nothing short of phenomenal," managements have refused to make any substantial concession.

"The dollar figures in grosses and profits are staggering," the board said. The foreign market for American television films has grown "from practically nothing to a gross of approximately $50 million a year" yet film actors' services, "exhibited everywhere in the foreign markets of the world go uncompensated," the board charged.

Chandler, announcing that contract talks have been suspended, said the producers' "final" offer was "retrogressive" in certain respects but added "as soon as the producers are prepared to make an offer of substance, the Guild will be ready to resume negotiations."

SAG has had only three strikes in its history: in filmed TV commercials, from Dec. 1, 1952, to Feb. 18, 1953; filmed TV programs, Aug. 5 to 12, 1955; theatrical motion pictures, Mar. 7 to Apr. 8, 1960.

THE AUTO WORKERS open contract talks with manufacturers in Detroit, where proposals for a larger share of the industry's "fabulous" profits for 575,000 workers were presented to major firms. At meetings with General Motors representatives, UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, right, and Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock, left, show proposal to GM Vice Pres. Louis Seaton and Labor Relations Dir. Earl R. Bramblett. Similar talks were to open with Ford, Chrysler, American Motors Corp.

Working Conditions, Wages, Jobs Top Agenda as Auto Talks Open

Detroit—Creation of "the maximum possible number of new job opportunities" will be a top priority goal of the Auto Workers in 1964 contract bargaining with major U.S. auto manufacturers, union negotiators said at the opening of talks designed to share more of the industry's "fabulous" profits with its 575,000 union workers. Humanizing plant working conditions will be another major objective, the union emphasized, along with its traditional goals—higher wages and improved working conditions.

UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther made an opening statement of objectives at the first meeting with General Motors and Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock, director of the union's GM Dept., presented the first of 37 "position papers" on problems confronting UAW members in the shops.

In a paper on "creating job opportunities," the union declared that earlier retirement, longer vacations for veteran workers and more paid holidays are among the improvements the auto makers could accept to put from 50,000 to 60,000 more people at work in their plants.

After the GM meeting, Reuther and other top UAW officials made separate presentations on successive days to management of Ford Motor Co. and the Chrysler Corp. A similar presentation is scheduled for July 8 at American Motors.

The subject matter of the talks grew out of demands drafted by delegates to the UAW convention last March and polished at later meetings of union groups. In them the union spelled out these additional goals:

- Civilizing working conditions so that members may "enjoy a greater measure of respect and dignity" on the job.
- Protecting workers against the job-destroying effects of automation and plant relocation.
- Improving job security, health, income and old age security.
- Raising the living standards of auto workers toward levels "consistent with the possibilities of our affluent society."

At a press conference before negotiations started, Reuther emphasized that the UAW has every reason to expect a new contract agreement without a work stoppage and without government intervention.

The UAW, he said, "is going to the bargaining table not looking for a strike but for justice." It hopes the talks can be carried out "in a spirit of seeking justice for the workers, the public and the country," he continued.

"There is no need for a contest of economic power," Reuther said at Ford negotiations. He added that contracts can be negotiated without government intervention and "since we make autos in Detroit and not in Washington, we will make a contract in Detroit and not in Washington."

In the UAW statement on job opportunities, the union declared that "America desperately needs additional job opportunities" and management "can help to create them."

The U.S. unemployment rate is "intolerably high," the statement said, and "all who can make a contribution to reducing it are morally obligated to do so."

Responsibility Shared

Declaring that "management shares with us the responsibility for creating new job opportunities," the union declared that without raising prices, the most profitable of all U.S. corporations, General Motors, "can afford to meet the cost of other measures to create more jobs" and still cut the prices of cars, which would "also lead to more jobs," it said.

The statement summed up its points: "The nation needs more jobs. GM's policies have contributed to that need. GM can well afford to help meet the need to create additional job opportunities" by methods including these:

- Early retirement on attractive pensions, plus an incentive bonus.
- Longer vacations, plus a vacation bonus to meet the extra expenses incurred when families vacation together.
- Elimination of the "immorality of avoidable overtime."
- More paid holidays.
- Reduction of the workweek.

NLRB Orders Backpay At Union Contract Rate

A New England pipeline firm must give backpay at union rates rather than its own lower rates to 50 workers the company refused to retain when it took over a government contract and hired nonunion employes, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

The Board rejected arguments of New England Tank Industries, Inc., that the backpay should have been computed at its own lower rates because that is what the workers would have received had they been hired. It upheld backpay of more than $165,000, computed at rates the men had been receiving from the preceding contractor under agreements with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and an unaffiliated guards' union.

The company on Oct. 1, 1960, took over operation of an oil pipeline at an Air Force base near Searsport, Me.

The NLRB found that the firm violated the Taft-Hartley Act when it refused to hire the employes of the former contractor "because it did not want to pay the union scale and because it was anti-union." The 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals later ordered the company to reinstate the workers with backpay.

Trial Examiner Eugene E. Dixon totted up the backpay at the higher pay rates and a three-member NLRB panel has upheld him. It wrote:

"The company determined that it was not going to operate the pipeline with union labor at their current rates and refused to hire the discriminatees" despite the fact that it was normal procedure, for the company and other pipeline contract holders, to retain the employes of the former contractor.

Though the company in actuality refused to hire them, it continued, "its actions were tantamount to an unlawful discharge designed to avoid dealing" with the unions representing the workers it would normally have hired.

The device management utilized was, the board said, "a refusal to hire—its effect was to discharge the individuals from jobs they were performing and to unilaterally change the rates of pay without notifying their unions.

The rates paid by New England Tank were 50 cents to $1 an hour less than the union rates, the examiner found.

20,000 Apply to Serve As Youth Job Advisers

Some 20,000 men and women—most of them young—have accepted the federal government's challenge to help disadvantaged youth find a place in the nation's economic life and have taken examinations to qualify for appointment as advisers and counselors.

Many of them fresh from college classrooms, they poured into Federal-State Employment Service offices in such numbers that it was impossible to handle their applications in advance of the examinations, which had to be held in two sections instead of the anticipated one.

Only about 2,000 of those who pass the tests will be selected to help fit young people without skills into jobs or training courses. Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, whose department administers the program, said noncollegians with experience in counseling or working with underprivileged youth also are eligible.

Those who do receive appointments will undergo training at 25 universities in all parts of the country which are cooperating in the program. Plans originally called for training at 20 institutions. Wirtz said the additional facilities "will aid us substantially in conducting a crash training program."

At the time he announced the program, Wirtz asked the aid of the AFL-CIO in recruiting prospective trainees. Qualifying examinations were held last week in Federal-State Employment Service offices. Training in most cases will begin July 13 and continue until Sept. 15.

Those selected will work in youth opportunity centers, under the direction of specialists, to assist young people in evaluating their talents, aptitudes and limitations, and to guide them into either sources of additional training or education, or to jobs.

Mediation Board Official Retires

The National Mediation Board has announced that NMB Executive Sec. Eugene C. Thompson has retired from the post he has held for 13 years but will continue with the board as chief mediator. Thomas A. Tracy, assistant executive secretary, became executive secretary as of July 1.

All to Seek Higher Degrees:

5 AFL-CIO Merit Scholars Graduate With High Honors

Five AFL-CIO scholarship winners who started their college careers in 1960 have ended them in the last few weeks with high honors—including two Phi Beta Kappa awards—and will continue their education in graduate schools.

The sixth, Roberta Middleton, of Fort Collins, Colo., was graduated a year early and is now completing work at the University of Colorado for a master's degree in physics.

Mary Blakely and French Prof. Patrick R. Vincent

Joseph Cullen and instructor check experiment

Wesley Green and math instructor

Lt. Kenneth Schultz and Col. Merrill A. Kempton

Travis Meredith and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany

The Phi Beta Kappa keys among this year's crop of graduates were won by Mary E. Blakely, Rock Hill, S. C., who achieved virtually perfect marks during her four years at Duke University, and Wesley Charles Green, Jr., Pawtucket, R. I., who was graduated magna cum laude by Brown University.

Miss Blakely majored in French. Described by her teachers as "an exceptionally able student," she won membership in Tau Beta Kappa, French honor society, and received a Woodrow Wilson fellowship which will enable her to study for higher degrees at Columbia University.

Green, whose father was an Air Force officer killed during World War II, won one honor after another in mathematics and had a 3.7 average out of a possible 4 during his college career. He won a Danforth Award and a National Defense Act fellowship, and will begin study next fall for a doctorate of philosophy at the University of Wisconsin.

Graduating from the California Institute of Technology was Joseph R. Cullen, Bozeman, Mont., a member of Musicians Local 709 and the son of Joseph T. Cullen, a member of Carpenters Local 557. His excellent scholastic record won him a teaching fellowship at CIT, and he will begin working for his master's degree in September.

Travis Ashby Meredith, Welch, W. Va., combined history as a major and pre-medicine as a minor to win high honors at Yale University—in sports as well as scholastically. He will enter Johns Hopkins Medical School in the fall. The youth is the son of T. A. Meredith, longtime member of the Railway Clerks.

The fifth graduate was Kenneth Elmer Schultz, Steubenville, Mich., who during his summer vacations from Purdue University became a member of Steelworkers Local 1066, Gary, Ind. The son of Paul O. Schultz, a member of Auto Workers Local 1290 in Steubenville, he took honors in electrical engineering and also earned the highest ranking among the 2,000 students in the Purdue Air Force ROTC. He was graduated as an Air Force lieutenant and will seek a master's degree at the Air Force Institute of Technology.

Goldfinger Addresses Teacher Workshop

Athens, O.—Economic issues from the trade union point of view were discussed by AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger at the 13th annual Ohio Workshop of Economic Education being held at Ohio University.

Sec.-Treas. Robert D. Bollard of the Ohio AFL-CIO described the state's labor movement.

The three-week workshop sponsored by the Ohio Council on Economic Education is seeking to prepare leadership teams from 10 Ohio public school systems to carry out teacher-training programs in economic education during the coming academic year.

Winners of Scholarship Assistance Announced by AFL-CIO Affiliates

Scholarships reflecting the broad interest of organized workers in higher education are being awarded by AFL-CIO affiliates as the academic year drew to its close and students completed their studies.

In the Chicago area, units of the Steelworkers presented five scholarships to the sons and daughters of members and the Chicago AFL-CIO named the winners of its 1964 John Fitzpatrick Memorial Awards, which honor the late president of the former Chicago Federation of Labor from 1905 until his death in 1946.

Scholarships worth $4,000 each were awarded by USWA Dist. 31, with headquarters in Chicago, to Robert P. Zielinski of Chicago and Marianne E. Stanford of Gary, Ind. The awards are made to high school graduates within the district who score highest in a test administered by the American College Testing Program.

Zielinski is the son of Henry Zielinski, a member of Local 3161 employed as a jig and fixture man at the Athey Products Co., and will study physics as the Illinois Institute of Technology. Miss Stanford, the daughter of William Stanford, will study languages at the Gary Center of Indiana University and also won a fee remission scholarship from the university. Her father is a draftsman at the Gary Works of U.S. Steel.

In making public the winners, Dist. Dir. Joseph Germano also announced that three USWA locals had given scholarships to the children of members who had scored highest in the ACT tests.

Locals Give Scholarships

Local 2047, Chicago, presented a $1,500 scholarship to James Borowski, Chicago, whose father, Ray, operates a turret lathe at the Crane Co.; Local 1010 gave a $2,000 award to Mary Margaret Macnak, Hammond, Ind., whose father, John, is a motor inspector for the Inland Steel Co. at Indiana Harbor, Ind.; and Local 1011 awarded a $1,000 scholarship to Janice Werner, Cedar Lake, Ind., the daughter of Charles Werner, a rougher at the Indiana Harbor plant of the Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co.

The Fitzpatrick memorial scholarships, worth $500 each, were won by Edgar A. Clark, Jr., whose father is a member of Local 165, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; and Sandra Kay Bacskai, daughter of Emery G. Bacskai, a member of Carpenters Local 271.

Winners of $500 scholarships awarded by the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers in honor of the union's president-secretary, John P. Burke, were announced as Ronald Lee Fritz, a student at the University of Portland, Ore., who won the award for seniors, and Rosemary B. Kirr, of Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, who took the award for juniors.

The winners were selected from applicants from all parts of the country by the scholarship committee of the Adirondack Community College, Fort Edward, N. Y. The competition is open to children of members of the union.

Three winners of $600 scholarship awards and three winners of $200 each were chosen by the Oregon AFL-CIO in the 18th year of the annual contests conducted first by the State AFL and since 1955 by the merged labor body.

Top prize winners were Kathleen Orange, of Portland; Stephen L. Talbott, Beaverton, and James C. Waggoner, Scappoose, whose father is a member of Steelworkers Local 3010. The $200 prizes were won by Penny Sue McDonald, Troutdale; Karen Ann Mack, Lebanon, and Hunter T. Jameson, Hillsboro.

The California AFL-CIO announced the winners of 11 scholarships worth $500 each awarded on the basis of a competition, open to all graduating high school seniors in the state, designed to explore and evaluate their knowledge and understanding of labor and industrial problems.

The winners were Sandra Schmunk, Lompoc; Brian R. Law, Vacaville; Denise Mallette and Ron N. Sutter, Monterey; Jack Radey, Merced; Harriet Sternsher, San Francisco; Sheba Sipora Solomon, Sunnyvale; Lynnette Price and Thomas William High, Oakland; Suzanne Crane, San Pedro, and Elinor Frances Davis, Fullerton.

Eight of the scholarships were made available through affiliates of the state labor body. Two were given by the Los Angeles Building & Construction Trades Council, one known as the Lloyd A. Mashburn Memorial Scholarship. The others came from the California Legislative Board of the Railroad Trainmen; the State Council of Carpenters; the Ladies Auxiliary of the State Council of Carpenters; the State Council of Culinary Workers, Bartenders and Hotel & Motel Service Employes; Los Angeles District Council of Carpenters, and the Roderick MacKenzie Scholarship Award of Painters District Council 36, Los Angeles.

12 Winners Named

In New York, Utility Workers Local 1-2 awarded 12 scholarships to children of members, all of whom are employed by the Consolidated Edison Co.

First award went to Susan K. Numrich, Oceanside, L.I., who accepted $1,100 toward her college career instead of the usual $1,500 because she also was a National Merit Scholarship winner. Second prize of $1,000 was won by Charles R. Ranalli, the Bronx, and third award by Alice L. Russo, White Plains, N. Y.

Honorable mention awards of $500 each went to Maureen Arnold, Barbara Clifford, Donna Goeller, James Hsia, Ruth Lynch, John Malone, Jeremiah O'Gorman, Jolynn Pfeuffer and Helen Pycior.

$18.7 Million Voted:

ILO Budget Raised Despite Soviet Bloc

Geneva—The Intl. Labor Organization's annual conference here adopted a budget of $18.7 million for 1965, an increase of $2.3 million over that of the current year.

Only Soviet bloc delegates failed to vote for the budget, which was approved by 279 votes in favor, one against and 33 abstensions.

U.S. government delegate George L-P Weaver, assistant secretary of labor, scored the Communists for what he called the "paradox" they presented the conference.

The Communist countries pose as "vigorous proponents" of expanding ILO activity, Mr. Weaver recalled. However, he continued, they seek to "have it both ways" by claiming that they can not support the budget this activity requires.

Gordon C. Slater, the British government delegate, likewise hit at the Communist countries, charging that they were "saying in effect more and more ought to be done with less and less money."

Worker Viewpoint

Speaking in the name of most of the worker delegates, Harold Collison of the British Trades Union Congress told the conference that the 110-nation ILO had to face up to its "great responsibility in the world today."

"So many developing countries can use the help which the ILO can give them," Collison said, "we should not deny that help; it should be there when it is asked for," he added.

Both the workers and the free employer representatives at the ILO's 48th session sharply criticized governments for failing to pay their annual assessments promptly.

Collison said that the ILO's finances were in "such a perilous state" last year that the organization had had to seek an advance from the banks. Facilities for the current conference had to be trimmed for fear that money would run out, he asserted.

"This," the worker delegate said, "is an impossible and improper situation." He added that "much of this difficulty could be avoided if governments could somehow arrange to make their contributions early."

More than 1,100 government, worker and employer delegates attended the three-week session of the United Nations specialized agency.

On the U.S. worker team, besides Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl of the Machinists, were AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany; AFL-CIO Vice Pres. George M. Harrison; Assistant Pres. John McCartin of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters; Pres. Ralph Reiser of the Glass & Ceramic Workers; Directing Business Rep. James McDonald of Machinists Dist. 8; Pres. Miles C. Stanley of the West Virginia AFL-CIO; Edward J. Hickey, Jr., attorney for the Railway Clerks; Bert Seidman, AFL-CIO European economic representative; Mrs. Maida Springer of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs.

ROLE OF UNIONS under the new Brazilian government was discussed by Carlos Lacerda (center), governor of the state of Guanabara, on a visit to AFL-CIO headquarters while in Washington for discussions with Pres. Johnson. In the absence of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany he met with (from left) AFL-CIO Inter-American Rep. Andrew C. McLellan; William C. Doherty, Jr., director of the Social Projects Dept. of the American Institute for Free Labor Development; former AFL-CIO Vice Pres. William C. Doherty, Sr.; Lane Kirkland, assistant to Meany; Ernest Lee, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs; AIFLD Executive Dir. Serafino Romualdi; Associate Inter-American Rep. Thomas Robles and Harry Goldberg of the Dept. of Intl. Affairs.

Board Cancels Bargaining Rights For Local's Racial Discrimination

aminer Frederick U. Reel, who in March 1963 found that where a union segregates members or excludes or denies full membership status to applicants, "it is violating its duty of fair representation to all members of the unit and should not be permitted to hold a certified status."

The union at the Hughes Tool Co. had two locals—one for white workers only and one for Negroes. The contract perpetuated job segregation and provided greater employment opportunities for members of the white local, including an apprenticeship program from which Negroes were excluded. The white local was responsible for handling matters relating to apprentices.

Grievance Refused

The case arose from the refusal of the white local to process a grievance of Ivory Davis based on his exclusion from an apprenticeship program.

Three members—Boyd Leedom, Gerald A. Brown and Howard Jenkins, Jr.—argued that when a union as bargaining representaive for all employes causes discrimination against some of them based on racial lines it commits an unfair labor practice.

Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and John E. Fanning argued that the National Labor Relations Act was not intended to encompass racial discrimination as such but that the board could act when discrimination is based on union membership considerations. They found against the union because the discrimination against Davis was based on his membership in one local rather than another, along with his race.

The three board members said that the refusal to process Davis' grievance for reasons of race amounted to a refusal to bargain collectively with the employer and violated a provision of the law which forbids a union to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employe.

The NLRB had once before, in a case involving the filing of non-Communist oaths by union officers under provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, then in effect, revoked a union's certification, but the decision was overturned in the courts.

The Steelworkers originally represented the workers at the Hughes Tool Co., but lost bargaining rights to the "independent" segregated locals in 1946 after a long strike. The USWA sought representation rights in 1950 for a single unsegregated local but was defeated by the independent on the issue of the one-local approach.

Job Right Guarantees Urged for Peace Corps

The Peace Corps has asked unions and management to negotiate agreements guaranteeing re-employment, with seniority and pension rights and apprenticeship credit, to workers who take two years off their jobs to serve in the Peace Corps.

The guarantees are needed for a stepped-up program of recruiting volunteers qualified to teach on-the-job skills to workers in developing nations, Peace Corps Dir. Sargent Shriver said.

Shriver, in a memorandum to the President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy, asked "the assistance of both management and labor to help the Peace Corps establish a new program so that thousands of American blue collar workers can serve their country as volunteers."

He urged the continuation of employment benefits "for any worker who has found the moral equivalent to war in the Peace Corps by taking up arms against ignorance, poverty and disease in one of the emerging nations of Asia, Africa and Latin America."

Shriver commended as an example to be followed the policy of California's Apprenticeship Council of allowing apprentices working overseas to receive full credit for their work.

A special task force has been set up "to open the doors for blue collar workers" in the Peace Corps, Shriver said. Special recruitment programs are planned at union halls and plant gates. Workers are needed to teach on-the-job fundamentals in auto mechanics, machine maintenance and construction trades, he said.

Any American citizen over 18 is eligible for Peace Corps service if he has no dependents under 18. Married couples can serve if both husband and wife can work as volunteers.

Machinists Lodge Cites Vocational Graduates

Mt. Vernon, N. Y.—To encourage able youths to enter the machinists' and allied trades, Machinists Lodge 1709 has presented James G. Healey Memorial Awards in the form of U.S. savings bonds to outstanding students of Westchester County vocational high schools. Healey was first president of the lodge.

OATH OF OFFICE as a judge of the Criminal Court is taken by M. Michael Potoker (right), secretary-treasurer of the New York Newspaper Guild until he resigned to take the judicial post. Swearing him in for a 10-year term is Mayor Robert F. Wagner (left), who made the appointment. Potoker, also a vice president of the New York State AFL-CIO, joined the NYNG in 1933, helped organize its Mirror unit, and had been secretary-treasurer and staff counsel since 1950. He was graduated from Brooklyn Law School and admitted to the bar in 1943.

Platform Parley Opens GOP Convention Period

National Convention in Atlantic City.

As the GOP moved into the hectic convention period these events marked Goldwater strongly as the frontrunner for the presidential nomination, with Scranton's hope still resting on the possibility that he could pull away some 80 to 120 delegates listed in varying degrees as Goldwater backers:

- The 58-member Illinois delegation in a caucus lined up 48 for the Arizona senator, 10 noncommitted, but none of these 10 openly lean toward Scranton. The Goldwater backers included Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen, gubernatorial candidate Charles H. Percy and House GOP Whip Leslie C. Arends.
- Dirksen announced that he would make the nominating speech placing Goldwater's name before the convention.
- Henry Cabot Lodge, just resigned as U.S. ambassador to Viet Nam, began a campaign backing Scranton's presidential drive and conferred with former Pres. Eisenhower, who was in Washington for a physical checkup at the Army's Walter Reed Hospital. Lodge's request that Eisenhower openly announce for Scranton and agree to place the governor's name in nomination backfired when a premature news leak, indicating that the general had consented, was sharply repudiated from Eisenhower's Gettysburg farm.
- United Press Intl. credited Goldwater with 688 first-ballot convention delegates—33 more than the 655 bare majority needed for nomination. Other compilations listed the Arizona senator as having approximately 700 delegates ready to support him on the first ballot.

Scranton carried his campaign for nomination to the Pacific Coast before scheduling a swing back into the big midwestern states, but there was no clear indication that he had begun to dent the Goldwater bulge in delegates. The Pennsylvania governor was listed by UPI as having 137 delegates, plus whatever of New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller's 110 and Lodge's 43 might be swung to him by their leaders.

Favorite Son Votes

Two big midwestern delegations —Ohio's with 58 votes and Michigan's with 48 votes—were slated to cast favorite-son first ballots for Gov. James A. Rhodes and Gov. George Romney respectively, but some pro-Goldwater members were showing a restive desire to shift before the first ballot tally was announced.

The 680-700 delegates credited as favoring Goldwater were admittedly mixed in their commitment, and some 300 were considered protentially "moveable." Lodge harked back to the 1952 Republican convention, when he floor-managed the Eisenhower battle against the late Sen. Robert A. Taft, to suggest that an apparent majority for the "frontrunner" could be shifted again this year.

Scranton supporters who were scheduled to testify before the convention's full 116-member Platform Committee included Rockefeller and Lodge.

1776–1964

ON THIS FOURTH OF JULY the hallowed words and phrases of the Declaration of Independence take on new and deeper significance. With the enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 the nation has taken another historic step toward fulfillment of the principles that were set out at the nation's birth.

The "long train of abuses and usurpations" that Thomas Jefferson spelled out in the Declaration have been since the beginning of nationhood present in one form or another in the United States, sometimes mild and insignificant, at other times intense and critical.

The history of the United States has been a continuing search for solutions to the grievances of various groups and of their social, economic and political problems. Some of the solutions came easily during the years of national expansion; others came slowly or not at all.

The civil rights fight is centuries old. Our first struggle to redeem men from slavery and bondage was solved finally in a bitterly fought, bloody Civil War. Now, 100 years later, the second struggle is being resolved peacefully, through legislative, judicial and executive processes, punctuated here and there by flare-ups of violence brought on by bitter-enders trying to frustrate freedom and justice.

IN A SENSE the passage of the Civil Rights Act is a declaration of independence from bigotry and prejudice and hate, and affirmatively a declaration of conscience by the American people and their representatives in Congress.

It is also a declaration that a democracy will survive only if freedom and liberty and justice are fully and freely granted to all men of all races, colors, creeds and national origins.

To those who doubt the strength of America's democratic institutions, the Civil Rights Act should serve to shore up their beliefs in the vitality that flows from the words of the Declaration of Independence adopted on July 4, 1776. To those who would attempt to subvert and destroy the nation's democratic heritage and bring about in the words of Jefferson "absolute despotism," the new act is another and powerful weapon in the arsenal of democracy.

This Fourth of July in a very real sense is one of rededication, a day to pledge once again "our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor" to the continuing strengthening of the nation. In Jefferson's words:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

Will Party Swing Right?:

Goldwater's Bid for Leadership Poses 'Historic Issue' for GOP

The following analysis of the historic issue facing the Republican Party at its national convention opening July 13 in San Francisco is excerpted from an article by James Reston, Washington bureau chief of the New York Times, which appeared on June 29.

IN THE WEEKS before its presidential nominating convention, the Republican Party faces an issue that can be compared only to its past great struggle over slavery, the Reconstruction of the South, isolation and industrial reform.

The issue now is whether it wishes to transfer presidential power from its progressive to its conservative wing for the first time in a quarter of a century; whether it wants to follow a more aggressive and nationalistic policy overseas, and whether it chooses to reduce the influence of the federal government in dealing with economic and social—particularly racial—problems at home.

Four times in its first 100 years, the Republican Party has led the nation through periods of startling progress, only to falter at the end and stain its own remarkable history.

As Clinton Rossiter, the political scientist and historian at Cornell has noted, the Republican Party began life as a loose coalition of dissenting interests that were united only in trying to oppose the extension of slavery.

The GOP did not start primarily as a conservative business-oriented party. But in the decade of the 1860s the men of business gained the ascendancy and they have been in conflict with the more progressive Republicans ever since under various names: the Stalwarts versus the Half Breeds in the 1880s; the Regulars versus the Progressives in the early 1900s; and the Old Guard versus the Modern Republicans ever since the early days of the New Deal and before.

The economic reforms of Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal and the foreign policy reforms of Harry S. Truman's Fair Deal deepened the split between the Republican conservatives and the Republican progressives, and, while it was the Republican conservatives who dominated the party in Congress, it was the Republican progressives who got the party's presidential nomination, beginning in 1940 with Wendell Willkie, a former Democrat who promised only to be a more prudent and efficient New Dealer than Roosevelt.

This personal difference between Mr. Goldwater on the one hand in this election and Mr. Scranton and Mr. Lodge on the other would not justify the conclusion that a great historic issue is at stake in the San Francisco convention.

If it were merely a struggle for personal power, or even for giving the conservative wing of the party a turn at the Presidential nomination after more than a generation of progressive Republican candidates, there would be much to be said for nominating the Arizona senator on the first ballot.

The "historic issue," however, is whether one of the two major American political parties is now prepared to hand over the leadership and machinery of the party to a man who is in substantial disagreement with the present way of dealing with the foreign, social and economic problems of the United States—with all that would mean in terms of domestic political tranquility and allied unity.

The question before the Republican delegates, however, is whether they want to express their sentiments and desires or whether they want to define policies that will be effective and lasting; whether they want to vote for a policy they can defend over the years or one that has limited emotional appeal and happens to be popular with key voters for the moment.

IN SUM, Mr. Goldwater is defying the unwritten law of American politics that the differences between the parties should be as few and modest as possible; that the two parties should, as Prof. Rossiter says, "overlap substantially in principle, policy, character, appeal, and purpose—or cease to be parties with any hope of winning a national election."

Sen. Goldwater defies this widely accepted view. He does not want the Republicans to concentrate on their similarities with the Democrats but on their differences. He does not want the two parties to "overlap substantially in principle, policy, character, appeal, and purpose."

In fact, he thinks the way to win elections is to go to the right and emphasize the economic, social, and foreign policy differences with the Democrats. And the main question is whether the Republican Party agrees with him.

Mr. Scranton and Mr. Lodge are secondary—indeed they are almost incidental to this primary consideration. The policies of Mr. Goldwater, even when defined in the most moderate terms, amount to a proposal that the Republican Party should let him lead it in a counter-revolution against the trend of social, economic and foreign policies of the last generation, and the "historic question" is whether the GOP wants to embark with him on this adventure.

Morgan Says:

Perpetuation of Closed Society In Mississippi Unthinkable

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

CHICAGO—There are more Negroes in the City of Chicago than there are in the entire state of Mississippi. Unsurprisingly then, Chicago, to which a host of Mississippi Negroes have migrated, is a kind of human seismograph, registering the shock waves of racial conflict, not only in its own hot, teeming streets, but in the bayous of the South, in the alleys of Boston and elsewhere in this restive, troubled land.

Morgan

Today the needle of the seismograph is tense and quivering, as if sensing an impending earthquake with its epicenter in the unhappy town of Philadelphia, Miss.

All four Chicago daily newspapers are playing the story of the disappearance of the three young civil rights volunteers in Mississippi under black, ominous headlines on page one. In a worried editorial the Tribune calls for a halt of the "invasion" of northern college students, black and white, for the purpose of educating Mississippi Negroes how to register and vote, on the ground that their presence may be the provocation of a possible massacre.

Chicago continues to seethe with unresolved racial issues of its own, including Negro ghettos and the parallel problem created by de facto segregation in housing—the de facto segregation of public schools.

Almost as if it were trying to distract its readers from local crises, Chicago's evening American gives prominence to a dispatch from New York citing a Fund for the Republic Survey as finding that the upper west side of Manhattan Island has become a "fortress of fear" against rising violent attacks, usually by young Negro gangs, on citizens on the streets.

All this seems to add up to two things: the deepening of dark prospects for an ugly summer of racial violence North and South and the inability of most people to face up to the grim fact that the United States has a full-blown social revolution on its hands, not just a teen-age rumble.

What the well-meaning but pious-sounding admonitions to call off the Mississippi summer project ignore is the fact that the Negro leadership in the South, as this correspondent reported two months ago, is determined to challenge the white supremacists with or without volunteer help. Their argument is that in the areas of hard-core racist defiance, like Alabama, Mississippi, the strategy of passive resistance will not work.

This attitude of near desperation does not justify the acts of wanton violence in New York and elsewhere, acts which may or may not have been infected and provoked by a contagion of frustration. But against these individual crimes at least a framework of justice is operating. For example the man who brutally murdered Catherine Genovese in New York's borough of Queens one night last March, while 38 neighbors mutely watched, has already been caught, tried, convicted and sentenced to death.

On the other hand there has been no conviction in last June's assassination of Medgar Evers, NAACP official, in Jackson, Miss., nobody caught for the bomb murder of four little Negro girls in a Birmingham, Ala., church last September, and this city, at least, still shudders over the unpunished lynching of a Chicago boy, Emmett Till, in Mississippi nine years ago.

ONE OF THE MOST ghastly aspects of the current incident in Philadelphia, Miss., is that this is just the top of the iceberg. White civilian violence and police brutality in the Deep South against civil rights demonstrators, white and black, are almost daily occurrences and most of them never get reported.

Just out is an eloquent book entitled "Mississippi: The Closed Society." Its pages are brimming with shocking, calmly-related facts of persecution in what has become, in some respects, almost a totalitarian state. The author is no carpetbagger but a man who has lived in the South for 45 years and who has been on the faculty of the University of Mississippi since 1936, History Prof. James W. Silver.

"Mississippi," Silver writes, "has no more chance of retaining her present folkways, including outmoded segregation and the conscious debasement of the Negro, than she once had of holding on to slavery. The only option Mississippians have is whether to make an inevitable transition peaceable or bloody."

Perhaps they will exercise a civilized option. Gov. Paul Johnson seems to be trying though the effort is very late and very weak. Responsible reports from the tense town of Philadelphia are ominous.

Prospects of a major racial catastrophe in Mississippi with nationwide repercussions are terrifying and every honorable effort should be made to avert disaster. But the history of Mississippi's closed society is, in a real sense, more terrifying and the nation, apparently, has not yet grasped the fact that its perpetuation would be unthinkable.

Washington Reports:

Public Self-Discipline Is Urged To Make Civil Rights Act Work

PEACEFUL implementation of the 1964 Civil Rights Act will require the same cooperation of individuals and groups that brought about passage of the bill, Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Sen. Everett McK. Dirksen (R-Ill.) asserted in interviews on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

"From now on, we must depend upon public discipline to get the maximum benefit," Dirksen declared. "Law enforcing authorities have to take account of sporadic outbursts where we have violence, as in Mississippi, but I hope that a series of conferences will finally mean that people become self-enforcers. That is after all the hope, because law enforcement finally resides in the moral sense of the people."

Humphrey repeated his recommendation that the governor of each state and the mayor of each city call a conference of civic leaders from all walks of "life to discuss this federal statute, to see what it means and how it applies."

At the same time, he said, the various departments of the federal government must work with state and local officials to implement it.

Both senators, key figures in winning Senate approval of the civil rights bill, congratulated Negro leaders for their efforts to make certain that Negro people continue non-violent policies. They agreed, too, that whites must also be restrained in their attitudes and actions.

DIRKSEN reported that much has already been done in the fields of public accommodations and fair employment, and more can be triggered by individuals.

Also needed to make civil rights become a fact, said Humphrey, is emphasis on making more jobs, on "education in the primary and secondary schools and colleges, in teaching skills, in banishing illiteracy . . . in attacking problems of crowded living, of housing, of unbelievable social injustices and inequities."

"Education," he said, "is the key to enlightenment, to understanding, to forbearance, to progress. It would be most unbelievable and tragic if, in our desire to gain civil rights, we practiced civil wrongs."

Time, said Humphrey, is not the answer, "but time well-used."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE CIVIL RIGHTS bill as passed by the Senate and accepted by the House became the law of the land with Pres. Johnson's signature. It is now possible to look back at the process by which the Senate filibuster was broken—a most remarkable achievement.

There has been proper recognition of the role played by Sen. Everett McK. Dirksen of Illinois, the GOP floor leader, without whose powerful and persistent efforts the necessary Republican support could not possibly have been obtained for cloture shutting off the filibuster.

There were other principal characters, however, whose contributions should be recapitulated. They include Senators Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota and Thomas H. Kuchel of California, the Democratic and Republican whips, who worked out the machinery by which the bipartisan coalition kept itself in control of the legislative situation on the floor. And they include, as well, the longtime captain-general of the Dixie filibuster bloc, Sen. Richard B. Russell of Georgia, who found himself for the first time unable to cope with the forces massed against him by rights advocates.

Early in the debate Humphrey and Kuchel made it clear that they intended to keep the rights backers tightly organized, with plans to meet the filibuster as detailed and effective as those of the southerners. The program never broke down.

HUMPHREY, beyond all this, asserted the firmest leadership of liberal Democrats Congress has seen in this generation.

Notoriously, Senate liberals of both parties tend to think independently and to vary in emphasis, and they can fragment themselves on occasion. Indeed, under the heavy pressure of protracted battle such as the three-month filibuster, they have tended on occasion to suspect the motives of others, to speak emotionally—in short, to let themselves be defeated.

Humphrey's contribution was patience and the intimate knowledge of Senate thought habits he has learned across his 15 years of service. He kept the debate to a large extent free of acrimony—at least from his side. As recapitulated in Congressional Quarterly, he counseled against any castigation of Dirksen during the period the Republican leader was "mulling over" amendments, warning that this might push Dirksen into an "intransigent position."

Humphrey refused to schedule longer sessions, force the "arrest" of absent members by the sergeant-at-arms or question the motives of the southerners. He operated on the theory, Congressional Quarterly reported, that "the less bitterness there was, the fewer tempers were lost, the more likely a better bill."

In the end, Humphrey's patience and firmness triumphed—and this after one moment when as decent and honorable a liberal as Republican Sen. George Aiken of Vermont had predicted flatly, "the House bill is dead."

RUSSELL'S MISTAKE as the southern captain was in believing he could reject compromise, stand hard on the filibuster alone and wait for the liberals to crack up.

It is no secret that supporters of the House bill feared they would have to give up either the public accommodations section or the fair employment section. Russell might have allowed various amendments to be voted on—and a reasonable attitude might well have won some support among conservative Republicans who have never voted against him on cloture before.

Instead he went for broke—no compromise, no agreement to end the filibuster any time until cloture was stuffed down his throat, no yielding at any point.

He lost allies rather than gained them; conservatives of both parties were pulled to Humphrey and Dirksen. And when cloture had been voted he sprang to the floor and pronounced that the Senate had been seized with "the spirit of the lynch mob."

Instead, time had passed him by. He failed to recognize that the huge 71-29 majority built up for cloture (only eight non-southern senators voted with him and some of these would have switched had their votes been needed) expressed both the conscience of the Senate and their determination that the Senate this time would act.

CIVIL RIGHTS is now "up to the people," two of the men who piloted the legislation through the Senate declared in interviews on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program: Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.), left, and Sen. Everett Dirksen (R-Ill.).

How to Buy:

Reasonable Coffee Cost Ceiling Needed to Protect Consumers

By Sidney Margolius

THE WORLD COFFEE Information Center, the registered agent for the Pan-American Coffee Bureau, has challenged this department's recent criticisms of the coffee price hikes. The center says that the rise "stems from natural disasters which have sharply diminished the Brazilian coffee crop, not from the export quotas. This is not only our position but the official position of the U.S. government." The center also maintains that the Intl. Coffee Agreement, under which the exporting countries decide how much coffee they will allow to be shipped here, "has twice been utilized to help keep prices from spiraling."

That's their side of the story. Here's ours:

It is true that the U.S. government supports the coffee agreement because it wants to help the South American countries. But to do this at the expense of limited-income American families amounts to taxing them without regard to ability to pay. If working people and older folks on social security are asked to approve a floor under coffee prices, as the coffee agreement seeks to do, then in turn we must ask for a reasonable ceiling on coffee prices or other effective precautions to prevent a gouge.

As soon as the first reports were heard that drought and then frost had damaged the Brazilian crop, American speculators and roasters rushed to stock up. The price of green coffee started bouncing up, not only on Brazilian coffee, but on that from other countries where there had been no frost. Some prices jumped as much as 50 percent on the wholesale commodity market before they leveled off. Green coffees which a year ago had been 34-37 cents a pound now are 47-49. At retail, the price you pay jumped from 69 cents to 81 for a one-pound can, and from 57 cents to 71 for bagged coffee.

But the coffee-producing countries operating under the coffee agreement obviously failed to release enough additional coffee to alleviate the drastic price jump. For example, the Intl. Coffee Council added only 1 million more bags of coffee to the world market through quota adjustments. This is just a drop in the coffee pot, especially when compared with the supplies the coffee-producing countries are holding.

Similarly, the New York Times reports that in El Salvador, "considerable amounts of surplus coffee are reported in the hands of beneficiators and exporters," and the "National Coffee Dept. has authorized exportation of surplus coffee from the last crop" provided the prices "are in accordance with those of similar Central American coffees on the New York market." (Note that they will export additional coffee only if it does not affect the price.)

IT IS HIGHLY doubtful that much of the extra price you now pay has gotten back to the South American workers in the coffee trade. A piece of the additional money has been snared by each of the retailers, roasters, importers, exporters and other middlemen.

Not only are there heavy stocks of coffee still in the hands of the exporting nations, but also here in the U.S. In fact, right now many U.S. roasters are beginning to offer "cents off" deals. One coffee roaster explained to us that this means the large roasters are trying to clear their surplus inventory while maintaining their official prices.

One of the most ironic features of the purported coffee shortage is that the roasters and South American exporters keep right on advertising it heavily on television.

Consumers can, of course, help the coffee trade solve the "shortage" of coffee by using it very conservatively. When coffee prices rise, U.S. housewives traditionally use more water or take tea. The Pan-American Coffee Bureau says the "best" brewing procedure gets only about 45 cups per pound. But the national average is around 60-62 cups. Too, as noted above, bagged coffee is noticeably cheaper than vacuum pack. Instant or soluble coffee is least expensive and has been much improved in recent years. It now represents over a third of all household coffee consumption. You get about 220 cups from a pound of soluble coffee, so that the current cost is about one-third less than that of regular coffee.

Fewer Production Workers:

Defense Plants Use More Technicians

Changes in defense requirements have led to an increasing proportion of white collar and highly skilled workers and a drop in the ratio of those manning production lines, according to a new Labor Dept. study.

The number of engineers, scientists, technicians and highly skilled craftsmen is increasing as higher proportions of defense spending are devoted to missile and spacecraft items and their complex electronic systems, and lower proportions to the more traditional types of materiel.

The study covers employment trends in defense industries from 1958 through 1963, and is detailed in an article, "Employment Impact of Changing Defense Programs," in a recent issue of the department's Monthly Labor Review.

It shows that an estimated 6.7 million persons were engaged in defense work last year—nearly 10 percent of all U.S. employment. The federal government employed about 2.7 million in the armed forces and another 1 million in defense-related government agencies. About 3 million worked in defense-connected jobs in private industry.

Defense industries were divided for purposes of the study into five broad categories — aircraft and parts; communication equipment; electronic components; ordnance and accessories, and ship and boat building and repair.

"In the five major defense-related industries," the Labor Review article states, "production workers fell between 1958 and 1963 from 64 to 57 percent of all workers compared to a drop of only 1 percent (from 75 to 74) for all U.S. manufacturing.

"Another evidence of changing occupational patterns in defense work comes from a recent survey covering several hundred thousand employes in plants making aircraft, missiles and space vehicles. Between 1955 and 1961, hourly employes fell from 76 to 54 percent of the total number of workers surveyed, while engineers, scientists and technicians increased from 14 to 22 percent."

The article quoted a Bureau of Labor Statistics study which determined that in January 1962 engineers, scientists and technicians represented 18 percent of all workers in ordnance, communications equipment, electronic components and aircraft combined, compared to about 6 percent for U.S. manufacturing.

"The relatively high percentages of well-educated and highly-trained personnel may be one factor," the article said, "facilitating placement of defense workers in other jobs in the economy, if layoffs occur due to shifts or cutbacks in military and space programs."

Pat Gorman Gets Darrow Award

Chicago—Sec.-Treas. Pat Gorman of the Meat Cutters was presented with a Clarence Darrow humanitarian award at the third annual commemorative evening sponsored by the community center honoring the memory of the late lawyer and crusader for human rights.

Gorman was unable to accept the award in person because of a death in the family and it was received on his behalf by his administrative assistant, Hilton Hanna. Among other recipients was Edward Marciniak, executive director of the city's Human Relations Commission and a former vice president of the Newspaper Guild.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Nothing Tarnishes So Quickly As a Status Symbol's Status

WHAT DO YOU WANT for your ninth birthday?" I asked Molly.

"Well, I know one thing I want," she said. "I want a new kind of pen like Sally's."

"What kind of pen is Sally's?" I asked.

"I don't know what you call it," she said, "but oh, Mommy, it's just neat! It's made of some shiny stuff that looks kind of like marbles, and it has a little doohicky on the side that you can push up and down. And when it runs out of ink, you can fill it from an ink bottle. The tip's made of gold, and it writes all smooth and slippery. Oh, it's just neat!"

Needless to say, Sally's neat new pen was an old-fashioned fountain pen, which is currently enjoying a renaissance. This should come as no surprise when you consider the two-for-a-quarter depths to which the ballpoint pen has fallen.

When something becomes so cheap that anyone can afford it, or so simple that anybody can do it—who wants it?

Take television. The first people who bought sets were the envy of the neighborhood. Gradually, as the price went down, a TV set became standard household equipment. Having one was nothing to brag about, but not having one was embarrassing enough so that some people who didn't, put antennas on their roofs anyway.

Look what happened to the outdoor barbecue. No, first we'd better go back a few years and look at what happened to the kitchen stove. Each new model was more streamlined, more automatic and more wondrous than its predecessors. When the apex of pushbutton efficiency was achieved, what happened? We all turned off our stoves and rushed outside to grill over smoking charcoal.

NOW THAT the outdoor barbecue has been outfitted with motorized spits and electric outlets and warming units—now that it has become as foolproof as the electric stove—barbecuing has lost its glamor, and we're heading back to the dining room. The dining room, incidentally, has gained stature because lots of people nowadays don't have one.

And so it goes. Nothing tarnishes as fast as a status symbol's status. It loses its point if all the neighbors have one, too.

Status symbols lose their novelty so fast nowadays that sometimes there doesn't seem to be anyplace to go but backwards. We hail newfangled inventions with cries of glee. But when the newfangled invention becomes so foolproof that any dope can do it, so cheap that anybody can have one or so wearable that it's becoming to everybody —then the heck with it!

At least it keeps progress from getting out of hand.

Rollcall on Job Rights in Transit Bill

Here is the rollcall by which the House of Representatives amended the mass transit bill to protect the job security, pensions, fringe benefits and bargaining rights of local transit workers. The vote for the labor-supported amendment was 233-171. Supporting the amendment were 206 Democrats and 27 Republicans; opposed were 141 Republicans and 30 Democrats.

On labor's scoreboard a vote for the bill was a right vote (R), while a vote against was a wrong vote (W). Other symbols: A—absent; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; NV—not voting. Numerals denote districts; AL—at large.

Key Provisions of New Civil Rights Act

Following is a summary of the new Civil Rights Act. All sections of the act except that dealing with employment discrimination take effect immediately. The employment provisions become effective a year from now.

Job Discrimination

Background: Negroes have been barred from jobs solely because of their race. Other minority groups have also suffered from job discrimination, although to a lesser degree. Some progress has been made—through fair employment laws enacted by 25 northern states, through presidential orders barring discrimination by federal contractors, through efforts by the trade union movement to clean up pockets of discrimination. But there has been growing realization that federal legislation is necessary to overcome the effects of generations of prejudice.

New Law: Employers, employment agencies and unions are barred from discriminating on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin or sex, effective one year after the Civil Rights Act is signed. At that time, the law will cover all employment agencies and union hiring halls, employers with 100 or more employes and unions with 100 or more members in industries affecting interstate commerce. The following year, minimum coverage drops to 75 employes or members, a year later to 50, and thereafter to 25 or more.

In addition to barring discriminatory hiring practices, the new law prohibits discrimination in pay or other benefits. It prohibits segregation or classification of employes in a way which deprives any group of employment opportunities.

Unions may not discriminate in membership or job referral or segregate members by race. All apprenticeship and training programs must be free of discrimination, whether operated by employers, unions or jointly.

Help wanted advertisements or other job notices may not list race, color, religion, sex or national origin unless these are bona fide job qualifications.

No employer, employment agency or union may retaliate against employes or applicants for employment because they have challenged discriminatory employment practices.

Among the groups exempted from coverage are public employes. Federal employes, however, are protected from discrimination by a presidential executive order.

It is clearly stated that the new law does not require racial or religious quotas or "balancing" in employment, union membership or training programs. Neither does it interfere with seniority or merit systems, or the setting of different standards of pay, or the giving of professionally developed ability tests, so long as such actions or programs were without intent to discriminate.

A bipartisan five-member Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) is established by the bill, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The commission can be appointed immediately, even though the balance of the employment section of the bill does not take effect for a year.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission may—but is not required to—cede jurisdiction to states or cities with enforceable fair employment laws. In such cases, complaints would be handled under existing state or local procedures.

Where jurisdiction has not been ceded, an elaborate procedure for investigating and adjudicating complaints is established with this important proviso:

The Attorney General may bypass all prescribed waiting periods and intermediate steps and file an immediate court suit when he has reasonable cause to believe that there is "a pattern or practice of resistance" to the law. He may obtain a three-judge federal court to hear the case promptly.

For other cases, the procedure is as follows:

1. State or local fair employment commissions are given 60 days to handle complaints before application can be made to the federal commission. During the first year of a state or local law, the time is extended to 120 days.

2. After that time period, or immediately if there is no applicable state or local law, either the aggrieved individual or one of the members of the federal commission may file a written charge with the EEOC.

3. The federal agency then has 30 days to attempt to settle the dispute through informal methods of conference, conciliation and persuasion, with the right to extend this period another 30 days if circumstances warrant.

4. If the EEOC is unable to secure voluntary compliance, the aggrieved individual may then file a suit in federal district court. The court may at its discretion appoint an attorney to represent the complainant without cost to him. It may also permit the Attorney General to intervene if he certifies the case is of general public importance.

5. If the court finds there has been intentional unlawful discrimination, it may enjoin the defendant from engaging in the unlawful practice and order hiring or reinstatement of the employe with or without back pay (payable by the employer, union or employment agency responsible for the practice).

6. If a court order is disregarded, the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission can commence legal action to enforce the order, subject to appeal.

Public Accommodations

Background: Most of the sit-ins and other demonstrations against segregation have been aimed at restaurants, stores, theaters and hotels which discriminate against Negroes. The Supreme Court has ruled unconstitutional discrimination in tax-supported facilities or segregation required or enforced by law. Otherwise discrimination by privately owned establishments is presently banned only where prohibited by state or local laws. The question was whether establishments serving the public were free to "choose their customers" to the extent of imposing indignity and humiliation on persons with different skin coloring or religion.

New Law: Discrimination because of race, color, religion or national origin is prohibited in:

- Hotels, motels or other lodgings, except for owner-occupied rooming houses with less than six rooms for rent.
- Public eating places, including restaurants, cafeterias, lunch counters, soda fountains.
- Movie and legitimate theaters, concert halls, sports arenas and stadiums.

Establishments not specifically included, such as barber shops, bowling alleys and retail stores, are included if they are located in or attached to a covered establishment (for example, a store containing a lunch counter or a barber shop in a hotel).

The attorney general is authorized to seek a civil injunction to prohibit a "pattern or practice" of illegal discrimination, and may request a three-judge court to hear the case.

An individual denied his rights may sue for an injunction. The court may, at its discretion, permit the attorney general to intervene in the private suit. The court may also appoint an attorney to represent the complainant.

States and communities with their own laws against racial discrimination are given 30 days to handle complaints before an individual may file a federal suit. Federal courts may provide a further extension of time for the state agency to complete action.

In jurisdictions without such laws, the federal court may refer complaints to the newly established Community Relations Service for 60 days, extendable to 120 days if there is a reasonable chance of obtaining voluntary compliance.

The waiting periods do not apply to suits brought by the Attorney General, and courts are directed to expedite such cases.

School Desegregation

Background: Ten years after the Supreme Court's historic decision that segregated schools are unconstitutional, the pattern of compliance remains spotty, with many deep South areas having resisted even token desegregation.

New Law: The Attorney General is authorized to file suit for desegregation of public schools and colleges if he receives a signed complaint, believes the complaint has merit, and certifies that the aggrieved individuals are unable to initiate and maintain legal proceedings. The suit may be filed only after he has notified the local school board or college authority of the complaint and given them a reasonable time to take corrective action.

It is specified that this law does not authorize any U.S. officials or courts to issue any order seeking to achieve racial balances in schools by transporting children from one school to another. It also makes clear that there is no prohibition to classification and assignment of students for reasons other than race, religion, color or national origin.

The U.S. Office of Education is authorized to provide technical assistance and make financial grants to help local school systems prepare for desegregation and train school personnel to deal with desegregation problems.

Voting Rights

Background: Experience showed the need to strengthen the voting rights provisions of the 1957 and 1960 civil rights laws. In parts of the South, registrars used technicalities and subterfuges to disqualify Negro applicants. Court proceedings were often subject to long delays.

New Law: In elections for federal office, registrars may not apply different standards to Negro and white applicants. Safeguards are established to assure the fairness of literacy tests. Minor, irrelevant errors on voting applications may not be used to disqualify applicants. A person who has completed the sixth grade in an English-speaking school is presumed literate, subject to evidence to the contrary.

Courts are directed to expedite voting cases. If the Attorney General brings a suit charging a pattern of discrimination, either he or the defendant may have the case heard by a three-judge federal court, whose decision can be appealed only to the Supreme Court.

Public Facilities

Background: The Supreme Court has consistently ruled that facilities owned or operated by a city, county or state, must be open to all persons without regard to race. Nevertheless a Negro turned away from a public library, park or swimming pool has an often-lengthy and costly legal battle to get a court order upholding his rights.

New Law: The Attorney General may bring a suit to desegregate public facilities. Previously he could only file a "friend of the court" brief and the burden of the suit would rest on the complaining party.

In order to file a suit, the Attorney General must certify that the aggrieved individual is unable to initiate legal action because he is to poor, or because he can't obtain a lawyer or faces a risk of personal injury or economic retaliation.

Federal Funds

Background: Many programs financed wholly or in part by federal funds are administered by state or local agencies with little or no direct federal control. Federal funds have in the past gone to segregated schools, colleges, hospitals and training programs.

New Law: This title of the bill enunciates the constitutional principle that no person may be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving federal funds. It directs federal agencies to issue nondiscrimination rules and regulations for all programs receiving federal assistance. These agencies are authorized to enforce their rules by cutting off funds after hearings and after 30 days notice to appropriate congressional committees. Withholding of funds is subject to judicial review.

Other Key Provisions

- The life of the Civil Rights Commission is extended for four years. It is given additional authority to serve as a national clearinghouse on civil rights and to investigate vote fraud cases.
- There is established in the Dept. of Commerce a new Community Relations Service authorized to seek a voluntary solution of community problems arising out of discrimination.
- Under existing law, civil rights cases involving a denial of equal protection of the law may be remanded to state courts by a federal district judge whose action is not subject to appeal. Such a decision may now be appealed to higher federal courts. The Attorney General is also given authority to intervene in private suits involving equal protection of the law.
- The Census Bureau is directed to gather voting statistics based on race, color and national origin in areas recommended by the Civil Rights Commission and on a nationwide basis in connection with the 1970 census. Such information could presumably be used as a basis for reducing representation in the House, under the 14th Amendment, for states which deny the equal right to vote.
- In any criminal contempt case arising under the Act, except voting rights cases, defendants are entitled to a jury trial on demand, with a limit on sentences of six months in prison and a $1,000 fine.

Voting cases continue to be governed by a 1957 law limiting the penalty a judge may impose without a jury trial.

Labor Urges GOP to Stress U.S. Strength, Social Goals

Goldwater Firms Grip On GOP

By Willard Shelton

San Francisco—The Republican National Convention rolled toward the opening of its formal nominating sessions July 13 with the forces backing Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona firmly in control of the platform committee and apparently in control of a clear majority of the 1,308 delegates.

The belated effort launched a month ago by Pennsylvania's Gov. William W. Scranton to upset the Goldwater bandwagon brought a variety of party bigwigs before the platform committee with pleas that the convention repudiate various positions on public issues Goldwater has expressed in the past.

The tight control exercised by the Goldwater managers was evidenced by refusal of the platform committee majority to be drawn into public fights over the issues Scranton's backers raised with differing degrees of provocativeness. Committee Chairman Melvin R. Laird of Wisconsin quoted newspaper sources to estimate in advance that Goldwater had "some 60" of the 102-member unit "committed" to his nomination.

Party big names testifying in opposition to Goldwater positions included Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York, former Ambassador (and U.S. senator from Massachusetts) Henry Cabot Lodge and Scranton himself.

Scranton arrived here boldly de-

'Work' Drive Fizzles Out In Oregon

Salem, Ore.—A proposed state constitutional amendment to outlaw the union shop failed to gain a place on the Oregon election ballot this November. It didn't even come close.

An initiative petition, which required 46,600 signatures by July 3, had fewer than 1,000 names on file when the deadline passed.

The repudiation of the anti-union shop proposal was described by the National Council for Industrial Peace as "the most emphatic on record."

Before the signature drive got under way in May, the Oregon Supreme Court barred the use of the phrase "right-to-work" on the peti-

PEN USED TO SIGN historic Civil Rights Act of 1964 is presented by Pres. Johnson to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. Also shown are the Rev. Martin Luther King and Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.), House sponsor of the legislation.

South Generally Complies:

President Speeds Effective Rights Act

By David L. Perlman

Pres. Johnson hailed widespread southern compliance with the new Civil Rights Act as "wonderful and very hopeful." Despite a hard-core of violent resistance, the first tests of the law found Negroes peacefully admitted to many previously-segregated restaurants, cafeterias, hotels and theaters.

The President foresaw "a long, hard road to travel before we will have achieved all of our objectives" of equal rights. But the end result, he predicted, will be "a better nation and a stronger nation."

Quick Senate confirmation was expected of Johnson's appointment of former Florida Gov. LeRoy Collins as director of the new Community Relations Service, which will work with states and communities to bring about orderly compliance with the law.

Meanwhile Collins and two other former governors began a series of missionary visits to state capitals. The group included Sec. of Commerce Luther H. Hodges, a former North Carolina governor, and former Tennessee Gov. Buford Ellington.

Johnson also named Arthur H. Dean, a Republican and former chief U.S. negotiator at the Geneva disarmament conference, as chairman of a blue ribbon advisory committee to Collins.

The President directed all government agencies with responsibilities under the law to begin work "without delay" and said meetings will be held with "representative groups to promote greater understanding of the law and to achieve a spirit of compliance."

Fund Request Due

He also announced that he will send to Congress a priority request for funds to finance the Community Relations Service and carry out other provisions of the law. The fund request is scheduled to go to the Capitol July 20, when Congress reconvenes after the Republican convention.

In a televised speech to the nation, Johnson pledged to see that the new law is "faithfully executed."

Issues 'Indivisible,' Meany Declares

San Francisco—The two "indivisible" issues of national security and social progress are "fundamental" to the nation's welfare and "overshadow all the rest," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the Republican National Convention platform committee here.

Challenging the committee to write its "party's charter for a better world," Meany said that the U.S. cannot be secure against the threat of communism "unless it overcomes its own economic and social shortcomings," nor can Americans "maintain and improve their way of life" if the free world "falls before the forces of totalitarianism."

These twin points, he noted, were "precisely the points" he had offered the platform committees of Republican and Democratic conventions in 1960 and, he said, "their urgency remains undiminished."

Testifying before the full platform committee of more than 100 members, headed by Rep. Melvin R. Laird (Wis.), Meany appealed for a platform sufficiently detailed to let voters know what the party proposes to do about "each issue" affecting the lives of a considerable number of citizens.

He pointed out that the AFL-CIO itself had submitted to the convention a detailed statement in printed form of programs reflecting the "broad range" of federation interest, and that the identical document would be submitted to the Democratic convention.

He rejected the argument—offered here by various GOP spokesmen—that platforms in the past have been "too long and confining" and should be replaced by a "brief statement of principles."

"We believe that party platforms are important," he declared. "They are supposed to inform the voters."

Randolph Chosen for Top Medal

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph is one of 30 Americans to receive the highest civilian honor the President of the United States can bestow—the Presidential Medal of Freedom.

Pres. Johnson announced the selection of Randolph and the 29 other winners, including John L. Lewis, president emeritus of the United Mine Workers, as an expression of the nation's gratitude to the men and women whose "creative talents and demonstrated excellence" have had "a broad impact on the lives of their fellow citizens."

The national honors program was created by Pres. Kennedy in February 1963 to single out those who have made "exceptionally meritorious contributions to the security or the national interest of the United States, to world peace, or to cultural or other significant public or private endeavors."

Among the first 31 winners last year was AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

The White House statement on the winners noted that Randolph "for many years has been in the

Symbol of U. S. Ideals Seen in Gompers Ship

Bremerton, Wash.—The USS Samuel Gompers "will symbolize both the nation's determination to safeguard human liberty and its dedication to the cause of human brotherhood," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said here at the keel-laying ceremony for the Navy ship named for the founding president of the AFL.

Pres. Johnson, in a message read by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, paid tribute to Gompers as a "man who laid the keel for one of the nation's most significant social institutions, the free trade union movement" and insured for working men and women the "basic right of representation that is essential to industrial democracy."

Wirtz praised Gompers as a co-worker for peace with the late Pres. Woodrow Wilson and thanked shipyard workers for their help in keeping the Navy strong and efficient.

Gompers, Meany told the audience at the Puget Sound Naval Yard, "never lost sight of the fact that the preservation of peace—and the security of American freedom—could only be assured by America's strength."

Drive Pressed To Preserve 11 Navy Yards

The AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., which has organized the great majority of workers in the nation's naval shipyards, is now taking the lead in a movement to organize congressmen and senators to help keep the shipyards in operation.

The department announced that Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.) has agreed to serve as chairman of a bipartisan committee of members of Congress whose districts include Navy shipyards or shipyard workers.

Metal Trades Pres. B. A. Gritta said the goal of the conference is to develop "a united effort to prevent the closing of any of the naval shipyards." All 11 shipyards, he stressed, are "vital to the defense of the nation and to the well-being of the communities" where they are located. "They are designed, staffed and equipped to serve as vital links in our naval chain of command."

The congressional meeting, to be held in the office of the House Judiciary Committee, which Celler heads, has been set for July 22. The invitation to congressmen and senators stressed that the government "has a large investment not only in the physical property and equipment at these yards, but also in the more than 88,000 trained and experienced civilian workers." The letter further declared:

"The losses which would be experienced by our country through the shutdown of any of these yards would far exceed any relatively small immediate monetary savings which might be thus achieved."

Anti-Poverty Bill Cleared by Senate Group

The Administration's omnibus anti-poverty bill won a strong 13-2 endorsement from the Senate Labor Committee—with only GOP Senators Barry Goldwater (Nev.) and John G. Tower (Tex.) voting against it.

Three other Republican senators voted with the committee Democrats to send the bill to the floor after trying unsuccessfully to amend it to give greater control of funds to state and local governments.

The bill, backed by the AFL-CIO, would establish a youth job corps somewhat similar to the New Deal's Civilian Conservation Corps, and a companion "home town program" of part-time jobs for teenagers. Other features include a work-study program of subsidized jobs for needy college students and a $340 million fund for community-sponsored anti-poverty programs.

The Senate committee stepped up its consideration of the bill after earlier plans to bring it up first in the House ran afoul of delays in the Rules Committee. The legislation is high on the Administration's priority list for action when Congress reconvenes after the Republican convention.

Steel Contract Covers New Canadian Pension

Collingwood, Ont.—What is believed to be the first contract in which an employer has agreed to pay the employes' share of the proposed Canada Pension Plan contribution has been signed by Steelworkers Local 6320 and Collingwood Shipyards, Ltd.

The agreement covers about 1,000 workers who will receive a package of 32.5 cents an hour over three years.

Goulet came for a wardrobe fitting, then took a lesson in hand basting from Janizie Rhoads, right. Longshore Talks Open, Job Stability Stressed

New York—The need of longshoremen for greater job security is so compelling that the time "may well be ripe to institute a guaranteed annual wage or similar program," ILA Pres. Thomas W. Gleason said as contract negotiations opened with 145 employers in the port of New York.

The job stability issue was underscored, Gleason noted, in a report on manpower utilization in the New York port made by the U. S. Labor Dept. after a year's study under the terms of a settlement which ended a 34-day strike of 60,000 Atlantic and Gulf Coast dockworkers in 1963.

The ILA is gratified, Gleason said, that the report emphasizes one important point—that neither the longshoremen nor their union can be expected to consider changing port work practices unless major steps are taken by the industry to provide greater job security.

Also noteworthy, he said, is the fact that a "fair reading of the report demolishes the claim made by some employers that this port is plagued by widespread and wholesale 'featherbedding.'"

"The most that can be said," Gleason declared, "is that the Dept. of Labor indicates that in some pockets in the port, and on some types of cargo or some classes of vessels there is not at present a full utilization of all employes.

"That is a far cry from the widely publicized exploitation of the loaded term 'featherbedding.'"

In current negotiations the union intends, Gleason said, to "devote itself to making a success of the free bargaining process."

Before the talks started the ILA presented employers with a list of proposals for improving the job security and the wages of members here. At the first bargaining sessions, employers proposed to bargain on the basis of the Labor Dept. recommendations but the union said it would hold management to its promise to present counterproposals first.

The manpower report released by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz urged labor and management to use the collective bargaining table to improve manpower utilization and provide protection for the basic workforce "consistent with present-day standards." Other recommendations:

- If changes are made in the future, the union should be given sufficient advance notice to permit development of joint labor-management plans for protection of men whose jobs would be eliminated.
- Job-protection plans could include retraining of present workers in operating new equipment or helping to establish themselves in other industries. Severance pay was listed as one possibility.
- About a quarter of the total registered workforce of 27,000 works 700 to 1,600 hours yearly in this port. A plan could be developed to give these men more of the work now going to "casual" employes.
- Methods are available to provide more work for the basic force—limiting new hires, now averaging 10 percent a year, reducing the 17 percent of the workforce—the casuals — who work less than 700 hours.
- Both parties could work together to eliminate excess absenteeism from work.

'Work' Drive Fizzles Out In Oregon

tion. The court upheld a labor protest that the phrase is a "false . . . misleading . . . prejudicial" description of a proposed measure which "does not provide or guarantee any employment for anyone."

George Brown, State AFL-CIO director of legislation and political education, told the AFL-CIO News that Oregon employers' organizations discouraged and refused to support the attempt to ban the union shop.

A local John Birch Society leader publicly proposed a "right-to-work" petition campaign early this year, Brown recalled, but the only one who picked up the idea was Mrs. Margaret Fields, a housewife who was defeated in a primary contest for the state legislature. She set up a headquarters in Portland and launched the unsuccessful statewide petition campaign.

The failure in Oregon was the second successive defeat for the "right-to-work" movement in a two month period. In May, Oklahoma voters decisively rejected a "work" amendment in a statewide vote.

Screen Actors Win Contract Goals

Hollywood—The Screen Actors Guild achieved major contract objectives for the casts of TV entertainment films in a new long-term agreement reached here on the eve of a strike deadline.

Union negotiators, authorized by an overwhelming majority of SAG members to call a strike if necessary at midnight July 9, broke through to new contract gains with an agreement that goes to a nationwide mail referendum of the union's 15,000-plus members.

For the first time, actors covered by the new pact will share in the income from U.S. television films telecast overseas. That income has been mounting for producers every year and recently reached the $50 million mark, union sources noted.

The agreement, for a period of three to four years, also calls for these increases in residual payments to actors:

For second runs, payments will be boosted from 35 percent of the applicable minimum scale to 50 percent; for third runs, rates are raised from 30 percent of scale to 40 percent; fourth, fifth and sixth runs remain at 25 percent of minimum.

For films shown abroad, actors will be paid up to 25 percent of the applicable minimum—a major gain, the union declared.

Besides other improvements, the new pact provides that all TV programs in future shall end with the name and role in the play of each actor, shown in legible type.

Referendum Authorized

At the close of negotiations, SAG directors called a special board meeting to vote on the new pact and to authorize a membership referendum. Full details of the pact were not disclosed pending the vote.

The settlement ended a deadlock which developed when, after nearly two months of negotiations, producers and network representatives had failed to make any substantial concession toward union contract goals.

Acting Pres. George Chandler had warned management negotiators that a strike was "inevitable" unless the industry made some tangible effort toward recognizing membership objectives, particularly increased rerun compensation and payment for foreign exhibition of TV films.

Strike Authorized

At a meeting here June 22, SAG members voted by some 1,200 to 6 to authorize a walkout if necessary to "obtain what is fair and equitable." The executive board set a July 9 date and strike authorization ballots were mailed to members—stars, character actors, stunt and bit players, singers and announcers.

Union contracts for 10 years had contained the same formula for residuals, and SAG negotiators had observed that, though the "growth and profits of the television industry have been nothing short of phenomenal," film actors' services, "exhibited everywhere in the foreign markets of the world," have gone uncompensated.

The new pact corrects that shortcoming, the union declared.

Board Order Condemns Anti-Union Racist Poster

A northern clothing manufacturer who permitted the display in his southern plant of a poster appealing to race prejudice during a union organizing campaign has been found guilty of unfair labor practices.

The finding was made by the National Labor Relations Board, which ordered Durant Sportswear, Inc., of Durant Miss., owned and operated by Alvin and Larry Shutzer of Lawrence, Mass., to stop interfering with the organizing efforts of the Clothing Workers and to reinstate a fired union supporter with back pay, plus interest at 6 percent.

The poster was hung in the raincoat department of the Mississippi plant a few days before a scheduled representation election last Aug. 13 as a highlight of anti-union demonstrations staged by employes with the acquiescence of management.

Trial Examiner Thomas S. Wilson said that throughout the day, Aug. 9, "respondent permitted antiunion signs, balloons and placards to be carried or otherwise displayed" on machines and light fixtures while groups of employes marched through the plant singing antiunion songs.

The signs were of the "vote no" variety and supervisors made no attempt to stop the demonstrations or have the signs removed, the examiner wrote.

Poster Described

A bundle boy hung up a poster which remained "in full sight of the employes for a full day at least," according to Wilson, who said the poster, 2 by 2.5 feet in size, showed a Negro woman saying to a white woman:

"Mr. Kennedy and the union man says we'uns must work with you'uns."

The examiner, exploring all aspects of the legality of the employer's conduct, concluded as follows:

"This poster goes beyond mere notification that the union favored integration and the employment of Negroes. Otherwise why is reference made to (the late) Pres. Kennedy? What did he have to do with the union representation election?

Integration Theme

"Could it be that he was mentioned in order to recall to the employes recent events relating to integration in which he was involved at Oxford, Miss., located only 100 miles from Durant?"

The examiner concluded that "this propaganda poster threatened" the firm's white employes with loss of their job tenure, or less pleasant working conditions and therefore its display violated the law.

Other law violations cited by Wilson, and upheld by the board, included threats to union members by foremen, a poll by a foreman of union sympathizers, and statements by management personnel that the plant would move if the union won.

The election was postponed when the union filed charges last Aug. 12. The Durant plant has 250 employes, of whom only one is a Negro, board reports show.

Faupl Cites Goals:

ILO's Role Stressed In Changing World

Geneva—American worker delegate Rudolph Faupl reminded the Intl. Labor Organization that its fundamental tasks were "to advance the welfare and safeguard the freedom of workers all over the world."

"This is what the ILO has been doing for 45 years," he told the 110-nation agency's 48th conference here. But he warned that "it is a job which is not finished and never will be finished because we live in a dynamic and ever-changing world."

Faupl stressed in his major address to the conference of government, worker and employer delegates the importance of the ILO's work in setting international standards of working and social conditions.

Safeguard Standards

"The standards established in the past must be safeguarded and protected while they continue to apply" in accordance with the international treaties in which they are set out, Faupl said.

"At regular intervals," he continued, "they must be re-examined and brought up to date in response to changing needs."

The conference prepared the first draft of a new international accord regulating the employment of youngsters in mines. It will be adopted in its final form next year and sent to governments for ratification.

The draft accord would prohibit anyone under 16 years old to be employed in underground work. This limit is now set at 15 years under an ILO convention of 1937 concerning minimum age standards for workers in industry generally.

But the new proposed standards specify that a minimum age of 18 years should be the goal in all countries for underground work in mines.

"We must not drag our feet too long" in getting 18 years established as the minimum age permissible, British worker delegate William E. Jones told the conference on behalf of all the workers.

The conference adopted a strongly worded declaration denouncing the "degrading, criminal and inhuman racial policies" of the South African government. The declaration called on the government to renounce without delay its apartheid policy of racial segregation and repeal all measures that violate "the principle of the equality and dignity of man." South Africa recently withdrew from the ILO.

It also addressed a "pressing appeal" to the governments, workers and employers of all ILO countries "to combine their effort and put into application all appropriate measures" to get South Africa "to heed the call of humanity."

In addition, the conference adopted two amendments to its constitution. The first would permit the suspension or expulsion of any ILO member state against whom the United Nations has taken such action. The second would enable any ILO conference to bar the participation of any country found by the United Nations to be "flagrantly and persistently" following a policy of racial discrimination such as apartheid. The two constitutional amendments must be ratified by two-thirds of the ILO member governments before their adoption is final.

Child Welfare Aid at Stake In D.C. Funds

The question of whether or not children in the nation's capital should be punished for the plight of the parent is again nearing the answer point as a Senate subcommittee prepares to act on appropriations for the District of Columbia.

At issue is the federal-state program of Aid to Dependent Children of Unemployed Parents.

Broad Support

The AFL-CIO and the Greater Washington Central Labor Council are joined with over 40 civic, church, social welfare and other groups in fighting to win the ADC-UP program for the District.

Congress in 1961 made matching funds available to states—and the District—if they set up ADC-UP programs of extending welfare aid to children in such hard-hit families. A number of states responded.

Congress, which legislates for the District, has failed to set up such a program for the District. Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W. Va.) strongly opposed the ADC-UP program and he chairs the Senate subcommittee now considering appropriations for the current District budget. A House subcommittee has approved the program.

Labor and social welfare experts have pointed out that the District's so-called "man-in-the-house" rule forces the unemployed family head to desert his family so his children can receive welfare aid.

Community support for the program is reflected in a District primary vote of 72,000 to 1,612 in favor of ADC-UP.

U.S., Japanese Labor Agree on Principles

The AFL-CIO and the newly-merged Japanese Confederation of Labor have signed a pact agreeing to promote free trade unionism in Asia, to work for economic progress and international fair labor standards and to seek genuine world peace and human freedom.

A seven-point agreement spelling out specific positions followed the statement of principles in the document signed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec. Gen. Seiji Amaike of the Japanese labor group.

The Japanese Confederation of Labor (Domei Kaigi) will come into being officially in November with the merging of three labor groups: Zenro, Sodomei and Zen Kanko.

In the first point of the agreement, the AFL-CIO welcomes the creation of Domei Kaigi and announces it will send a fraternal delegation to the inaugural convention.

The joint pact set forth three general principles:

"1. To promote free and democratic trade union movements;

"2. To secure economic prosperity and the establishment of international fair labor standards;

"3. To promote genuine international peace, human freedom and social justice."

The specific points represented agreed-on conclusions after discussion of problems concerning free trade union organization, trade, peace movements and particular trouble spots.

These specifics follow:

- "In view of their common grave concern over the developing economic difficulties and Communist subversion, especially in Southeast Asia, the two organizations will cooperate with the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions in strengthening its Asian Regional Organization and expanding democratic trade unionism throughout Asia."
- To promote free trade unionism, a more effective labor leader exchange program should be created.
- Expansion of trade and removal of trade barriers between free peoples is "especially important." The expansion of U.S.-Japanese trade, to be sound and equitable, must rest on fair labor conditions for the workers of each nation. Recognizing that Japanese unions are making "significant efforts to raise wages," it is agreed that, should unfair economic competition due to "unjust" labor conditions develop, the two groups would work jointly to correct the situation.
- The trend towards the international flow of capital calls for close cooperation to facilitate effective collective bargaining.
- Both organizations will exert their fullest efforts to achieve "genuine international peace." Both groups reject "the pseudo-peace movements which exploit the worldwide yearning for peace" and serve as the instruments of any totalitarian power. Domei Kaigi understands the AFL-CIO position on effective international inspection and control in steps of disarmament. The AFL-CIO understands Domei Kaigi's cooperation with Kakkin-Kaigi, which promotes an anti-nuclear weapons movement out of realistic humanitarian orientation in the context of Japan's anti-bomb movement.
- Both groups will work for free and democratic trade unionism in Okinawa through cooperative efforts.

THE AFL-CIO AND THE JAPANESE Confederation of Labor (Domei Kaigi) have agreed on a statement of principles and a program to promote free trade unionism, expanded trade under fair labor standards and genuine world peace. Roy Davidson Dies, Headed Rail Engineers

Cleveland, O.—Chief Engineer Roy E. Davidson of the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers died here at 63 after a brief illness and was buried after services in Cleveland and at the graveside near Hammond, Ind.

Davidson worked as a fireman from 1917 to 1937 and as an engineer in the Hammond area until his election as assistant BLE chief in 1947. He took the top union office Aug. 1, 1960, as successor to Guy L. Brown. Davidson's post now goes by automatic succession to Perry S. Heath, first assistant chief.

Symbol of U. S. Ideals Seen in Gompers Ship

come "infinitely more important" than Gompers could have ever dreamed, the federation president said, but the basic fact remains unchanged, "that strength of every kind—social and economic strength, as well as military power"—is needed.

In the two years from the keel laying to completion of the first destroyer tender to be built by the Navy since 1945, the strength of the nation must be built up in other ways, the federation president declared.

"Let us hope, for example, that the terms of the civil rights bill, which has now become law, will become in the fullest sense a part of the fabric of American life.

"Let us hope that the war on poverty—and especially on its basic elements, unemployment and low wages—is well along toward victory.

"Let us hope that the barriers to full educational opportunity—all the barriers, including lack of money—have been wiped out.

"Let us, in short, hope that this ship will carry the flag of a nation that is meeting and overcoming its shortcomings; a nation that is closer to the complete fulfillment of its ideals and aspirations. For these are also essential to the defense of freedom."

The vessel named for Gompers—who was born in England, came to the United States as a cigarmaker and was a member of that union when he helped found the AFL in 1886—will have a crew of 135 officers and 1,668 enlisted men. It will be 644 feet long, have an 85-foot beam and displace 20,500 tons.

Dedicated to Justice

Meany pointed out that Gompers dedicated his life to the cause of social and economic justice. "Under his leadership trade unions grew strong enough to fight for better wages, for shorter hours, for improved conditions on the job," Meany said.

Citing Gompers' role in the creation of the Intl. Labor Organization, Meany declared that the security and hopes for progress in America "are inseparable from the security and progress of all peoples . . . we as Americans realize that in the long run, this country's well being is linked to the development of freedom and good living standards everywhere."

Meany himself won a tribute from Sen. Henry Jackson (D-Wash.) for "helping preserve and rebuild free labor unions" abroad, and for seeking to keep the nation strong and free.

Participating in the ceremony were Pres. Paul Werner of the Bremerton Metal Trades Council; Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., and Presidents Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers, Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers, James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks, Carl W. Sickles of the Asbestos Workers and Russell M. Stephens of the Technical Engineers.

For a Better America

The AFL-CIO's platform proposal to the Republican and Democratic national conventions is prefaced by the following statement by Federation Pres. George Meany.

THE MODERN LABOR movement long ago outgrew the role of "special interest group" in the narrow sense. The AFL-CIO is made up of 13.5 million men and women who live in every state of the union; who are engaged in virtually every occupation except business proprietorship; and whose interests, not only as union members but as citizens, embrace every facet of American life.

This infinite variety is reflected in the ever-widening scope of the AFL-CIO's legislative program, for we try to represent the needs and aspirations of all workers, in all phases of their lives. Thus we are for more clear trout streams as well as for better unemployment compensation; for a humane immigration policy as well as a shorter workweek.

What we have tried to set forth in the following pages is a program for a better America—the kind of America our members want, the kind of America in which they, together with all their fellow citizens, can enjoy full and equal opportunity on every front; the kind of America which can continue to lead the fight for freedom throughout the world.

This is a long document because the list of things that need to be done, to bring about that kind of America, is also long. Yet we are confident that all those things are attainable by the dedication and genius of the American people.

'A Greater Cause'

A ONE-MINUTE speech by a courageous young congressman from Georgia on the floor of the House deserves to be broadcast throughout the land as the nation adjusts to the new civil rights law.

Rep. Charles L. Weltner (D-Ga.), who ousted a bitter-end segregationist in his election to represent the Greater Atlanta area, used the minute to explain why he was voting for the bill after originally opposing its House passage. He said in part:

"We can offer resistance and defiance, with their harvest of strife and tumult. We can suffer continued demonstrations, with their wake of violence and disorder.

"Or, we can acknowledge this measure as the law of the land. We can accept the verdict of the nation.

"Already, the responsible elements of my community are counseling this latter course. And, most assuredly, moderation, tranquillity and orderly processes combine as a cause greater than conformity.

". . . I shall cast my lot with the leadership of my community. I shall cast my vote with that greater cause they serve. I will add my voice to those who seek reasoned and conciliatory adjustment to a new reality.

"And finally, I would urge that we at home now move on to the unfinished task of building a new South. We must not remain forever bound to another lost cause."

Meany Calls on Labor to Meet Challenge Posed by Rights Act

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany issued the following statement immediately following Pres. Johnson's signing of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

THE SIGNING of the Civil Rights Bill is, of course, a great historic occasion, the culmination of a remarkable legislative achievement. But far more than that, this signing represents a challenge to American society—a challenge that calls for the full realization in fact of the rights now established by law.

The trade union movement, like every other segment of American life, must do its part in meeting that challenge.

More than a year ago I called upon all state and local central bodies of the AFL-CIO to set up community-wide programs on civil rights, in keeping with a policy unanimously adopted by the 1961 AFL-CIO convention. We have established a top-level task force to assist in this job. A considerable number of these programs have been established in concert with civil rights organizations, church and civic groups and local government officials.

The results have been encouraging, but the effort must be broadened. Therefore, I have today urged all the state and local central bodies to intensify existing programs and to initiate them where they do not yet exist. In particular, I proposed a greater involvement of employers in every community.

The rights set forth in the new law—such as the rights to register and vote—will not be automatically bestowed upon those who have hitherto been denied them. Nor should they lie in abeyance until enforced by federal prosecution, while the rest of the community sits back. This would flout the national consensus which the civil rights law represents.

THE BASIC RIGHTS of all Americans which this law confirms are also the responsibility of all Americans, in their own communities. I expect the trade union movement to do its part in seeing that the responsibility is fulfilled.

In addition, the labor movement has a special responsibility. Title VII of the law, covering fair employment practices, will not take effect until a year from today, but we cannot wait.

The labor movement has fought for fair employment practices legislation for many years. We have worked hard and effectively to bring equal opportunity closer to reality in unionized establishments and within union organizations. We have never claimed total success; that is why we asked the support of law. But it is undeniable that racial discrimination is worst where there are no unions.

Now we must prepare to go further. I will ask the AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its meeting on August 3, to call a national conference of affiliated unions and state central bodies to work out a program through which the AFL-CIO can best help to implement the terms of the civil rights law.

One important phase of such a program will deal with Title VII. It seems obvious to me that the AFL-CIO, which serves as spokesman and champion of all workers in so many other respects, should also take the lead in assuring fair employment practices. We have already established machinery to process and resolve civil rights complaints by union members; it is my hope that means can also be devised through which the affiliated unions of the AFL-CIO can process grievances of workers against employers —organized and unorganized—as well.

By the time Title VII takes legal effect, voluntary compliance would be widespread. To this end, we now look for the full cooperation of employers and employer organizations.

We in the AFL-CIO are proud of our part in helping to bring about the measure that today has become law. Just as we did everything in our power to support its enactment, so will we exert every possible effort to clothe it with full reality.

As we have said many times, this requires more than full enforcement, and even more than full community efforts; it requires a full employment economy. But until that end is achieved, we and all other Americans have a deep obligation to make the spirit which this signing represents become an inherent part of the life of our nation.

'Our Commitment As a People. . .'

The President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy issued a statement welcoming the Civil Rights Act as "our commitment as a people to equality of opportunity for all Americans and to our basic beliefs in the dignity of the individual."

The tripartite group declared that "it is incumbent upon all of us in business, labor, and the general public to respond now with understanding and determination so that this law will signify a new step in American social justice."

Morgan Says:

An Opulent America Searches Uneasily for Sense of Values

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

SAN FRANCISCO—Last Saturday night while a mammoth Fourth of July fireworks display was showering red, white and blue sparks into the dark waters of San Francisco Bay, a visiting blonde student from Switzerland turned from the dazzling spectacle and spoke with a mixture of wonder and worry to her young American escort. "Everything in your country is so big," she said, her face a study in the rockets' red glare, "that an individual feels utterly lost." "It is hard," the boy agreed, "when everybody is trying to be somebody in such a large place."

Morgan

Perhaps the American hugeness is part of our perplexity, a private lost feeling mixed with pride in our national dimensions and an incessant urge to be identified, personally, nevertheless. Whether we rate a Bigelow on the floor or not, we insist on having our name on the door, on the desk or pinned like a bucolic passport to the lapel. A woman's organization called Zonta International has beaten the Republicans to the punch and is holding its convention in this fabulously beautiful city of San Francisco this week. The good ladies of Zonta are zooming through the lushly carpeted corridors of the Fairmont Hotel atop Nob Hill with identification tags as big as license plates fastened to their bosoms. Opulently dressed, painstakingly coiffed, bizarrely chapeaued, expensively shod, their expressions, curious, eager, a little apprehensive, seem to reflect a vague anxiety that they would somehow become anonymous without their rectangular labels even though they are supposed to be at home in their own country.

THIS OBSERVER has never seen his native land look fatter and sassier but as our affluence increases our self-confidence somehow does not seem to be strengthening, apace. We have, literally, never had it so good and yet the gathering furrow on the public brow appears to reflect a concern lest our goods along with our identities may be taken away from us.

Yet surely history will chronicle our time as manifesting the arrival of the great American middle class. Not forgetting the worthiness of the President's war on the pockets and foxholes of poverty nor the cruel problem of hard core if minority unemployment reflecting the ruthlessness of automation and the inadequacy of our education, among other things, still, comforts undreamed of three generations ago are within easy reach, via cash or credit card, of the majority of citizens.

You can travel first class by air, on the family plan, as I did between Washington and Chicago. Then you can change to one of the few deluxe trains still running in this migratory republic, the Santa Fe Super Chief, and speed across the continent in streamlined, aluminum-encased comfort to Los Angeles in less than 40 hours. This used to be the crack train of movie stars and millionaires and they still take it occasionally, but this silvery all-Pullman special has now become the conveyance of the middle class multitude. On board were the retired Long Beach couple returning from a bargain tour of Europe, the commercial artist from Winnetka on his way to Hollywood, a merchant from Detroit taking his family to the international convention of Kiwanis clubs in Los Angeles or the honeymooners from Dodge City on their way to Disneyland.

DISNEYLAND ITSELF is fast becoming a kind of national shrine, its emblem goggle-eyed children in Mickey Mouse hats rampant on a field of fun.

Certainly there is a magnetic, nostalgic charm to Disneyland's turn-of-the-century Main Street with its apothecary, ice cream parlor, general store, horse-cars and all the rest that went to make up the slower, simpler life of yesteryear.

But remembrance of things past is only part of the picture. The youngsters' eyes are zeroed in on submarines and rocket ships and electronically-controlled highways of the future. And up the California coast, here in San Francisco, the Republicans are beginning to gather to grapple with the problems of the present. Everywhere the accent is on growth—more babies, more houses, more income, more cars, more comforts. A New York Times dispatch in the San Francisco Chronicle this morning reports that while medicare for people may be dead in this Congress, a medical care plan for household pets, including one rabbit, is already in operation in New York state.

Another of our difficulties in this incredible cornucopia of America is in developing a sense of values. Sometimes we seem to be more concerned about property values than human values, about a cat's welfare more than a senior citizen's health; it is easier to be concerned about our chattels than our commitment of responsibility to the world. Whether the GOP convention will clarify these values remains to be seen—but it could.

Washington Reports:

Mass Transit Measure Seen Key to Solution of Traffic Ills

THE MASS TRANSIT BILL approved by Congress can help solve the "time-consuming, temper-rousing, accident-causing traffic jams" that plague U. S. cities during rush hours every day, Rep. William B. Widnall (R-N. J.) and Rep. Leonor Sullivan (D-Mo.) asserted in interviews on the AFL-CIO public service program, Washington Reports to the People, heard on 700 radio stations.

The measure provides $375 million to be used over three years to improve the service, equipment and general efficiency of metropolitan transit systems. Widnall and Mrs. Sullivan are members of the House committee that considered the measure.

"I don't think anyone who is for this bill honestly argues that $375 million will be the solution," said Widnall, "but it can provide the foundation, at least experimentally, to see whether we can't do a better job than we're doing today."

Mrs. Sullivan gave as an example of what can be done the bi-state authority that was set up in St. Louis, with 14 bus lines in the immediate Missouri and Illinois area taken over, with duplications eliminated, and efforts made to give a faster, better service.

"Much more needs to be done," she said. "What we need is vivid imagination and daring planning."

Widnall urged improvement of rail service to provide speedy transit and avoid further crowding of already congested highways and streets.

"THIS IS A PUBLIC service and alternate means of transportation that we must have," he insisted. "It is vital to our economy, to our national defense. . . ." Should the population explosion continue as expected over the next several decades, he said, "unless we do something now, our big cities will die on the vine."

He said his district was typical of others near large cities, with the people who work in New York City coming from not only New Jersey, but Long Island, New York state and Connecticut. Coordination of metropolitan services is necessary in such areas, he said.

Subways were one of the alternative means of transportation suggested by Mrs. Sullivan, who said that St. Louis even has the underground passages that were once used by the railroads.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

SAN FRANCISCO—"The delegates are unhappy," charged Pennsylvania's Sen. Hugh Scott, floor manager for Gov. William W. Scranton's belated bid for the Republican presidential nomination. "I've never seen such a downcast convention. They're sitting on their hands; they give the impression that they are waiting for the unfolding of events already prearranged."

The senator seemed a little unhappy himself, for he was making no headway whatever in his efforts to provoke the Goldwater forces—serene and unruffled, calmly waiting for the opposition to talk itself out—into a public fight.

The Goldwater people wouldn't be provoked. They patiently sat and listened to a parade of witnesses who prodded at their hero's record, who urged a platform in marked variance with Sen. Goldwater's long-established personal convictions. They were not impolite, or hostile, or cold to these witnesses. They sat in an apparently respectful silence and each witness used up his allotted time and was dismissed—for the most part without any questions giving him a chance to emphasize his points.

Said a Goldwater lad to a reporter after a few days of what seemed to be the deadly dullness of the session, "The thing the liberal press is sore about is that we're not acting like a bunch of kooks." In short, the disciplined self-control of the Goldwater delegates was a policy matter deliberately decided on and executed. And it worked—at least until it was directly challenged by Scranton himself, who made his platform appearance a head-on assault on Goldwater's public record.

TO THE GOLDWATER zealots the press is always "the liberal press," the "unfair press," a conspiratorial band that persists in "misrepresenting" or "misquoting" the senator. It is never the senator's fault that he uses the words that are quoted. Goldwater senses correctly that most of the Washington political reporters consider his approach to both foreign and domestic policy issues highly limited if not naive. He blames them for the unfavorable editorial reception he gets from publishers of newspapers long distinctly committed to the Republican Party itself.

Thus Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce, a last-minute Goldwater supporter, publicly associated herself with the charge that the "liberal press" was unfair to her new-found hero. Even the magazines Time and Life, her husband's properties, were less than fair to the senator, she argued.

She listed the reasons other potential candidates had lost out to the Arizona senator—Rockefeller because of his "remarriage" and Scranton because he couldn't make up his mind fast enough; Ambassador Lodge because he'd gone to work for the Democratic Administration, Nixon because he'd had an "ill-tempered press conference and moved to New York at the wrong time."

To some, it seemed that Mrs. Luce was saying negative things—that Sen. Goldwater was the prospective nominee merely because all others, even though perhaps better qualified on the basis of experience and approach, had blundered and ruined themselves. Still, it was altogether likely that she had associated herself with the winning candidate.

GOV. SCRANTON'S direct attack on Goldwater's voting record evoked some excitement at last. But the discussion was limited. The applause he received came primarily from spectators rather than platform committee members. The vast majority of the members, who are voting delegates to the convention, sat still and listened.

The word had just come from Columbus, Ohio, that Gov. Rhodes had indicated he would release his 58 delegates from their obligation to vote for him on the first ballot as a favorite son. Goldwater would get most of them.

URBAN TRAFFIC JAMS may eventually be overcome through operation of the mass transit bill just approved by Congress, according to Rep. William B. Widnall (R-N. J.), left, and Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.). They were interviewed on the AFL-CIO public service radio program Washington Reports to the People.

SPEAKING TO THE NATION from the East Room of the White House, Pres. Johnson asked the cooperation of all Americans "to eliminate the last vestiges" of racial injustice. He then signed the Civil Rights Act before an audience which included its leading supporters from both parties and from Negro, labor and church groups.

Johnson Hails 'Wonderful' Response As Civil Rights Law Goes Into Effect

It's goals will be realized, he predicted, "because most Americans are law-abiding citizens who want to do what is right."

The Civil Rights Act, the President declared, "does not give special treatment to any citizen. . . . It does say that those who are equal before God shall now also be equal in the polling booths, in the classrooms, in the factories and in hotels and restaurants, movie theaters, and other places that provide service to the public."

The early reports of compliance which the President found so "hopeful" included these highlights:

- The Jackson, Miss., Chamber of Commerce, resisting pressure from the segregationist Citizens Council, called on businessmen to comply with the act and "maintain our standing as a community that abides by the law." Negro leaders were received courteously at the city's leading hotels—except for one establishment which closed down.
- In Birmingham, downtown restaurants were quietly integrated and Negroes were served without incident. The same was true in most other southern cities.
- Major chains of hotels, motels, cafeterias and restaurants which had abided by "local custom" on segregation, ordered their managers throughout the South to comply with the law and serve customers regardless of race.
- Sen. Allen J. Ellender (D-La.), who voted against the civil rights bill, told his fellow-southerners in a broadcast that defiance of the law would be "foolhardy and indefensible."
- A number of southern newspapers editorially urged acceptance of the law.

Troubled Mississippi also saw another racial barrier toppling as a federal district judge, himself an avowed segregationist, ordered gradual desegregation of public schools in three districts. Mississippi is the only state which has no desegregated schools below the college level.

The three areas are Jackson, the state capital; Biloxi, site of Keesler Air Force Base where some 15,000 troops are stationed, and rural Leake County, where Negro high school students must travel 20 miles a day on a bus because they can not attend a nearby modern white high school.

There were other stories in the news also—of militant defiance, particularly in smaller towns, of terrorism against Negroes who tried to test their new-won rights, of savage beatings by hate-ridden mobs.

Although not related directly to a test of the Civil Rights Act, the beating of three Negroes at a mass rally in Atlanta to hear Alabama's Gov. George C. Wallace and former Mississippi Gov. Ross Barnett was a bloody contrast to the pattern of peaceful acceptance of social change.

Randolph to Receive Medal of Freedom vanguard of his people's fight against discrimination in industry, in organized labor and in the armed services."

Randolph, 75, is president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. He was the chief founder of the union and has been its president since it was formed in 1925. He was a vice president of the former AFL and became a vice president of the AFL-CIO at merger in December 1955.

Lewis, 84, was president of the UMW from 1920 to 1960 and the first president of the former CIO.

In announcing the 1964 Medal of Freedom winners, the President said "these individuals add distinction to this high award. Each person we honor has previously honored his fellow man by setting himself a standard of excellence only he was able to achieve. Collectively they have made man's world safe, his physical body more durable, his mind broader, his leisure more delightful, his standard of living higher and his dignity important. They are creators; we are the beneficiaries."

A. PHILIP RANDOLPH

Those receiving the medals range in age from 37 to 86 and include 25 men and five women. Three of the recipients are Negroes, two of whom are women.

Others Honored

Besides Randolph and Lewis, the President's list includes:

Dean G. Acheson, former secretary of state; Detlev W. Bronk, educator and scientist; Aaron Copeland, composer; Walter Disney, motion picture artist; J. Frank Dobie, historian; Lena F. Edwards, humanitarian and physician; T. S. Eliot, author; John W. Gardner, educator; Theodore M. Hesburgh, educator; Clarence (Kelly) Johnson, aeronautical engineer; Frederick Kappel, corporate executive; Helen Keller, educator of the handicapped; Willem de Koonig, painter, Walter Lippmann, journalist; Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne, performing artists; Ralph E. McGill, journalist; Samuel Eliot Morison, historian; Lewis Mumford, urban planner and critic; Edward R. Murrow, radio and TV journalist and former USIA director: Reinhold Niebuhr, theologian; Leontyne Price, singer; Carl Sandburg, poet and historian; John Steinbeck, author; Helen B. Taussig, medical scientist; Carl Vinson, legislative leader; Thomas J. Watson, Jr., corporate executive; Paul Dudley White, physician.

IUE Victory Ends Reign of Independent

Rochester, N. Y. — Electronics workers at the Stromberg-Carlson Div. of General Dynamics, Inc., have voted to leave the Rochester Independent Workers and have named the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers as their bargaining representative.

The vote in a National Labor Relations Board election was IUE 1,183, RIW 730, others 233. Later this month an additional 1,000 workers at the same corporation's Rochester Electronics Center will vote in a runoff election between front-running IUE and the independent, which has represented most General Dynamics workers here for more than 25 years.

The IUE has had members in the plants since 1950 but the current successful drive was highlighted last December by the election of an IUE-favoring slate of RIW officers.

Hospital Care Left Out:

Bill Ups Benefits In Social Security

The House Ways & Means Committee has formally approved a series of amendments to the Social Security Act dealing with benefits, tax rates and coverage—but not with hospital insurance for the aged.

Principal provisions of the bill, which is expected to be brought to the House floor soon after the GOP convention under a "no amendment" rule, are as follows:

- All social security benefit payments would be increased 5 percent across the board.
- Eligibility requirements for old age and widows' pensions would be eased to permit persons 72 or over to receive a special basic benefit of $35 a month if they have had at least 12 months of covered employment since the beginning of the program in 1937. Present law requires a minimum of 24 months.
- Benefits to a child, which now must be terminated at the age of 18, would be continued until age 22 if the child is in school.
- Widows and dependent children would be able to choose reduced benefits at age 60. These would be 71.25 percent of the deceased husband's benefit, as contrasted with the 82.5 percent the widow would receive if she waited until age 62.
- Self-employed medical doctors would be covered by social security for the first time.
- Cash tips amounting to more than $20 a month would be counted as wages for social security purposes. The employe would report the amount of tips to his employer at the end of each month. The employer would then pay his share of the social security tax on the amount reported and would deduct from the worker's regular pay the employe share of the tax.
- Firemen and policemen, now excluded from social security, would be put on the same basis as other city and state employes. They could be covered if their employer agrees and they approve the proposal in a referendum.

To finance the added benefits, the social security tax would be increased and would apply on the first $5,400 of annual earnings instead of the present $4,800 ceiling.

The tax rate on employers and employes would be raised to 3.8 percent in 1965, 4 percent in 1966-67, 4.5 percent in 1968-70 and 4.8 percent thereafter.

This compares with the present schedule which calls for a 3.625 percent rate through 1965, 4.125 percent in 1966-67, and 4.625 percent in 1968 and thereafter.

Job Injury Law Petition Drive Is Challenged

Salem, Ore.—A court test may be necessary to determine whether a labor-sponsored amendment to Oregon's workmen's compensation law will be on the ballot in November.

Oregon State AFL-CIO officials filed more than 58,000 signatures on an initiative petition—well above the number necessary to qualify.

The petition proposed to raise benefits an average of 18.5 percent and extend compulsory coverage under the state-administered workmen's compensation program to all workers. Under present law, some employers bypass the program and take their chances on being sued by workers injured on the job.

Oregon Sec. of State Howard Appling, Jr., held up certification of the petitions pending an opinion by the state attorney general on an objection by opponents that the initiative did not contain the full text of the compensation law. The question is expected to end up in the courts.

Central Bodies Urged To Press Rights Effort

Following is the text of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's letter to all of the state and city central bodies of the AFL-CIO:

You will recall that in June 1963 I wrote to you, urging the prompt establishment of bi-racial committees or councils in every community to accelerate the destruction of racial barriers at every level.

My letter was prompted by a request from Pres. Kennedy. However, as I pointed out, what the late President asked was no more than the policy adopted by the 1961 AFL-CIO convention.

Now the Civil Rights Bill is not just an objective; it has been signed into law by Pres. Johnson. The full achievement of civil rights for all Americans is no longer just a matter of good will, it is now a matter of law.

It would be tragic for America, and for the labor movement, if law were the only reliance now. Enlightened self-interest, as well as abstract justice, demands that we in the AFL-CIO exert maximum leadership to bring about massive compliance in every phase of community life.

Therefore I call upon those of you who have set up and joined in community civil rights programs to intensify your efforts. And I call upon those of you who have thus far failed to act to delay no longer.

In particular, I urge you bring about the fullest possible involvement of the employers in your community. Employers as a whole have stood aloof from the civil rights struggle; they cannot remain aloof from the law.

In every sense, we in the AFL-CIO have a special obligation to implement the law we supported and the principles it represents. This can best be carried out in the states and communities. I urge you to move promptly and vigorously; and I again remind you that my office stands ready to provide whatever advice, counsel or technical assistance you many need.

Meany Tells GOP:

Strength, Progress Nation's Twin Goals

The committee received with applause major AFL-CIO principles Meany voiced on military security and on the clash between the U.S. and other democracies and the communist nations.

It showed no comparable response to Meany's call for vigorous "implementation" of the new civil rights law and for "massive public investment" by the federal government to overcome poverty, to "put idle men and dormant skills to work," to "use our plants and equipment to the full," to "put the nation back to work—the whole nation—and build a better society."

In the area of security, Meany warned, "one basic truth remains absolute" despite much talk about the "changing nature" of communist states. Each one stands for "the destruction of freedom," and the menace exists in the "so-called 'aggressive' states led by Red China" and in the Soviet Union "even when Chairman Khrushchev is in a 'smiling' phase," and it is "just as true" of the regimes controlling "Romania, Poland, Hungary and all the rest."

"Maybe we should plead guilty," he said, to the charge that U.S. labor is "rigid" in this area when it comes to freedom on the one side and communism on the other. "Yes, we are rigid, but we are also 'rigid' in our devotion to peace," he pointed out.

"We favor every practical approach toward a peaceful accommodation, in the military sense, with the communist powers," he emphasized.

The AFL-CIO urges "military strength, maximum strength, at all levels" including nuclear capacity and "a more flexible force" to deal with "brush-fire outbreaks" allowing defense of "the frontiers of freedom without inviting the obliteration of mankind," he declared.

This level of strength is "indispensable," he urged, "until the Communist powers agree to a genuine disarmament program—one that can be verified, beyond doubt, by both sides."

He laid heavy emphasis also on foreign aid as contributing to the "equally vital" need for economic strength in the free world. The AFL-CIO represents, he pointed out, "the largest organized group of taxpayers," but it has consistently called for "more foreign aid, not less." Nearly "a quarter" of the federation's own income, he pointed out, "goes into overseas projects" aimed at supplementing government programs.

Meany hit hard at one proposal, offered in certain business quarters, for expanded trade with communist states in the anticipation of business profits, and lashed as "an outrage to common sense" the further proposal that this trade might be financed with government credits.

A totalitarian state uses trade "strictly as a political weapon for the benefit of the regime in power," he charged. "The AFL-CIO is not willing to help perpetuate a dictatorship in the name of corporate profits—or even to make jobs."

"We are perfectly willing to trade American goods" but "in return for steps toward human freedom," he said, asking:

"How about demanding the removal of Soviet troops from Hungary; how about elections in the Baltic states which even Stalin promised nearly 20 years ago; how about destruction of the Berlin Wall?"

On the issues of "domestic abundance and social justice," he pointed out, he had warned both Democratic and Republican conventions four years ago that the unemployment rate had been at "5 percent or more for nearly three years." Now he had to emphasize that "it is still at that level."

And today, four years later, one-fifth of the nation still lives in poverty "fitting the classic description of the great depression—'ill-fed, ill-clothed, ill-housed'," he added.

These basic problems "remain almost untouched despite the longest uninterrupted peacetime boom in at least a generation," he said.

There have been "some gains" in special fields but "the core of the problem is unemployment."

Even civil rights progress lies under the shadow of joblessness, Meany warned, for equal opportunity cannot be realized without "full opportunity."

Paying tribute to the bipartisan leadership that passed the bill in Congress, he declared the law "is far stronger, in word and spirit, because it was brought about by leaders of both parties."

The act must be implemented, he warned, "by administrators who believe in it, equipped with adequate staffs and appropriations." He called for an "unprecedented effort" throughout the land to bring about "interracial understanding."

Still the rights battle "was not waged to win equal rights to unemployment or an equal distribution of poverty," he declared.

In 1960, he said, he felt he had been compelled to argue at the political conventions that "poverty really existed." While today that is not necessary, there is the almost unrecognized fact that now "the private, profit-making segment of the economy . . . is providing fewer fulltime jobs than 10 years ago."

"I hope the statement comes as a shock to you," he told the committee. "It shocked me," but in fact, in the industries historically providing mass employment—manufacturing, mining, agriculture and the railroads—"jobs have been melting away."

These facts add up to "chronic unemployment, chronic poverty, in the midst of abundance," and "this, we feel, is intolerable," he urged.

He asked the platform committee to declare that the federal government should acknowledge its responsibility under the Employment Act of 1946 and "meet that responsibility" with massive public works.

A statement submitted to a platform committee panel by Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. emphasized principally the civil rights and labor relations planks to be considered.

LABOR AND CONGRESSIONAL leaders who worked for passage of the fringe benefits amendment to the Davis-Bacon Act were invited by Pres. Johnson to witness the signing of the bill. In the foreground are AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), and Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. Behind Pres. Johnson is Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.); then, partially concealed, Pres. John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers, Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers, and AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller. Roosevelt and Humphrey were among the principal sponsors of the legislation.

Goldwater Forces Hold Firm Grip On Platform Group, Delegates

claring that he expected to become the convention nominee and to "win" in November for the GOP.

The platform committee hearings, judging by the minimal and mild questions addressed to these witnesses, seemed a probable preview of the convention itself.

The convention schedule called for a keynote speech the opening day by Gov. Mark Hatfield of Oregon, adoption of the platform on the second day and a major speech the same night by Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, two-term former GOP President who has steadfastly refused or declined to stay hitched to any clear-cut expression of preference among Republican contenders this year.

Nomination Lineup

Nomination speeches are due the third day, July 15, with Goldwater due to be placed in the race by Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois, the party's Senate floor leader, backed up by seconding speeches by Rep. Charles A. Halleck (Ind.), the House leader; Sen. John G. Tower (Tex.), the South's only Republican senator, and Goldwater's California campaign manager, former U.S. Sen. William F. Knowland.

Scranton has announced that he will be nominated by Milton S. Eisenhower, president of the Johns Hopkins University and brother of the general.

The rollcall on the presidential choice was rescheduled for the period immediately following nominations—a change from the previous announcement that balloting would be put off until the fourth day.

This was a correction of a mistake, GOP spokesmen said, but it seemed possible that the balloting was deliberately advanced to check the possibility of explosions over rival policies and candidates.

The fourth day, July 16, was reserved for the choice of a vice president. GOP National Committee Chairman William E. Miller announced also that former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon had been "rescheduled" to speak that day to "introduce to the convention its nominee for President."

In the 1960 convention when Nixon was nominated for the top place, Goldwater himself played a comparable role, speaking to the convention to urge unity for the campaign and suggesting that delegates dissatisfied with the candidate and platform could try again another year.

Scranton forces in the platform committee and elsewhere failed to arouse any heated dispute with their warnings that Goldwater "can't win" in November and that the party would suffer from his vote against the civil rights bill, his refusal to "repudiate" what were termed right-wing "infiltrators" of the Republican party such as John Birch Society members, and his publicly stated past positions on the United Nations, social security, the graduated income tax and other issues.

Rockefeller in his platform committee testimony set forth at least 12 direct challenges to Goldwater's past statements on these and other issues. He was asked only three questions following his statement—two of them "friendly" questions by Scranton supporters inviting him to name the Birch Society specifically as a group that should be identified as an infiltrating menace to the "party of Lincoln." He did not do so.

Lodge, who resigned as ambassador to Vietnam to come home and "help Scranton," reminded the platform committee of the mission of the Republican party to "vindicate democracy and perpetuate the union." He suggested a "Republican-sponsored Marshall Plan for our cities and schools."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany testified before the platform committee urging a vigorous "indivisible" program of military strength and western unity and of "progress" at home toward "abundance and social justice." Also testifying was the president of the National Association of Manufacturers, W. P. Gullander, with Walter F. Carey, president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, scheduled for the final day of hearings. (See separate story on Meany testimony.)

Two major spokesmen for Negro groups got no questions at all from a platform committee panel after they had warned that a convention failure to affirm the "constitutionality" of the rights law would be a dereliction of duty.

The civil rights witnesses were Roy Wilkins of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Rev. Martin Luther King of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. A Negro convention delegate from Chicago, State Rep. William H. Robinson, joined them in pleading for specific delegate declaration to keep the "unfolding of civil rights . . . bound up with the history of the Republican party."

A platform committee drafting unit was scheduled to work out a tentative party declaration of principles after Goldwater testified personally on July 10, the final day of hearings. Laird, the committee chairman, had said repeatedly that he hoped for a relatively short and simple document setting forth general principles in harmony with previous GOP platforms.

Scranton, recognized as the only serious challenger to Goldwater's domination of the delegates, continued before his arrival at the convention a hard working effort to arouse a grassfire midwestern "rank-and-file" revolt among Republican voters aimed at stopping the Arizona senator's bandwagon.

There was no sign in advance that this campaign had detached any substantial number of delegates counted as ready to vote for the senator on the first ballot —at least 711 with only 655 needed to nominate.

There appeared a prospect that some major delegations formally pledged to "favorite son" candidates such as Gov. James A. Rhodes of Ohio, Rep. John Byrnes of Wisconsin and Gov. George Romney of Michigan, would insist on shaking themselves loose in time to ride with the prospective winner—if first-ballot tallies showed up the same on July 16 as appeared likely a few days in advance.

Labor's Stand Stressed On Key Domestic Issues

In urging the Republican platform committee to draft a "detailed and specific" platform, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany asked the committee to give "serious consideration" to the "broad range of issues" dealt with in the federation's printed statement to the committee. Among these he listed as "extremely important examples":

- Revision of the federal wage-hour law to extend coverage to presently exempt low-paid workers, increase the minimum wage to $2 an hour, reduce the standard workweek to 35 hours and increase the overtime penalty to doubletime pay.
- Repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, which permits states to outlaw union shop agreements in the guise of so-called "right to work" laws.
- Enactment of a hospital insurance program for the aged under the social security system, a program of federal aid to education at all levels, and expansion of federal housing and urban renewal programs.

AFL-CIO Analysis Holds:

More Buying Power Vital to Create Jobs

Higher wages and salaries are needed to provide a market for the products of American industry and jobs for American workers. An economic review analysis in the July issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist tells why.

The analysis, prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, makes these main points:

- When customers can't afford to buy industry's products, "goods pile up in warehouses and on store shelves, production is cut back, some workers are laid off and many others are placed on part-time schedules."
- Rising sales are essential in an economy whose productive efficiency and labor force is increasing. Since fewer workers are needed each year to turn out the same volume of production, and since the labor force is growing steadily, the increase in sales must be large enough to provide jobs for both those already employed and those seeking jobs.
- A reduction in working hours without loss of take-home pay would take care of part, but not all, of the problem, since both productivity and the labor force are growing so fast.
- In recent years, the rise of consumer buying power has lagged. Between 1947 and 1956, for example, the buying power of the factory worker's earnings rose an average of 3.1 percent a year. But between 1956 and 1963, the average annual increase dropped to only 1.6 percent.
- With rising productivity, unit production costs tend to decline. Unless wages are significantly raised or prices are cut, profits rise disproportionately as was the case in the 1920s. The result of excessively high profits and not enough buying power, the analysis notes, is "production cutbacks and unemployment, as in the depression in the 1930s. In the long run, such an economic policy has a bad effect on business as well as on workers."

To bring the economy into better balance, the AFL-CIO analysis recommends "effective collective bargaining and substantial gains in wages and fringe benefits, extension of coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act to low-wage workers who are not now protected by the law, and an increase in the federal minimum wage to $2 an hour."

It points out that the needed increases in real wages and salaries "will not occur automatically. . . . Strong unions and effective collective bargaining are required."

The overall goal is expressed as follows:

"For the individual family, wages and salaries should be high enough to maintain a standard of decent family living and to permit continuing improvements of living conditions.

"For the national economy as a whole, wage and salary incomes should be high enough to make possible the purchase of the consumer goods, services and housing that the nation can produce."

George Smith, NABET Chief, Dies at 55

Chicago — George W. Smith, president of the Broadcast Employes & Technicians, died here after a nine-month illness. He would have been 55 years old later this month.

Smith, first fulltime president of NABET, had served as chief officer of the union since 1956. He had been president of the Chicago local and worked as an engineer and technical director for the American Broadcasting Co. in Chicago.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler wired condolences to his widow declaring that "his passing leaves a void in the labor movement that will be hard to fill." His devotion to the cause of labor, they added, "will long be remembered by all persons in organized labor."

Eugene P. Klumpp of Buffalo, first vice president of NABET, automatically becomes president of the union until the next convention slated for the fall of 1965. The union's executive council will fill the first vice president vacancy at a meeting this month.

Smith is survived by his widow, two daughters and a son.

SEVENTH GRADUATING CLASS of the American Institute for Free Labor Development is addressed by Chilean Ambassador Sergio Gutierrez-Olivos in ceremonies at AFL-CIO headquarters. The ambassador told the 29 unionists that they are the answer to the Communist contention that "social progress can be best achieved in a non-democratic society." The ceremonies also honored the labor-initiated school's second anniversary.

'Tangible' Latin American Gains Credited to Free Labor Institute

Graduates of the two-year-old American Institute for Free Labor Development have already brought economic and social progress to workers in Latin America, the seventh graduating class was told by U.S. and Latin American diplomatic leaders.

In ceremonies at AFL-CIO headquarters, certificates of resident and international study training were presented to 29 Latin American trade unionists from 13 nations, including two exiles from Cuba.

Thomas C. Mann, assistant secretary of state for inter-American affairs, told the students that graduates of previous classes had already achieved "tangible benefits" for workers through collective bargaining in their homelands and many are serving their governments in development programs and councils.

Institute graduates, Mann said, are "grass roots pioneers on the very frontier of history's most ambitious concerted attempt to telescope into a few short years political, social and economic advances that have taken centuries elsewhere."

The AIFLD — jointly financed and administered by the AFL-CIO, U.S. government and business—has trained more than 4,000 Latin American trade unionists in schools in Washington and 23 countries. The school's trade union leadership program and community aid projects seek to help Latin American workers effectively participate in the democratic development of their countries.

2 Ambassadors Participate

Chilean Ambassador Sergio Gutierrez-Olivos and Ecuadorian Ambassador Jose Antonio Correa, whose nation will begin participation in the AIFLD program in August, also participated in the ceremonies.

The principal interest of the American trade union movement in founding the institute, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a luncheon audience honoring the graduates, is an earnest hope for strong, free unions which will "contribute to greater democracy and social progress while turning back the forces of dictatorship."

Meany said the AFL-CIO does not seek to organize members in Latin America nor does it expect that unions there will be similar to those in the United States. "If we have any selfish interest, it is the desire for a society based on the essential principle of human freedom," he declared.

Also at the luncheon, Kenneth Holland, president of the Institute of Intl. Education, emphasized the importance of the AIFLD's educational role.

"There is no more constructive way to help these nations than to assist in their educational development," Holland said. As a nation "we devote pennies to education in lands in which we have a vital interest compared to the sums we spend on roads, dams and industrial facilities," he pointed out.

Pres. Johnson, in a message to the graduation ceremonies, expressed hope that each graduate will carry with him the strong conviction that America stands with him in the struggle for economic progress.

The chief executive also congratulated the institute on its second birthday. The school's "first two years have been fruitful ones," his message stated, "filled with the promise of a fundamental and lasting contribution to the development of free and democratic trade unionism in the hemisphere."

Presentation of certificates was by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, who also served as luncheon toastmaster.

Serafino Romualdi, executive director of the institute, announced that the school will forego its customary summer recess this year to accommodate a special six-week training program for Brazilian unionists. The program will deal in economics, research and other specialized skills necessary in modern collective bargaining.

The next regular institute class will form in September.

Labor Bids U.S. Reject Jobless Insurance Curb

The AFL-CIO has asked the Labor Dept. to reaffirm its earlier ruling that South Dakota's "means test" on eligibility for unemployment compensation violates federal standards.

South Dakota last year penalized jobless workers who had earned more than $6,000 a year in covered employment by disqualifying them for benefits for periods ranging from seven to 13 weeks. The higher the income, the longer the disqualification period.

The original law provided that the disqualification would not go into effect if the Secretary of Labor ruled that it didn't conform to federal law. But when the secretary so ruled this January, the state reenacted the law to take effect July 1.

Raymond Munts, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, warned that if the South Dakota law were permitted to stand, the unemployment compensation program would soon change "from wage insurance to a form of relief benefits for the lowest paid unemployed workers."

Munts testified on behalf of the AFL-CIO and the South Dakota State Federation of Labor at administrative hearings conducted by the Labor Dept.

In enacting the unemployment compensation program, Munts stressed, "Congress had in mind a system under which benefits would be paid as a matter of right to unemployed workers."

Urging the Secretary of Labor to reaffirm his earlier ruling, Munts asked:

"Are workers whose earnings exceed $6,000 and who have been laid off any less unemployed than their fellows whose base period earnings were less than $6,000."

If the South Dakota law remained in force, he pointed out, there would be no obstacle to reducing the earnings limit to $5,000, $4,000 or any other figure.

"We would fear to predict what the unemployment insurance program would look like 10 years from now if this alien idea were given a green light," he declared.

Senate Action Pressed To Extend Hill-Burton

The AFL-CIO urged the Senate to give quick approval to a House-passed bill to extend and expand the Hill-Burton Hospital Construction Act.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and Social Security Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank said in a joint statement that the program of federal construction grants for hospitals has made an "enormous contribution . . . to the improved health of all Americans."

Its value will be enhanced, they told the Senate Labor Committee, by House-approved provisions earmarking a portion of the grants for modernization of existing hospitals.

When the Hill-Burton program was first enacted in 1946, they noted, the great gap in hospital care was in the rural areas and the smaller communities.

"As a result of the great success of the Hill-Burton program, this picture has radically changed," Biemiller and Cruikshank said. Today's deficiencies, they stressed, "tend instead to be concentrated in the cores of our big cities," where older hospitals are obsolete or inefficient.

The bill they endorsed would extend the basic Hill-Burton Act through 1969, earmark a portion of the funds for modernization, step up assistance for construction of non-profit nursing homes, and provide grants for planning coordinated health facilities on an area-wide basis.

On the need for nursing home expansion, the AFL-CIO statement noted:

"There is hardly a family in the country that has not had the experience of trying to find a decent nursing home or chronic disease facility for an aged relative or friend, and been shocked and dismayed at the miserable inadequacy of the vast majority of facilities."

American Airlines, TWU Reach Pact

New York—A vote by 12,000 members of the Transport Workers on a new two-year agreement with American Airlines is being taken system-wide and results will be announced July 13, the TWU said here.

The agreement, recommended for membership approval by union officers and negotiators for its air transport division, was reached on July 4.

GOP Shifts Sharply Right, Names Goldwater, Miller

LABOR'S PROPOSALS for a better America and a strong free world alliance were presented to the Republican convention's platform committee by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. Seated to Meany's left is Rep. Melvin R. Laird (Wis.), chairman of the committee. The AFL-CIO program will be presented also to the Democratic convention in August.

Platform Tailored To Ticket

San Francisco—The Republican National Convention handed Sen. Goldwater of Arizona a platform tailored to the public record of the presidential nominee.

It was a platform several thousand words shorter than that of 1960 and remarkably nonspecific on future GOP policies, foreign and domestic.

Platform Excerpts on Page 10

The massive control of the convention by Goldwater forces in framing the policy declaration was demonstrated in the platform committee's public sessions, in its executive sessions and drafting sessions as reported, and on the convention floor.

Major efforts of Goldwater opponents to challenge and amend the platform proposals, in committee or on the floor, were beaten down by smashing majorities—69 to 19 in the closest vote in committee, 897 to 409 in a dramatic civil rights showdown on the floor.

The upshot was a platform with these key characteristics:

- The platform's emphasis was heavy beyond precedent on states' rights, on repudiation of federal responsibility in social issues, a reduction in federal spending, and reduction of federal taxes.
- The specific pledges of the 1960 GOP platform in domestic areas of farm policy, hospital care to the aged, education, housing, minimum wages, labor-management relations and a great range of other issues were "incorporated" by reference insofar as "relevant to the problems of 1964."

This was left totally uninterpreted

Moderates Lose Hold On Party

By Willard Shelton

San Francisco—The Republican Party in a historic shift of emphasis, tone and direction nominated Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona as its presidential candidate for 1964.

The Arizona senator underscored the change in direction by picking Rep. William E. Miller of New York as his vice-presidential running mate.

To Goldwater, the self-described conservative champion of the Republican Party, the victory was a personal triumph won by four years of hard, slogging organization work building a solid base of support in the South and Rocky Mountain states, climaxed by decisive victory in the June 2 California primary.

Miller, who had planned to retire from Congress this year, served as chairman of the Republican National Committee that set up the convention where Goldwater won. He has been considered in the conservative wing among eastern Republicans and has long been at odds, politically, with most New York GOP leaders.

The prospect as leading Republican figures fulfilled their function of closing party ranks in the bitterly fought convention here was for a hard, bruising race for the White House leading up to the Nov. 3 election.

Goldwater, the freshly nominated candidate, said in a soft-spoken late-night news conference that he would battle Pres. Johnson in the campaign in a "vigorous" way, without "delving into gossip and rumors," and that he hoped the people would be given time to think on the issues.

Scranton Forces Lose Battle Over Platform

San Francisco—Five amendments offered to the Republican National Convention platform committee report were roared down or voted down by the dominant forces of Sen. Barry Goldwater in an emotion-filled three-hour session the day before the Arizona senator was nominated for the presidency.

The delegates booed and almost silenced New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller in the latter's leading speech urging the convention to denounce "extremists" including Communists, the Ku Klux Klan and the right-wing John Birch Society.

Rockefeller stood smiling as his "5-minute" prepared speech was interrupted repeatedly by delegate uproar before Convention Chairman Thruston B. Morton intervened after 10 minutes and urged the delegates to let the speech go on.

Rockefeller resumed to warn that Birch Society leaders had traduced the policies of former Pres. Eisenhower and branded the late Sec. of State John Foster Dulles "a Communist agent." He termed the Birch group "radical, well-financed and

Labor Fights Repeal:

Coast Drive Focuses On Fair Housing Act

Los Angeles—California AFL-CIO unions have started a major campaign against a move by the powerful real estate lobby to prohibit any legal or legislative action to insure civil rights in housing.

The controversial proposed amendment to the state's constitution is developing into the most important single issue in politics in this state during campaigns for the November election.

The measure, Proposition 14, would not only outlaw the Rumford Fair Housing Act, but would forbid any other legislative action by any city, county or state government or court which wanted to try and stop discrimination in the sale or rental of property.

Ultra-right groups, in the belief that the anti-fair housing measure has popular support, regard it as an opportunity not only to attack civil rights programs, but also to catapult themselves into centers of political life in the state.

State AFL-CIO Sec. Thomas L. Pitts has sent out letters to every local in California outlining a program of action against Proposition 14.

Unions have joined with Democrats, Republicans, church leaders and civil rights groups in forming CAP 14 (Californians Against Proposition 14), and more than 20 percent of the modest funds collected so far have come from organized labor.

Leading in Polls

Recent polls show the measure, sponsored by the California Real Estate Association, would pass if the election were held at the time polls were taken.

Max Mont, Southern California director of CAP 14, noted, however, that similar odds faced labor in its fight against the so-called "right to work" initiative at the start of the 1958 election campaign.

The "work" measure was finally defeated by more than a million

Early Pensions Negotiated by Oil Workers

Denver—The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers have negotiated a nationwide agreement with the Sinclair Oil Corp. providing early pension incentives and vacation benefits in a contract package said by OCAW to be the equivalent of a 4.5 percent wage increase.

The two-year pact was hailed as a major step toward improved job security in the oil industry, which has suffered heavy job reductions recently because of automation and new work practices.

The settlement was the first in

Rubber Talks Bring Gains In Pensions

Akron, O. — Improved pension and insurance benefits for more than 40,000 employes of the rubber industry have been won by the Rubber Workers in negotiations with three major firms—Goodyear, Firestone and General Tire & Rubber Co.

New three-year agreements, subject to approval by the URW executive board, a majority of the locals representing a majority of members, and the U.S. Internal Revenue Service were reached in separate negotiations, conducted since March in Cleveland.

16-Hour Strike

The Firestone settlement ended a strike that started 16 hours earlier when that contract expired. The other firms were not struck because they continued to negotiate until the final agreement was reached.

All the pacts provide an increase in monthly pension benefits from $2.40 or $2.50 times years of service to $3.25 per year for those who retire after Aug. 1, 1964.

A new early pension clause permits retirement at age 62 with the benefit based on the $3.25 figure, URW Pres. George Burdon said. Other highlights:

Firestone — Eligibility requirements for early pension were reduced from 20 years of service at age 55 to 15 years of service; disability pension service requirements were cut from 15 years of service to 10 years, with the pension benefit $6.50 a month for each year of service or a minimum of $100 per

Stock Plan Proposed In Auto Negotiations

Detroit—A stock purchase plan for production workers in the auto industry, along with more traditional methods of sharing the industry's vast profits with its hourly-paid employes, has been proposed by the Auto Workers in negotiations here with the Big Three of the industry.

The union, representing 575,000 men and women of the auto shops, also has asked the General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp. to put all "blue collar" workers on a salaried basis, boost pensions from $2.80 to $4.25 per month for each year of service, increase health and accident benefits and relief time, and upgrade wages and working conditions in other ways spelled out in detail by UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther and fellow union spokesmen.

UAW negotiators rejected counterproposals made by Chrysler and American Motors Corp. and put talks with the latter firm, where a "profit sharing" plan is in effect, "on the back burner" until Aug. 19, with local negotiations in three cities to start Aug. 14. Chrysler proposed a separate wage scale for new aerospace employes. The union said even present scales are too low for all aerospace workers.

While the negotiations on new contracts were under way, Pres. Johnson said at a press conference in the U.S. capital July 10 that he is confident the parties will work out a settlement "by free, private collective bargaining."

The President declared that the auto negotiators are "experienced and responsible men" and "do not want governmental intervention in these negotiations." He added "nor do I."

IUE Talks Start

On the bargining front, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers opened negotiations with GM for 25,000 workers in five electrical products plants by asking for joint answers to problems in five areas—job and income security, sharing productivity and prosperity gains, and in the fields of leisure and health.

UAW and GM negotiators have set up subcommittees to "explore" the possibility of contract changes in the areas of pensions, insurance and supplemental unemployment benefits.

The union's stock-buying proposal to Ford and GM was that when the SUB fund reaches the maximum level specified in the contract, company payments be continued and stock be purchased with the excess in the name of each individual worker.

Chrysler Different

The same proposal was not made at Chrysler, the union said, because the fund there will not reach its limit for three years. At GM the fund stands at $171 million with the top limit $189 million, about 10 months away from the maximum. Ford's maximum funding position on SUB for July is $71 million, and the fund now exceeds $63.7 million.

On the crucial issue of relief time away from the assembly line, the UAW asked Chrsvler to add 30 minutes to the present daily allowance of 24 minutes. Similar increases have been asked at Ford and GM, and will be asked at AMC, where 39 minutes per day now are allowed.

The union also has proposed that the contract package provide for money to be set aside for a scholarship fund for the children of the workers covered by contract. No amount was specified but is subject to negotiation.

USWA Strikes Six Kennecott Copper Plants

Salt Lake City—A strike of 2,350 Steelworkers at six mines and mills of the Kennecott Copper Corp. has been blamed by the union on an "unrealistic" company wage offer in the face of a company "modernization" program which may cost 1,000 jobs within three years—nearly half of the jobs in USWA units.

The union stopped work July 1 at four plants in Utah and two facilities at Ray, Ariz., after negotiations bogged down and contracts had expired. The shutdown, and observance of USWA picket lines by other unions, brought the closing of copper mining operations affecting some 7,500 workers.

Members of the USWA voted down a company offer including a wage increase of 8 cents a year for three years. This was an inadequate offer, a union spokesman said, in view of the company's profit position and prospects for continuing improvement.

Members also want protection, the USWA said, against further erosion of income due to continuing increases in the cost of living. After the union turndown management made no counter-offer and the walkout started.

month; and improved insurance and hospitalization benefits for those now on pension and for future retirees.

All pensions under the new plan have a five-year certain clause insuring five years' payment after age 65 even if the retired worker dies. A new provision gives hospital-surgical coverage for a surviving spouse of a pensioner. Weekly sickness and accident benefits rise from $40 to $60 a week for males and from $32 to $50 a week for females.

Goodyear — A 30 percent increase in future normal retirement pensions; substantial insurance improvements; extension of hospital, medical and surgical benefits to a surviving spouse; a boost of 50-66 percent in weekly benefits for non-occupational sickness and accidents.

Coverage for any one hospital confinement is raised from 120 days to 365. Pensions will be paid for five years certain to the retiree or his survivor. Eligibility rules for disability pensions also were liberalized, and provision made for payment of certain nursing charges for retirees.

General—Improvement in normal, disability and early retirement pensions is provided, along with more benefits in life and hospitalization insurance for workers, retirees and their dependents.

Affected by the pacts are 21,000 hourly-paid employes at Goodyear, 17,000 at Firestone and 3,300 at General.

Workers Go Cheap On Rental Basis

Baltimore—Want to rent a man and "save money on reliable labor?"

Rent A Man, Inc., local employment agency, says "you can do it" for $1.90 an hour. That includes "everything," says the firm in an ad offering laborers, painters and construction workers, printed in the 1964 directory of the Associated Builders & Contractors, Inc.

The ad neglects to state how much the worker will get, after deductions. But union rates here are $2.525 an hour for building laborers, $2.32 for material handlers and $3.95 for painters, as listed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Appellate Court Rules:

New Owner Bound By Arbitration Pact

The 3d U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at Philadelphia has ruled that a firm which buys another concern must abide by the arbitration provisions of an existing union contract, even though the agreement of sale ostensibly exempted the buyer from any obligation under the collective bargaining agreement.

The appeals judges, applying a recent Supreme Court decision in the Wiley case, ordered Reliance Universal, Inc. of Ohio to arbitrate any grievance resulting from its refusal to observe the terms of a contract with the Steelworkers.

Up to Arbiter

In deciding any such grievance the arbitrator may "properly give weight to any change of circumstances created by the transfer of ownership which may make adherence to any term or terms of that agreement inequitable," the court ruled.

The 3d Circuit ruling followed one with a similar set of facts in the 9th Circuit—San Francisco—where the court accepted the Wiley decision as authority for making a pre-existing labor contract unqualifiedly binding on a new proprietor.

In Wiley, the high court upheld the claim of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union that John Wiley & Sons, Inc., should arbitrate disputes over employe rights under the union's contract with Interscience Publishers, Inc., a firm bought by the Wiley corporation.

"In appropriate circumstances, present here, "Justice John M. Harlan wrote for the majority, "the successor employer may be required to arbitrate with the union under the agreement."

That was the finding the 3d Circuit pointed to in reversing a lower court decision in the Reliance case.

The case arose after the Federal Trade Commission, in March 1963, ordered the Martin Marietta Corp. to sell its Bridgeville, Pa., concrete pipe plant, where the workers had been represented by the Steelworkers for many years. Martin Marietta made the sale to Reliance and operations continued without significant change except that the new owners possessed a sale contract providing that "buyer shall not assume any obligation of the . . . [seller] under any collective bargaining agreement."

Thereafter, the court said, the union demanded that Reliance honor the outstanding contract and struck the plant when the company refused. The union then brought suit under Sec. 301 of the Labor-Management Relations Act for a court order that Reliance must arbitrate contract violations.

In their decision Chief Justice John Biggs, Jr., and Judges William H. Hastie and J. Cullen Ganey held that the union-management contract remained "the basic charter of labor relations at the plant" after the change of ownership but an arbiter should decide whether its terms should continue to apply to the Bridgeport workers.

Meany Rallies Support For Rockford Strikers

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pledged labor's united support to nearly 2,500 striking employes of the Barber-Colman Co. and called on Rockford, Ill., civic, religious and business leaders to speak out against the company's union-busting tactics before their city's reputation is "irrevocably damaged."

The federation president termed the strike by the Sheet Metal Workers "a classic illustration of a trade union's fight for survival against a reactionary corporation bent upon the denial of the rights of its employes to collective bargaining and representation by a union of their own choosing."

Organizers Jailed

Since the workers were forced on strike June 5, Meany said, "union organizers have been arrested, jailed and even shot at . . . workers have been threatened with permanent loss of their jobs if they refuse to cross picket lines . . . the union's picket captain and his family were recently terrorized by thugs in the privacy of their home."

These incidents, Meany said, have "created an atmosphere of fear and intimidation in the city of Rockford." He charged that the company "is actively recruiting college and high school youth for employment as strikebreakers," and added:

"I would strongly urge these young people refrain from strikebreaking activity, for this is a poor way to begin their employment career—as tools for a reactionary, inhumane corporation."

Meany pointed out that "the union has demonstrated its good faith by urging the creation of a committee of leading clergymen to mediate the strike issues. The company has rejected this road to a peaceful settlement." Meany called on the "fair-minded elements" in Rockford to use their influence to urge a "reasonable attitude" on the management.

The Sheet Metal Workers first won bargaining rights in February of 1963. After several months of fruitless negotiations, an interim eight-month agreement was signed. During this period, Meany said, the company sought to destroy the union, and forced a decertification election when the interim agreement was about to expire. The union won, but the best offer it could get at the bargaining table was, Meany declared, "an insult."

The company refused improvements in pensions, insurance, holidays, rejected arbitration of grievances, union security or full seniority protection. It offered no immediate wage increase, and then five cents starting in October in a 17-month contract.

"It is not surprising," Meany said, "that these workers voted by 98 percent to go out on strike."

Pulp, Sulphite Union Repels Teamster Raid

Modesto, Calif.—An attempted raid by the expelled Teamsters on the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers was defeated here by workers at Marathon, a division of the American Can Co. In a National Labor Relations Board election, Marathon employes voted 146-53 for the AFL-CIO union. The Teamsters were expelled from the federation in 1957 on findings of domination by corrupt leadership.

Raise Per Capitas:

Meat Cutters Vote Strike Fund Hike

Hollywood, Fla.—A $5 million fund to meet increased strike costs was approved by more than 1,200 delegates to the 21st convention of the Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen here.

In increasing the current strike fund from $2 million to $5 million the delegates gave the union's executive board the right to increase the international dues by not more than $1 per member in any month, but not to exceed a total of $3 in any calendar year.

At the same time the convention also approved a 20-cent increase in per capita dues to the international, raising them from $1.65 to $1.85. The increase will become effective in October 1964.

The allocation of the per capita dues will be $1.20 for the general fund, 20 cents for the death benefit fund, 10 cents for the strike fund, and 35 cents for the retirement trust fund.

Pres. Johnson, addressing the convention by long distance telephone from the White House, told the delegates that "America is moving" and urged union support for efforts to keep the nation "on the march—going, moving upward, making tomorrow better than yesterday."

The President praised the Meat Cutters for "effective" programs in "the public interest" and expressed pride in having "you as good allies in the fight for hospital care, for retired workers, for decent housing for low-income families, for schools and good teachers for every child in the land."

Among other speakers at the convention were Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, John Swift, of the Intl. Food & Drink Workers, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, and Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther.

The Meat Cutters opened wider the door for mergers with other unions through passage of a resolution empowering the union's executive board "to continue negotiations for mergers in the interest of all workers in the food and allied industries."

The resolution singled out the Packinghouse Workers as one of a number of international unions in the industry where merger is possible because it "is confronted by so many of the same problems as we are." The executive board was further instructed to pursue merger negotiations "on a fair, honorable and sincere basis consistent with the principles and objectives of our international union."

A merger between the Meat Cutters and the UPWA was called off only a week prior to a joint merger convention in 1956. Periodic merger talks have since taken place.

In the meantime, the Meat Cutters have merged with the Sheepshearers, the Stockyard Workers Independent Union, the United Leather Workers, the Intl. Fur & Leather Workers, and the National Agricultural Workers.

Both incumbent executive officers of the union, Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman were reelected at the convention along with 21 vice presidents.

Firemen Oppose Social Security Bill

A proposal to bring fire fighters under the social security laws would do more harm than good, the Intl. Association of Fire Fighters has declared.

"Firefighters do not object to higher benefits for workers covered by social security," the union's officers declare. "We have spent almost 50 years negotiating pension plans on the state and local level tailored to the specific needs of fire fighters. We wish to retain these plans."

Potters' Delegates Back Scholarships, Housing

Long Beach, Calif.—The Operative Potters climaxed their 70th annual convention by establishing a college scholarship program for youth and endorsing a housing project for the retired.

The scholarship program will bestow three $500 awards for four year terms. After the fourth year, IBOP will have $6,000 a year going into the program for children of its members. Scholarships are expected to begin in September 1965.

In the housing project, IBOP Pres. E. L. Wheatley said details of a funding program to construct retirement housing in the East Liverpool, O., area—headquarters of the union—are yet to be completed. Approval of an allocation up to $50,000 earlier was given by the executive board.

A market survey will be made to determine the scope and need existing in the East Liverpool area, Wheatley said, noting that there are many retired people "who have neither the money nor the inclination to retire in Florida or California." He said many had indicated to him they would like to "remain in the area where they have lived for many years rather than uproot themselves and relocate in their later years."

The IBOP convention, with nearly 200 delegates present, also approved a resolution protesting foreign imports of pottery and similar goods which are "flooding this country from low-wage nations."

One of the controversial issues, a move to hold the union's convention every two years instead of every year was defeated by the delegates. Wheatley urged the change as an economy measure. The delegates voted to hold their next session at Vancouver, B.C.

In his convention report, Wheatley emphasized the problem of automation faced by IBOP members.

'Hard Facts'

"Engineering of wage structures in every conceivable guise, increased production with lesser rates on incentive, plus installation of various types of technological machinery are hard facts confronting local unions and international representatives almost every day," he declared. So far, he noted, the percentage of work lost by operative potters is low in comparison to the automobile, steel and electrical manufacturing industries.

Wheatley also accused industry of using "business and management devices that are creating questionable monopolies in the competitive fields."

Among speakers at the convention were William Gilbert, director of the Los Angeles-Orange Counties AFL-CIO organizing campaign; Irv Mazzei, Los Angeles County AFL-CIO president; Albin J. Gruhn, California AFL-CIO president; Joseph Brody, member of the National Coordinating Committee of the Beverage Industry; Sigmund Arywitz, California state labor commissioner.

Wheatley reported that the IBOP had made a net gain of four local unions in the past year. He also noted special organizing success in the Southwest and in the Ohio area of Zanesville-Crooksville. The total membership gain reported by the union for the year was 437.

Newspaper Guild Convention Hears Sharp Attacks on Goldwater Views

Long Beach, Calif.—Delegates to the Newspaper Guild's 31st annual convention here heard two blistering attacks on the man Republicans were nominating for the presidency 400 miles to the north.

Sen. Barry Goldwater and the doctrines he espouses came under fire from Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and former presidential Press. Sec. Pierre Salinger, Democratic candidate for U.S. senator from California.

Wilkins, addressing a convention forum on human rights, likened Goldwater to "a man from Munich" who "rallied the rightists in drawing the bloodiest curtain of retrogression ever to darken the modern industrial world."

"All the elements are here today in our present situation," the NAACP leader declared. "The strident, unelucidated calls for victory, the ethnic scapegoatism, the pathological interpretation of the most inconsequential event or policy or personage as communism — and finally the suspicions of a free press, coupled with irresponsible and even scurrilous newsletters and radiocasts."

Wilkins charged that Goldwater and the Republican Party platform have "swallowed" the murder of three young civil-rights workers in Mississippi, pretending "that nothing has happened and that it is of no concern, not only to the federal government but to the Republican Party."

"This is not conservatism," Wilkins declared. "This is blood and waste and death."

Salinger, returning to address a union whose convention he had once attended as a delegate, predicted that Goldwater's nomination would have a profoundly disturbing effect on the governments of friendly and neutral nations, stirring the fear that "the finger on the nuclear trigger in Washington might be much less reluctant to press it."

In consequence, he warned, these governments, may be prodded to speed up the development of "their own nuclear weapons under their own control."

Ex-Guild Chairman

Salinger, who was a Guild unit chairman when he worked as a reporter for the San Francisco Chronicle in the 1950's, said Goldwater's domestic program appeals principally to those who "have forgotten or never known what life could be like when there was no social security . . . no unemployment insurance . . . no strong unions . . . when wages are low, overtime unheard of, working conditions whatever the employer chose to furnish."

Participants along with Wilkins in the human rights forum included William Pollard, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, who pointed out that the federation is asking affiliated unions "to assist Negroes in getting compensatory education and training in order that they might qualify for jobs that are now available" and to press for the inclusion—and enforcement—of contract clauses barring discrimination in hiring.

Richard P. Davis, the guild's associate director of research and information, urged intensification of the Guild's own program for equal employment opportunity in the newspaper industry. A new Guild pamphlet, Careers for Negroes on Newspapers, was introduced at the forum. It encourages Negroes to enter the newspaper field and offers them the Guild's assistance in obtaining jobs.

Speakers on the opening day of the convention included ANG Pres. Arthur Rosenstock, who warned that newspaper mergers and monopolies are endangering freedom of the press; Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson, who urged intensification of the Guild's drive for wage gains, and Sec.-Treas. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., who urged approval of proposals to strengthen the Guild's general and strike finances.

Early Pensions Negotiated by Oil Workers

contract talks between the union and some 600 oil firms.

The OCAW said it expects the Sinclair pact will "stimulate other companies" to reach agreement in line with OCAW's 1964 objectives—applying the equivalent of a 5 percent wage hike to improvements in fringe benefits.

The new pact covers 5,500 employes in refineries at Marcus Hook, Pa.; East Chicago, Ind.; Houston, Tex., and Sinclair, Wyo.; research facilities in Harvey, Ill., and all Sinclair production employees in several states.

55-Year-Olds Eligible

Union members at Sinclair now will be able to retire at any age between 55 and 65. Under 62, the member would get a reduced pension but at 62 he can claim 100 percent of the pension—that would be only a few dollars less than if he worked to 65.

The agreement, subject to a vote by union members, has pension benefits calculated at the rate of 1 percent of monthly average earnings for the last five years of service, times total years of service.

At 62, the typical hourly-rated workers now can retire with $200 a month or more pension, "plus $101 social security, plus his wife's social security, plus certain tax exemptions applying to pensions," the union said.

The new contract also provides five weeks' annual vacation for employes with 25 years of Sinclair service, and a wage reopener in 1965. Vice Pres. B. J. Schafer, who headed union negotiators, said the pact could be a "giant step" toward making age 62, rather than 65, the normal retirement age.

Auxiliaries Hold Institute In Colorado

The first national leadership institute for AFL-CIO auxiliaries has just been held in Boulder, Colo.

Established in conjunction with the University of Colorado's Center for Labor Education & Research, the institute was attended by more than 100 women representatives of 28 international unions throughout the country.

Role of Women

Among the studies in the week-long program were the role women in trade union families can play in community service and in citizenship activities, such as register-and-vote campaigns. There were also classes on legislative issues, the implementing of the Civil Rights law and the goals of the American labor movement.

Mrs. Marcella S. Beatty, executive director of the AFL-CIO program, said the consumer role of women was emphasized in the "wise use of hard-earned dollars."

Among the instructors were Mary Dublin Keyserling, director of the U. S. Dept. of Labor's Women's Bureau, AFL-CIO staff representatives and university faculty members.

MORE LABOR UNIONISTS should be United States diplomats, William C. Doherty, retired Letter Carriers' president and former ambassador to Jamaica, tells luncheon audience of labor and federal employes. Doherty returned from Jamaica at the request of Pres. Johnson for a legislative assignment.

Conventions on Work Conditions Highlight ILO's Closing Sessions

Geneva—The Int. Labor Organization's 48th conference adopted wide-ranging measures for improving the lot of workers and their families in the final week of the session.

Three conventions with the binding force of international treaties set out a modern employment policy for governments, raise the minimum standard of benefits for on-the-job accidents and sickness, and define the conditions of hygiene and comfort to be respected in offices and similar places of work.

In adition, the conference drafted a series of recommendations spelling out the guidelines governments should follow in giving effect to the conventions. These go into force as soon as ratified by governments.

Bert Seidman, an adviser on the U.S. worker delegation headed by Rudolph Faupl of the Machinists, praised the employment policy document for setting forth "the goal of full, productive and freely chosen employment."

Governments will be bound "to declare and pursue" an "active policy" designed to achieve this goal in the framework of an international program for economic expansion.

Employer Move Loses

The conference's worker delegates fought off with the help of government representatives a last-minute attempt by employers to limit all death and disability benefits in a new convention to 50 percent of the breadwinner's salary.

The workers had asked that the benefit in the case of a married man with two children be fixed at two-thirds in the event of incapacity and at 60 percent in the event of death.

A worker-accepted compromise of 60 percent and 50 percent that was offered by governments was carried by a vote of 219-42, with 31 abstentions.

When urging acceptance of the compromise over employer opposition, Faupl assured the conference that the workers were "not interested in 'pie in the sky' but in bread on the table."

The conference prepared the way for the adoption next year of a recommendation to assure that women with family responsibilities may find jobs "without being subjected to discrimination."

Mrs. Maida Springer of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs, a member of the U.S. worker delegation, praised the ILO for its "awareness of the fact that women constitute a reservoir of untapped brain and handpower that should and must be added to the skill and talent banks of the world."

The measures prepared by a conference committee for incorporation in next year's document were a "significant landmark," U.S. Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson declared.

David A. Morse, director general of the 110-nation ILO, stressed the need in his major address to the conference to avoid "bloc politics" in order to achieve the "broadest possible measure of agreement" within the organization, a United Nations specialized agency.

This did not, however, mean that the ILO should promote agreement "at any price," he declared.

ILO Objectives

The ILO, Morse continued, stands for freedom of labor, which includes free choice of employment and individual dignity, freedom of association and the "primacy of social objectives."

"These fundamental ideas should be given fuller and more explicit expression in all that the ILO does," Morse said.

At the same time the ILO director general rejected the Communist contention that the agency's staff should be drawn in equal numbers from the Soviet bloc, the western world and the so-called noncommitted nations.

The view that the ILO secretariat should be a "compromise reflection of outside pressures" conflicts directly with the tradition of integrity and autonomy that has been a "unique strength" of ILO since its start, Morse declared.

AFL-CIO Backs Appeal From Anti-Trust Ruling

The AFL-CIO has asked the Supreme Court to review—and overturn—an appellate court decision holding a union contract in violation of federal anti-trust laws.

The issue is the validity of an agreement between Chicago locals of the Meat Cutters and area grocers establishing hours during which fresh meat will be sold. The employer who brought the suit contended that he was forced to go along with the agreement reached by the Meat Cutters and an employer's association because otherwise he would have faced a strike.

The issue is considerably broader than the case at hand, the AFL-CIO contended. If the appellate court decision were permitted to stand, it could bring into question the validity of "pattern" agreements and multi-employer bargaining affecting millions of workers, the federation said.

It is a matter for the National Labor Relations Board, and not the courts, to determine initially whether store hours are a mandatory subject for bargaining, the AFL-CIO argued.

Noting that areas of bargaining of necessity change with the times, the AFL-CIO warned that "the continued effectiveness of collective bargaining as an instrument for coping with the new and unprecedented labor problems created by a rapidly evolving technological society could be seriously jeopardized by any arbitrary, artificial limitation on the type of subject that may be dealt with through union-employer negotiations."

The AFL-CIO asked the court to consider the case at the same time it acts on a pending anti-trust case involving a contract negotiated by the Mine Workers. The facts in the two cases, the federation said, are "different but closely analogous."

May Strike Activity Shows Rise Over '63

Work stoppages increased in May over the levels of May 1963 but the total was lower than that of May 1962, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

For the first five months, time lost was 12 hundredths of 1 percent in 1964 as against 13 hundredths of 1 percent in 1963 and 1962.

Baltimore Passes City Pay Floor

Baltimore — A labor-supported minimum wage bill has been passed unanimously by the Baltimore City Council, but Mayor Theodore R. McKeldin hasn't decided yet whether to sign it.

McKeldin referred the legislation to the city solicitor's office for a legal opinion as to whether the city has the power to regulate wages. Maryland has no state minimum wage law.

The bill would set a $1-an-hour wage floor for some 20,000 workers not covered by the federal Fair Labor Standards Act. Pres. Dominic Fornaro of the Baltimore AFL-CIO said labor had sought a broader bill, including a $1.25 wage floor and overtime premium pay, but backed the legislation adopted as a first step.

ILGWU Spokesman Charges:

High Funeral Costs Drain Death Benefits

A spokesman for a union which pays out $2 million a year in death benefits told a Senate Anti-Trust subcommittee that nearly all of the payments to families of deceased members end up in the hands of the undertaker.

"The correlation between the average funeral charge and the amount of the union's death benefit is not accidental," according to Harry Haskel, director of the death benefit department of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

"It is common knowledge that some funeral directors ascertain the benefits accruing to the family of a member before making the funeral arrangements," he asserted. "This enables them to determine what the traffic will bear—how expensive a funeral can be sold to the family."

Haskell said funeral bills handled through the ILGWU's death benefits program average more than $900 of the $1,000 death benefit provided by the union. He noted, however, that the average funeral bill dipped last year, after publication of books and articles on the high cost of dying led to widespread discussion of pricing of funeral services.

Price Tags Urged

Haskell suggested the situation could be improved by legislation requiring funeral directors to itemize their bills and put price tags on caskets.

The subcommittee, headed by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) is trying to determine whether there is illegal price-fixing or restraint of competition in the funeral industry.

Spokesmen for the industry's biggest trade association defended current practices, including a ban on price advertising. The National Funeral Directors Association maintained in effect that Americans enjoy the highest standard of dying in the world.

The association discourages "pre-need" funeral arrangements, its executive secretary said, because a bereaved family needs "meaningful things to do." If they are denied the opportunity to make funeral arrangements, he said, they may feel "hostility toward the deceased."

ILPA Warns Of Courier's Latest Pitch

The Intl. Labor Press Association, composed of publications of AFL-CIO unions, has renewed its warning to the nation's labor press about the activities of the Trade Union Courier, a racket sheet that has plagued the labor press for years.

Latest pitch is a tie-in with Labor Day, which the paper says coincides with its 30th anniversary. To celebrate, it is issuing a Holiday Commemorative Edition and soliciting greetings from unions, at prices ranging from $60 to $1,000 a page.

An example of the current solicitation is a letter to the director of Dist. 15 of the Steelworkers suggesting that he prepare an article of about 300 words, with a recent photo.

The letter was signed by Burt Raddock, who was fined $5,000 in 1960 for criminal contempt for continued violation of a 1955 Federal Trade Commission order and a 1956 court order to stop misrepresenting the paper as an official AFL-CIO organ. At the same time Burt's brother, Maxwell, was fined $20,000 and the Trade Union Courier itself was fined $35,000.

OECD Manpower Goals Stress Full Employment

Paris—The 21-nation Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development (OECD) has recommended to its member countries, including the United States, a broad-ranging manpower utilization program geared to a full-employment economy.

Highlights of the recommendations by the OECD's Council on Manpower Policy include:

- Central planning to develop new programs and services in the light of the changing needs of the national economy. This would be coupled with active participation by both employer and worker organizations in measures to promote economic growth and improve living standards.
- "Rapid and timely action" to meet changing economic conditions. Thus, during slack periods, the report recommends stepped-up public works and an expansion of "socially-needed public services." It recommends also financial incentives to stimulate employment during slack seasons.
- Strengthening of the national employment service. "It must be given sufficient resources, including qualified personnel and attractive premises, so as to gain the confidence of all sectors and classes of employes and employers," the report said.

It should also provide vocational guidance, inter-regional job referrals and special programs to encourage geographical mobility. These programs, the OECD said, "should apply to all categories of workers, whether employed, under-employed or unemployed, so as to provide optimum utilization of manpower."

- Expansion of adult training and retraining facilities. The OECD noted that an increasing number of people will be required to change occupations during their lifetime because of technological changes and stated: "Everybody needing and wishing to acquire new skills should be given the opportunity to qualify for the new and better jobs."
- Financial help in readjustments. The OECD proposed "adequate unemployment benefits . . . as well as special allowances for persons undertaking resettlement (and) retraining."

The document stressed that the "interdependence of national economies" makes it desirable that all nations enjoy high employment and recommended that "all member countries undertake parallel efforts to make progress in this field."

The OECD is made up of 18 European nations, including Great Britain, plus the United States, Canada and Japan.

Report to President:

Major Gains Mark Drive on Job Bias

The President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity reported "substantial achievement" in breaking down racial barriers to employment during its three years of activities—and praised cooperation by unions and employers in helping to bring it about.

During this period, Exec. Vice Chairman Hobart Taylor, Jr., reported to Pres. Johnson:

- "Employment of minority group Americans at responsible levels in private industry has increased, both through cooperative action and the committee's compliance program.
- "Breakthroughs have been achieved in jobs traditionally hedged with color or religious barriers.
- "Responsible government positions have been filled by Americans who formerly could not aspire to anything beyond the service and maintenance level."

At the same time, Taylor emphasized, much remains to be done. Negro white collar employment increased 17.4 percent, he noted, while total white collar employment increased only 1.9 percent, but this resulted only in raising the Negro share from 12 per 1,000 white collar workers in 1962 to 13 per 1,000 in 1963.

The goal of equal opportunity "cannot be achieved by ending job discrimination alone," Taylor pointed out. "The most that can be achieved by an equal employment opportunity compliance procedure is to open up jobs to qualified workers, regardless of race. . . . Yet the concept of equal job opportunity can become a reality only when it is accompanied by equal opportunity to qualify."

Union Role Cited

The report details action taken by the trade union movement to enforce equal opportunity, including the signing of fair practice programs by virtually all AFL-CIO unions, the establishment of a Labor Advisory Council to the President's Committee, and the recent working conference to implement union fair practices programs.

It cites the AFL-CIO's continuing campaign to "wipe out discrimination wherever it exists—on the jobs, in the schools, in the voting booth, in the housing developments, stores, theaters or recreation areas."

"On the national level," the report adds, "day-to-day operations have included the exchange of information on an informal as well as on a formal basis. Joint meetings with international union officials and representatives of the President's Committee and the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dept. have helped spot areas where a union should take action to achieve necessary corrective action by its local unions."

The report praises affirmative action taken by a number of individual unions and trade departments, civil rights programs adopted by state central bodies in the South as well as North, and community programs which have provided additional apprenticeship opportunities for Negroes.

Both labor and management, Taylor said, after "rigorous self-scrutiny," are "throwing off the binding and restricting residue of the past."

Pres. Johnson, who headed the committee when it was established in 1961 by the late Pres. Kennedy, commented that it has proved more successful than any previous executive program to eliminate job discrimination by government contractors and federal agencies.

Nevertheless, he stressed, "more will be required of all of us before we reach the goal of full development of our human resources. It is the intent of this Administration to move this nation toward that goal."

Serving on the 31-member committee are two labor representatives, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther. Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz is vice chairman of the committee.

Employers End Pacts, Grain Millers Walk Out

Duluth, Minn.—Grain shipments piled up here in the twin ports of Duluth-Superior when employers terminated all contracts with the Grain Millers and union members refused to work without a contract.

The walkout of 450 union members at 11 grain elevators followed a stalemate in contract negotiations. Some 500 longshoremen, laborers and truckers observed the picket lines of Grain Millers Local 118.

Meanwhile AFGM Pres. Roy O. Wellborn announced the successful conclusion of negotiations covering 1,000 employes of the Colorado Milling & Elevator Co. in Denver, Salt Lake City, Omaha, and three locations in Idaho and Kansas.

Union and management have agreed to a three-year contract providing wage increases of 10 cents an hour this year plus another 5 cents next year and 5 cents more in 1966; a company-paid pension plan based on $3 a month times years of service; and an improved health and welfare plan.

2-Year Pact

Wellborn headed union negotiators in talks at Denver, where the parties agreed to a two-year extension, with added improvements, of the contract negotiated last year.

Duluth negotiations broke down, Wellborn reported, when General Mills and six other employers refused to change contract provisions which have been frequently violated in the past. Unsettled issues include wages, sick leave, supplemental unemployment benefits and the contracting-out of work.

Union sources said railroads have embargoed further shipments of grain into this port and vessel operators have been sending freighters to other upper lakes ports.

Meat Cutters Add Gulf Fishermen

Sabine Pass, Tex.—Crews of eight pogy boats, employed by the Texas Menhaden Co. to fish in the Gulf of Mexico, voted 95-7 for Meat Cutters' Local 300 in the latest of an election series conducted by the National Labor Relations Board.

That brought to 46 the number of menhaden boats on which 644 crewmen have chosen Local 300 to bargain a contract for them.

Sullivan, Greenberg Delegates to TUC

Presidents of two affiliated unions will represent the AFL-CIO as fraternal delegates to the 1964 Trades Union Congress in Great Britain, federation Pres. George Meany has announced.

Named to attend the congress, Sept. 7-11 at Blackpool, England, were Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes and Pres. Max Greenberg of the Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union.

Meany said he will forward credentials for the two delegates to TUC General Sec. George Woodcock in London.

Beirne Bids FCC Probe Cable Firm

The Communications Workers, charging that a subsidiary of the Intl. Telephone & Telegraph Co. has not lived up to its obligations, has asked the Federal Communications Commission to investigate the firm, the American Cable & Radio Co.

Union Pres. Joseph A. Bierne, in a letter to FCC Chairman E. William Henry, charged the company is attempting to drop its message service and retain only its more lucrative leased wire and government contract work.

Beirne also charged that AC&R is deliberately trying to provoke a strike, and to use it as an excuse for lessening its message service. His union has been unable, in negotiations stalemated since early June, to get AC&R to grant an increase of more than $2.40 a week despite settlements of $3.50 a week by other overseas cable companies, he declared.

The CWA represents nearly 1,400 employes of the firm, about 80 percent of them in New York state.

Beirne said the firm has been laying off employes, closing offices and reducing message service. Currently it is seeking FCC permission to shut down branch offices in the Empire State Bldg. and at Kennedy Intl. Airport while petitioning the FCC for permission to establish a network of Pacific cable circuits, he said.

Beirne told Henry that the firm, as a virtual public utility operating under government license, has "a responsibility to serve the public."

Labor Day Premiere Set for AFL-CIO Film

A new motion picture, honoring unions and union members who devote their after-working hours to community betterment, has been produced by the AFL-CIO and will have its nationwide premiere on television on Labor Day.

Titled "When the Day's Work Is Done," the half-hour film chronicles the accomplishments of union members who make worthwhile use of their leisure time to help their neighbors and their nation. The film's narration is by Dave Garroway.

Until recent years, the film notes, man has been forced to live only to eat, sleep and work, but through his mastery of machines and the efforts of his unions there is suddenly time to do other things.

But what? The film concerns itself with the answers.

To one group of union members the answer is in scenes of their voluntary construction program of community health facilities, now in its 17th year.

The answers to others are union-initiated Boy Scout troops, community cultural projects, assistance programs for the very old and the very young. And, in times of disaster, such as the Alaska earthquake, help to their neighbors in rebuilding.

On Location

To capture the spirit and the achievements of these dedicated unionists, camera crews went into Long Island, N. Y.; Washington, D. C.; Camden, N. J., and Harts, W. Va.

Other scenes in the films are of community activities in Florida, Louisiana, California, Michigan, Pennsylvania and Connecticut.

But all of labor's efforts are not confined to "when the day's work is done." The film also ranges over the program of achievements realized through the millions of dollars donated each year to united fund appeals by union members. Fully one-third of all funds raised come from union members who number only one-tenth of the population.

In addition, the film relates the uses made of labor-donated service aids, such as mobile Travelers Aid and Red Cross disaster units.

Why do the AFL-CIO and union members devote so much time and effort and money to these programs? AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Services program, are interviewed by Garroway on these questions.

DAVE GARROWAY

The film was produced by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Public Relations under the direction of Dept. Director Al Zack and in conjunction with AFL-CIO radio and television consultant M. S. Novik.

The stations and times for showing "When the Day's Work is Done" will be announced later.

On Labor Day, 1963, the AFL-CIO premiered "In Common Brotherhood," which told of the federation's world-wide program to combat the forces of communism by building free trade unions. That film is now a part of the AFL-CIO film service available to unions, schools and community organizations. It is also being shown as part of the government's international information program.

Jager Leaves IUD For Federal Post

Oscar Jager, for eight years director of publications and public relations for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., has resigned to accept appointment as chief of information for the Labor Dept.'s manpower administration.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said Jager will supervise information programs for the Bureau of Employment Security, the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training, and the Office of Manpower, Automation & Training. Before his IUD service, Jager was on the staff of the Communications Workers.

Equal Rights for All

NO MORE IMPORTANT piece of legislation has passed Congress in this generation than the Civil Rights Act of 1964. For its passage, the members deserve the applause of a grateful nation. Congress has met its responsibility to the Constitution and to the ideals of human rights.

Congress has joined with the judiciary and the executive in their determination to remove the blight of segregation from the land.

We should not be lulled by these achievements. The decisions of the courts, the orders of the President, the laws enacted by Congress will not by themselves achieve the goals of full equality for every American in American life.

THE FIRST REQUIREMENT is a vigorous national Administration, led by a President who understands the national need to secure civil rights and who appreciates the urgency of the problem, an Administration which will promptly and effectively exercise the legal powers already invested in it.

The national Administration must also be sensitive in seeking an expansion of legal authority to areas not already covered, and in calling for improvement of laws, already on the books, when a need becomes evident. And finally, an Administration, inspired by a President committed to the cause of equal rights, must provide dynamic leadership to the people and to Congress in the achievement of human rights.

We urge specifically:

- Vigorous enforcement and constant review of legislation seeking to assure voting rights, and its extension to state and local elections.
- Prompt implementation of our national policy to desegregate public schools and public facilities wherever segregated education and segregated public facilities exist.
- Strong federal action against discrimination in employment, in all forms of public accommodations throughout the United States, and in all public programs, including housing programs, which invoke the use of public funds or credit through grants, loans, guarantees or insurance.
- Expanded and more explicit powers for the Attorney General to move to protect the civil rights of American citizens in any case in which those rights are threatened, infringed or denied.

WE RECOGNIZE that the power and authority granted to government would go for little unless we also establish an economy of full employment. America will not be satisfied with equality of unemployment or equality of poverty.

We believe and urge most earnestly that the assurance of equal rights to all citizens is fundamental to a free society, and that without such assurance, the nation cannot exercise its full strength, nor can it be truly democratic. The goal should be the elimination of discrimination or segregation because of race, creed, color or origin in every section and in every part of our life.

'A New and Reactionary Look':

Repudiation of GOP History Seen in Goldwater Platform

The following views on the Republican platform are excerpted from editorials appearing in the New York Times and the Washington Post.

The Goldwater Platform

New York Times, July 13, 1964

The platform prepared for the 28th Republican National Convention bears the unmistakable brand of Barry M. Goldwater. It is not merely a savage indictment of the Democratic Administration. It also repudiates many of the ideals and principles that have characterized the Grand Old Party. In tone and in substance, it marks a decisive break with moderate and modern Republicanism by calling for a set of policies that are dangerous and unrealistic for one of the nation's two major political parties.

The party that has traditionally regarded itself as the party of peace now speaks out against efforts to lessen international tension and engages in saber rattling. The platform views the world through ideological lenses that distort reality and offers a goal of "victory" that is illusory in the thermonuclear era. It condemns the establishment of the "hot line" that is aimed at preventing war through accident; it belittles the nuclear test-ban treaty and is cold to efforts to achieve even partial disarmament. And, ostentatiously ignoring former Pres. Eisenhower's warning about the threat posed by the "military-industrial complex," it demands greater reliance on "military judgment" that would weaken civilian control.

These positions are wholly out of character for a party that has championed peace and moderation. They cannot be reconciled with Senator Goldwater's own desire for greater individual liberty and less bureaucracy. A program that would accelerate the arms race and enchance the position of the military is sure to involve greater centralization and increased restrictions.

Many of the platform's domestic planks are just as contradictory and outdated. The party of Abraham Lincoln is now cautious on civil rights, criticizing the Justice Dept. for "police state tactics" despite mounting evidence that some states cannot or will not control lawlessness and anarchy. The party that has always backed a balanced budget now fails to recognize the incompatibility of its proposals for repeal of excise taxes, a $5 billion reduction in Federal spending and intensified weapons development.

The Goldwater platform is neither forward-looking nor conservative. On the contrary, it provides a new and reactionary look to the G.O.P. It is ominously radical in its willingness to break with all that is good about the past, and it is dangerously reckless in its demand for measures that will exacerbate differences and conflicts at home and abroad.

Republican Revolution

Washington Post, July 12, 1964

The Republican Party now seems poised to make a radical departure from its past in at least three major areas of public policy. Those who are witness to the San Francisco convention proceedings may or may not like these spectacular deviations from previous principles; but they can hardly deny that these profound alterations of policy are going to make this convention memorable in the history of the party and in the history of American politics.

The most conspicuous area of departure from Republican precedent, of course, is in the area of equal rights. By choosing a nominee who profoundly believes that the federal government under the Constitution cannot undertake to alter the status of citizens, the party rejects its own doctrine going back to its first convention in 1856. The deviation is the more dramatic because it is occurring at the very moment in history when, with the support of more than 80 percent of the Republican Party in Congress, the principles upon which the party has stood for 100 years have been made the law of the land.

It is a strange irony that the Republican Party, after struggling for more than 100 years to gain equal rights for the Negro by federal power, should now, at the very instant of victory, abandon, reverse and repudiate that policy by the selection of a candidate hostile to it.

The platform of 1872 probably stated this fundamental Republican policy most explicitly and succinctly when it said: "Complete liberty and exact equality in the enjoyment of all civil, political and public rights should be established and effectually maintained throughout the Union, by efficient and appropriate state and federal legislation."

What is happening at San Francisco is nothing less than a profound and revolutionary alteration of one of the two great political parties.

Morgan Says:

City Traffic Jams a Headache ...And Aspirin Isn't Any Help

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

SAN FRANCISCO—Our increasingly urban society poses an increasingly urgent problem which both the Republican and Democratic national conventions, paradoxically enough, will do more temporarily to complicate than to solve: to wit, the traffic jam. Significantly enough, this is one of the issues of our mechanized age which, to a degree, separates the country conservative from his city cousin and it illustrates, in part the sharp internal division of the Republican party.

Morgan

For example, President Johnson recently signed into law the $375 million mass transit bill which will provide federal funds on a matching basis to municipalities to buy commuter railway cars, improve railway stations and other transportation facilities.

Just before the House passed it last month, Republican Congressman William H. Harsha of Ohio described it as a tool to drive private transportation companies out of existence and establish a federal "czar" over local transit systems. But when the Senate on June 30th passed the House version of the bill, 47 to 36, it was six liberal Republicans—including Senators Javits and Keating of New York, Case of New Jersey and Kuchel of California—who provided the margin of victory. These same men had provided the winning edge when the Senate originally approved the legislation in April, 1963. Fascinatingly enough, Sen. Goldwater voted a resounding "no" at that time and on final passage his vote was not recorded.

ORIGINALLY PROPOSED by Pres. Kennedy, the bill made law is a little more than a tiptoe federal approach to a problem that is dogging almost every town and city in the land, presumably even including Tombstone, Ariz.

By comparison, the city of San Francisco and her bayshore satellites are already embarked on a staggering $793 million rapid transit system—a single project more than twice as costly as all the federal aid authorized by the new law.

Pres. Johnson himself attended the San Francisco ground-breaking ceremony June 19. Culminating more than a dozen years of surveys, financing, legislation and legal wrangling, the system when completed in 1971 will provide 75 miles of subways, aerial and surface lines. Electrified duo-rail trains will travel at more than 70 miles per hour—top speed—above, below and along the ground, depending on whether they are traversing new tunnels under San Francisco Bay or the steep hills and broad avenues of the city.

THIS AMBITIOUS PROJECT will be eligible for federal help under this latest act but one of the more remarkable aspects of the San Francisco plan is the willingness shown by Bay area citizens to tax themselves. To float the necessary bond issue, the average property owner, whose rates weren't cheap to begin with, will pay an extra $3.36 in taxes the first year and this bite will become $27 by 1972.

Not all urban—or suburbanites have shown such a willing self-sacrifice but the phenomenon underlines the fact that costs have simply outstripped the normal resources of cities and states. The mass transit act is designed to ease this burden somewhat.

San Francisco's own problem reflects, to a degree, the national traffic dilemma. Growth is at once a magic word and a menace. The population of the nine counties of the San Francisco Bay area is increasing at the rate of 405 persons a day but that means the automobile count is also growing at the rate of 240 cars a day. In twenty-five years the population will double and so will the census of autos. No wonder voters of the region were obliged to commit themselves to a transit bond issue of more than three-quarters of a billion dollars.

This headache is not unique. In some other sections of the country it reaches migraine proportions. Twenty percent of our gross national product—which is now steadily approaching three-quarters of a trillion dollars—is spent on transportation but heretofore it has not been spent wisely or well.

Congress has poured out taxpayers' billions for highways, airports, harbors, canals, river improvement and the like but little of this has been built into any integrated plan. In some respects, Europe is miles ahead of us in mass transit planning. As more and more Americans are caught in daily as well as holiday traffic jams, the legislators are just beginning to wake up to the extent of this problem.

Washington Reports:

Program to Bolster Appalachia Viewed as Aiding Entire Nation

APPALACHIA is "the forgotten part of America" . . . "by-passed by the progress in the rest of the nation," Senators Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va.) and John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.) declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations, more than any other radio program in the country.

"Many of these people are worse off than they were in the depression of the '30s," Senator Cooper reported.

Randolph explained that this 10-state mountainland has been cut off from the prosperous East and Middle West by the Appalachian mountains that "form a wall broken only by the rivers and a few passages."

"The valleys are so narrow that they limit the development of agriculture," he observed. "However, in the early days when ours was an agricultural economy, you couldn't see much difference between these people and those elsewhere. Also, in the early days of industry, the exploitation of coal and timber provided employment. Now, however, there are competitive problems with coal, and the timber is depleted."

Cooper noted that while the mountains are not the highest in the nation, they run North and South in a long chain through Pennsylvania, eastern Ohio, West Virginia, eastern Kentucky, Tennessee, parts of South Carolina, on into Georgia and Alabama.

Randolph said that the Appalachian Regional Development bill would provide 2,400 to 2,500 miles of development roads—some 500 in his state, West Virginia—which could bring people into the area, provide transportation so that diversified industry might be attracted, and draw tourists into "some of the most beautiful areas of the U.S."

THE WEST VIRGINIA senator said that "we need also to upgrade our educational system, develop water resources, strengthen the timber programs, encourage small farmers in development of pasture lands to promote cattle raising, and develop health facilities."

"While all this is going on," Cooper added, "a lot of people are still going to be out of work, unless they are trained. Grant training programs therefore have to be continued."

Development of the area and increasing the income of the people in it, he asserted, will help the whole nation by adding to total purchasing power.

The Appalachia legislation differs from the anti-poverty program, Randolph noted, in that it is concentrated in a specially needy area.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE TRIUMPH of Sen. Goldwater and his southern and mountain state conservatives will have an effect for years to come on the whole structure of party machinery.

Moving at once to exploit his new-won power, Goldwater said he would seek to "restore the strength of the Republican National Committee" by giving it greater patronage influence. This patronage influence, he said, was "destroyed" during the Eisenhower Administration by Sherman Adams, the former President's chief of staff.

"Patronage" for the National Committee can assume its full significance only if Goldwater wins the election and can dispense or withhold favors involving federal government posts. But the party faithful heartened that the Arizonan is thinking in these terms.

It is certain, as well, that the largely unknown or little-known group of highly-skilled professionals who took control of the senator's campaign last January will move into the party power centers.

His press secretaries, Edward K. Nellor and Tony Smith, said that the senator would attempt to beef up the National Committee's television and press operations, among others. It is expected that he will strengthen and enlarge the minorities division—the section with special responsibility to appeal to large ethnic groups, the millions of citizens of Polish, Italian, Czech, Russian and Rumanian ancestry, for example.

The ethnic groups have been, in large measure, Democratic by inclination. Goldwater has left no doubt that he intends to try to take them away.

The Arizona senator moved in immediately on the national committee by nominating Dean Burch, a 36-year-old University of Arizona graduate without previous national political experience, as chairman to mind the store at party headquarters.

The campaign director will be Denison Kitchel, 55, an easterner and graduate of Yale University and Harvard Law School who moved to Phoenix. Also expected to remain prominent is F. Clifton White, a cool-headed former Cornell University political science professor, who was in the original "draft-Goldwater" organization.

One of the ablest Goldwater aides, Richard A. Kleindienst, may be lost to him for the campaign. Kleindienst, who won the admiration of reporters as a hardboiled political realist during the Goldwater convention drive, is expected to run for governor of Arizona if incumbent Gov. Paul Fannin seeks Goldwater's Senate seat. Kleindienst worked with White as a field director.

Goldwater is eligible to run for the Senate as well as the presidency under Arizona law, and once indicated that he might do so, but is now expected to resign when Congress adjourns at last. Fannin has already announced he will run for the Senate in that event.

THERE MAY BE National Committee changes under Goldwater that will bring to party headquarters more of an accent hitherto noticeable primarily in Democratic Party posts—the southern drawl.

The powerful delegate strength the southern states gave the Arizona senator in the convention was greatly aided by the National Committee's "Operation Dixie," a southern drive directed by I. Lee Potter, Virginia national committeeman.

New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller was distressed by Potter's almost open collaboration with Goldwater backers in the southern states. National Committee Chairman William E. Miller, chosen for the vice presidential nomination by Goldwater, responded by increasing the funds with which "Operation Dixie" functioned.

The Goldwater forces expect Republicans to pick up seats from the South in the House and Senate in November. They are going to fight Pres. Johnson, though he has a southern-southwestern Texas base, for the Electoral College votes of every state in Dixie. They are conceded a chance, varying from slight to very good, in every state.

And through a National Committee under his control, Goldwater will dispense influence on the Republican Party in many states before and after the election—regardless of whether he wins the White House next November.

APPALACHIA, the 10-state area between the prosperous East and Middle West, has been by-passed by progress and needs special aid legislation now before Congress, Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va.), left, and Sen. John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.) declared on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

'Truth in Lending' Sidetracked —Let the Borrower Beware

By Sidney Margolius

THE "TRUTH IN LENDING" bill proposed by Sen. Paul A. Douglas (D-Ill.) was killed by a powerful assemblage of business organizations setting out to beat a bill intended to protect the living standards of moderate-income families.

The Douglas bill would have required lenders and stores to tell the true annual interest rate they charge on loans and installment purchases. Except on mortgages, no lenders or stores now state the true annual rates. They may state their charges as a monthly percentage on the declining balance; for example, 3 percent a month on a small loan, or 1½ percent a month on a department store revolving credit account. But they do not disclose that the 3 percent a month is 36 percent a year, or that the 1½ percent a month is 18 percent annual interest.

Or, they may state the rate as a dollar charge on the original amount. But a credit fee of, for example, $10 per $100 for financing household appliances or a used car, is really a true annual rate of close to 20 percent.

The deceptive ways in which finance charges are stated have made a fertile ground for overcharges. Working people, and the nation's economy itself, have been harmed in two ways: (1) by outright gouges, with many families induced to pay such true interest rates as 30 to 100 percent and even more when buying on installments, and (2) the steady erosion of family purchasing power through constant use of installment credit even at relatively moderate charges of 12 percent.

The Douglas bill to require disclosure of true annual rates was backed by labor unions, co-ops, credit unions, savings banks and consumer organizations. But it was bitterly—and successfully—fought by a massive array of business associations, including the National Retail Merchants Association, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Foundation for Consumer Credit, the National Finance Association (finance companies) and the American Bar Association.

The leading antagonist of the bill proved to be John Hazen, Washington lobbyist for the National Retail Merchants Association. The department stores that make up the association, in recent years have been heavily promoting revolving credit or "budget charge accounts," which often require true interest of 18 percent a year.

The Bar Association is believed to have joined the fight against "truth in lending" because some lawyers on its credit committee have ties to finance companies.

YOU STILL can have the last word:

1. Douglas has announced he will reintroduce his bill. Consumer spokesmen are urging that families write to both the senators who opposed (to urge them to reconsider), and the senators who favored the bill (to thank them and ask their continued support).

2. Learn the facts about how to shop for lowest cost credit, how to use credit judiciously, and tell these facts to other families.

You need to know two points particularly: First, if the finance charge is stated as a monthly percentage, the true annual rate is 12 times the monthly rate. Secondly, if the finance charge is a dollar amount on the original balance, the true annual rate is approximately double.

This happens because the dealer or lender figures the finance charge on the original balance you owe. But since you pay back each month, your average debt is only about half the original amount. On a debt of $100 to be repaid in 12 months, the first month you owe $100; the second, $91.67, etc. If you add up the remaining balance each month and divide by the number of months you repay, you will find that your average debt (in this example) is $54.16. Say the finance charge is $6 per $100. Divide the $54 average balance into $6. The true rate is 11.1 percent. If the term of repaying is shorter or longer than one year, the rate has to be adjusted correspondingly. For example, if a dealer charges you $6 on a debt of $100 repaid in six months, the true annual rate would jump to 21 percent.

Usually you can finance purchases at a lower rate, by borrowing cash from a credit union or commercial bank, than by using a department store installment account. The credit unions and banks nowadays charge from $4.50 to $6 per $100 of balance, which is the equivalent of true rates of less than 9 to 12 percent, in comparison to the 18 percent and sometimes more usually charged by Mr. Hazen's department stores.

Michigan Survey:

Tax Cut Produces Consumer Optimism

CURRENT CONSUMER attitudes are characterized by optimism as well as moderation, the University of Michigan's Survey Research Center reports. The center's Index of Consumer Sentiment, which reached a seven-year peak early in 1964, has maintained a high plateau.

The expectation early in the year of a tax cut was instrumental in warding off fears that, after a prolonged period of prosperity, a recession must be around the corner, the SRC quarterly survey revealed.

The most buoyant components of the index during recent months were attitudes toward personal finances. In most cases people explained the improvement in their financial situation in terms of pay raises, finding a better job, overtime, better business earnings, and the like.

Although anticipation of the tax cut seems to have led to some advance buying (and borrowing) early this year, the high frequency of income increases from other sources may well have played a larger role.

In answering a direct question, the majority of people who were aware of having benefited from the tax cut reported in May that they had spent the extra money, but had no specific idea on what it was spent.

For the most part consumers seem to be pursuing consumption as well as savings goals which they set for themselves prior to the tax cut. Since previously set goals are reached faster because of the tax cut, new savings and spending decisions will have to follow in the months to come, it was pointed out.

THE SURVEY, based on personal interviews with a nationwide cross-section of more than 1,500 adults, is one of a series conducted regularly since 1951 and is designed to measure consumer attitudes and to explore their impact on subsequent spending.

Expressed plans to buy cars, houses, and major household goods confirm the conclusion derived from data on consumer sentiment—that a high level of sales, but no spending splurge, is in prospect. Intentions to buy automobiles, whether new or used, do not differ significantly in frequency from intentions expressed in May 1963 and May 1962. Since the number of families grows every year, this finding implies a moderate increase in cars sold.

Very few consumers see any real clouds on the economic horizon, but many are aware that prosperity usually alternates with recessions and that unemployment remains a problem. The tax cut provides people with a reason for having confidence in the business outlook, but it did not represent a new stimulus this spring, the report continues.

The findings of the latest survey point to a sustained high level of spending by consumers without excesses. This is the most satisfactory prospect that could be envisaged (especially at a time when business optimism seems to be growing). However, the tax cut has not yet had its full impact on spending and saving patterns.

New Government Analysis:

Most Kerr-Mills Medical Aid Found Limited to Very Poor

Most states which have Kerr-Mills Act programs of medical assistance for the aged disqualify all but the poorest applicants under stringent means tests, according to an analysis in a Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare publication.

An article in the department's monthly publication, Welfare in Review, explores state eligibility rules as they would affect typical individuals, retired on an income barely adequate to meet ordinary living costs.

In only a few states would the person of modest means be eligible for assistance. In the great majority of states, he would flunk the means test.

These examples were used to illustrate the problem of hospital and medical care for the elderly:

The first case is that of a single elderly person with an annual income from all sources of $1,850 a year.

In the second case, an aged couple has an income totaling $3,000.

Other elements are the same in both cases. The hospital bill is $375; the doctor's bill is $125.

Savings and other liquid assets amount to $1,000, a life insurance policy has a cash surrender value of $500. The only close relatives are a family of four whose annual income is $6,000.

These facts are matched against the medical assistance for the aged (MAA) regulations in the 31 states and four other jurisdictions which had Kerr-Mills programs in effect as of last April.

Here are the highlights of the survey:

- In only five states would both cases be eligible for some degree of MAA assistance, and only in Pennsylvania would all bills be fully covered for both the single individual and the couple.
- In four other states, only the couple would be eligible for benefits and in one other state, only the single individual would qualify.
- Neither case would meet the qualifications imposed by 21 other states, primarily because the income is above that permitted in the state means test.
- As of April, 19 states had no MAA program in effect.

Even the 10 states with the most generous eligibility rules differed greatly in benefits provided, as demonstrated by the following breakdown:

Florida — The individual's income is too high to qualify for benefits. The couple's income qualifies and the state plan will pay the full $375 in hospital costs, but no payments are made for physician services.

Idaho—The individual qualifies for the full payment of hospital and physician expenses. The couple's income is too high to receive any benefits under the Idaho program.

Louisiana—Both the individual and the couple qualify for full hospital payment, but neither meets income requirements for payment of doctor bills.

Massachusetts — Under the income limitation rules, the single person will receive $325 of the $375 hospital cost and the full $125 doctor payment; the couple will be eligible for $75 towards hospital costs and the $125 doctor fee.

New Hampshire—The single person is not eligible for any benefits; the couple will receive the full amount.

New Jersey—The single person receives $363 towards the hospital bill and the full physician fee; the couple receives full payment for all bills.

New York—The individual receives $325 for hospital expenses and $25 of the physician's fee; the couple receives $50 for hospital and $50 for doctor.

Oklahoma—The individual is not eligible; the couple is entitled to full payment.

Pennsylvania—Both the individual and the couple are eligible for full benefits.

West Virginia—The individual is not eligible; the couple qualifies for ful payment of all expenses.

ILGWU Clears Route To Single Pension Fund

New York—A major step toward merger of 47 separate retirement funds of the Ladies' Garment Workers into one national fund was taken when 30 trustees of the Eastern Region Retirement Fund voted to change its name to "ILGWU National Retirement Fund."

The trustees, headed by ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky, voted also to amend existing bylaws and rules to permit the merger of all other retirement funds under collective bargaining agreements in the industry.

Dubinsky said the trustees, composed equally of union and employer representatives, voted unanimously to accept the recommendation—also unanimous — of the group's executive committee.

Paving the way toward the action was an advance determination by the Internal Revenue Service that the tax-exempt status of the separate funds would be continued for the merged national fund. This means that employer contributions will continue tax-deductible, the union said.

The eastern regional fund covers some 115,000 workers—a quarter of the ILGWU membership—from the East Coast to Texas. Merger of the individual funds, Dubinsky said, would help achieve "greater financial stability, operational efficiency and standardization of benefits" and would "eliminate many technical difficulties arising from the movement of workers from one trade or geographical area to another."

The new national fund is expected to begin functioning next January and the various funds covering 425,000 ILGWU members in the United States will complete merger processes soon, union officials said. Agreements of virtually all separate funds now contain merger enabling clauses, they noted.

Last year, 55 retirement funds of the ILGWU, including those in Canada, paid out more than $21 million in benefits to 32,279 retired workers. Since the pioneer fund was set up in 1946 in the New York coat and suit industry, nearly 45,000 retired workers have received pensions of $50 to $65 a month in addition to social security benefits.

In 1963, total income of the various retirement funds was $39 million. In addition to retirement and severance benefits, ILGWU members are covered by 71 health and welfare funds providing vacations, disability benefits, and health and medical coverage, the union reported.

BSEIU Local Opens Clinic In New York

New York — A health clinic, completed at a cost of more than $250,000, has been opened for the use of the 12,500 women—and 1,000 men—who clean this city's skyscrapers.

Top-ranking local labor, management and government officials were on hand when leaders of Local 32-J of the Building Service Employes, the employers and the welfare fund which made the clinic possible cut a ribbon to open the new facility.

Pres. Albert E. Perry of the local and Willard Doyle, an employer welfare fund trustee, said in a joint statement that the clinic will fill the tremendous need for examinations and special medical services that "up to now have been financially beyond the reach" of most building cleaners.

The new health and diagnostic clinic will aim at detecting illness before it becomes a major ailment. It was set up through the collective bargaining procedure by Local 32-J, the Realty Advisory Board on Labor Relations, the Building Service League, and employers who contribute to the welfare fund under terms of the local's contract.

votes, and helped sweep Democratic Gov. Edmund Brown into office and give Democrats control of both houses of the state legislature for the first time since the turn of the century.

The Los Angeles County Labor Federation, headed by W. J. Bassett, has donated $2,000 so far to CAP 14, in addition to making the initiative a major part of its Committee on Political Education activities.

Pitts, in outlining the program of action for AFL-CIO unions battling the real estate lobby's initiative, noted the measure would not only hurt Californians, but would be a major setback for civil rights around the nation.

The real estate lobby, Mont said, has been flooding the state with misinformation, creating fears and stimulating prejudices.

Bryan P. Deavers, president of the California Building & Construction Trades Council, said "stringent opposition" is planned by building trades unions to the measure.

"This is a real estate move which is a vicious as it is unnecessary," he declared. "California stands to lose homes and jobs by withdrawal of federal housing funds if it passes. I personally pledge an all-out fight to defeat this scheme to ban fair housing for all."

SLOW RISE OF FACTORY WORKER'S REAL HOURLY EARNINGS SINCE 1956

THE NATION'S RISING PRODUCTIVITY

EMPLOYE BUYING POWER LAGS BEHIND NATIONAL PRODUCTIVITY*

*Since 1956 the buying power of the hourly compensation of all employes in the total private economy has lagged behind the rise of the private economy's output per manhour.

A STEP-UP IN BUYING POWER of wage and salary workers is essential for the growth of consumer markets and the creation of jobs for the unemployed, argues the AFL-CIO. But there has been a slowdown in recent years in the rise of worker earnings, warns an article in the July issue of The American Federationist. The article, entitled "A Wage Policy to Create Jobs," urges the two-prong approach of effective collective bargaining to raise wages and governmental action to expand the coverage of the federal wage-hour law and hike the minimum wage to $2 an hour. The above charts, which accompanied the article, show the sharp rise in productivity, the slowdown in worker wage rises and how the buying power of all employes lags behind spurting productivity.

Highlights of '64 Republican Platform

On this page the AFL-CIO reproduces excerpts of key portions of the platform adopted by the Republican National Convention in San Francisco. The subject headings are those used by the AFL-CIO in its presentation to the GOP platform committee and do not appear in the platform.

Labor and Management

● Restoration of collective bargaining responsibility to labor and management, minimizing third-party intervention and preventing any agency of government from becoming an advocate for any private economic interest.

● Complete reorganization of the National Labor Relations Board to assure impartial protection of the rights of the public, employes and employers, ending the defiance of Congress by the present board.

● Constant opposition to any form of unregulated monopoly, whether business or labor.

Civil Rights

● Full implementation and faithful execution of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and all other civil rights statutes, to assure equal rights and opportunities guaranteed by the Constitution to every citizen.

● Improvements of civil rights statutes adequate to changing needs of our times.

● Such additional administrative or legislative actions as may be required to end the denial, for whatever unlawful reason, of the right to vote.

● Continued opposition to discrimination based on race, creed, national origin or sex. We recognize that the elimination of any such discrimination is a matter of heart, conscience, and education, as well as of equal rights under law.

In all matters relating to human rights it will be the Republican way fully to implement all applicable laws and never to lose sight of the intense need for advancing peaceful progress in human relations in our land. The party of Abraham Lincoln will proudly and faithfully live up to its heritage of equal rights and equal opportunities for all.

● To open avenues of peaceful progress in solving racial controversies while discouraging lawlessness and violence.

● To help assure equal opportunity and a good education for all, while opposing federally-sponsored "inverse discrimination," whether by the shifting of jobs, or the abandonment of neighborhood schools, for reasons of race.

Economic Issues and Jobs

● A reduction of not less than five billion dollars in the present level of federal spending.

● An end to chronic deficit financing, proudly reaffirming our belief in a balanced budget.

● Further reduction in individual and corporate tax rates as fiscal disicipline is restored.

● Repayments on the public debt.

● Maintenance of an administrative, legislative and regulatory climate encouraging job-building enterprise to help assure every individual a real chance for a good job.

● Credit against federal taxes for specified state and local taxes paid, and a transfer to the state of excise and other federal tax sources, to reinforce the fiscal strength of state and local governments so they may better meet rising school costs and other pressing urban and suburban problems such as transportation, housing, water systems and juvenile delinquency.

● Complete reform of the tax structure, to include simplification as well as lower rates to strengthen individual and business incentives.

● Removal of the wartime federal excise taxes, favored by the Democratic Administration, on pens, pencils, jewelry, cosmetics, luggage, handbags, wallets and toiletries.

● Assistance to small business by simplifying federal and state tax and regulatory requirements, fostering the availability of longer term credit at fair terms and equity capital for small firms, encouraging strong state programs to foster small business, establishing more effective measures to assure a sharing by small business in federal procurement, and promoting wider export opportunities.

● Enlargement of employment opportunities for urban and rural citizens, with emphasis on training programs to equip them with needed skills; improved job information and placement services; and research and extension services channeled toward helping rural people improve their own opportunities.

● Incentives for employers to hire teenagers, including broadening of temporary exemptions under the minimum wage law.

● High priority for the solution of the nation's balance-of-payments difficulties to assure unquestioned confidence in the dollar, maintenance of the competitiveness of American products in domestic and foreign markets, expansion of exports, stimulation of foreign tourism in the United States, greater foreign sharing of mutual security burdens abroad, a drastic reorganization and redirection of the entire foreign-aid effort, gradual reductions in overseas United States forces as manpower can be replaced by increased firepower; and strengthening of the international monetary system without sacrifice of our freedom of policy making.

● To establish realistic priorities for the concentration of federal spending in the most productive and creative areas, such as education, job training, vocational rehabilitation, educational research, oceanography, and the wise development and use of natural resources in the water as well as on land, while resisting Democratic efforts to spend wastefully and indiscriminately.

● Improvement, and full and fair enforcement, of the antitrust statutes, coupled with long-overdue clarification of federal policies and interpretations relating thereto in order to strengthen competition and protect the consumer and small business.

Social and Public Needs

● Critical re-examination and major overhaul of all federal grant-in-aid programs with a view to channeling such programs through the states, discontinuing those no longer required and adjusting others in a determined effort to restore the unique balance and creative energy of the traditional American system of government.

● Revitalization of municipal and county governments throughout America by encouraging them, and private citizens as well, to develop new solutions of their major concerns through a streamlining and modernizing of state and local processes of government, and by a renewed consciousness of their ability to reach these solutions, not through federal action, but through their own capabilities.

● To continue Republican sponsorship of practical federal-state-local programs which will effectively treat the needs of the poor, while resisting direct federal hand-outs that erode away individual self-reliance and self-respect and perpetuate dependency.

● An end to power-grabbing regulatory actions, such as the reach by the Federal Trade Commission for injunctive powers and the ceaseless pressing by the White House, the Food & Drug Administration and Federal Trade Commission to dominate consumer decisions in the market place.

● To continue the advancement of education on all levels, through such programs as selective aid to higher education, strengthened state and local tax resources, including tax credits for college education, while resisting the Democratic efforts which endanger local control of schools.

● Tax credits for those burdened by the expenses of college education.

● Vocational rehabilitation, through cooperation between government—federal and state—and industry, for the mentally and physically handicapped, the chronically unemployed and the poverty-stricken.

● Emphasis upon channeling more private capital into sound urban development projects and private housing.

● Support of a constitutional amendment, as well as legislation, enabling states having bicameral legislatures to apportion one house on basis of their choosing including factors other than population.

● Adoption and implementation of a fair and adequate program for providing necessary supplemental farm labor for producing and harvesting agricultural commodities.

● Support of a constitutional amendment permitting those individuals and groups who choose to do so to exercise their religion freely in public places, provided religious exercises are not prepared or prescribed by the state or political subdivision thereof and no person's participation therein is coerced, thus preserving the traditional separation of church and state.

● Continued tax support to encourage exploration and development of domestic sources of minerals and metals, with reasonable depletion allowances.

● Stabilization of present oil programs, private development of atomic power, increased coal research and and expansion of coal export.

Social Security and Health

● Tax credits and other methods of assistance to help needy senior citizens meet the costs of medical and hospital insurance.

● A strong, sound system of social security, with improved benefits to our people.

● Continued federal support for a sound research program aimed at both the prevention and cure of diseases, and intensified efforts to secure prompt and effective application of the results of research. This will include emphasis on mental illness, drug addiction, alcoholism, cancer, heart disease and other diseases of increasing incidence.

● Revision of the social security laws to allow higher earnings, without loss of benefits, by our elderly people.

● Full coverage of all medical and hospital costs for the needy elderly people, financed by general revenues through broader implementation of federal-state plans, rather than the compulsory Democratic scheme covering only a small percentage of such costs for everyone regardless of need.

GOP Labor Plank of 1960...

Here, for comparison, is the Republican labor plank of four years ago:

AMERICA'S GROWTH cannot be compartmented. Labor and management cannot prosper without each other. They cannot ignore their mutual public obligation.

Industrial harmony, expressing these mutual interests can best be achieved in a climate of free collective bargaining, with minimal government intervention except by mediation and conciliation.

Even in dealing with emergency situations impairing the national safety, ways of solution must be found to enhance and not impede the processes of free collective bargaining—carefully considered ways that are in keeping with the policies of national labor relations legislation and with the need to strengthen the hand of the President in dealing with such emergencies.

In the same spirit, Republican leadership will continue to encourage discussions, away from the bargaining table, between labor and management to consider the mutual interest of all Americans in maintaining industrial peace.

Republican policy firmly supports the right of employers and unions freely to enter into agreements providing for the union shop and other forms of union security as authorized by the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (the Taft-Hartley Act).

Republican-sponsored legislation has supported the right of union members to full participation in the affairs of their union and their right to freedom from racketeering and gangster interference whether by labor or management in labor-management relations.

Seven past years of accomplishments, however, are but a base to build upon in fostering, promoting and improving the welfare of America's working men and women, both organized and unorganized.

We pledge, therefore, action on these constructive lines:

● Diligent administration of the amended Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (Taft-Hartley) and the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Landrum-Griffin) with recommendations for improvements which experience shows are needed to make them more effective or remove any inequities.

● Correction of defects in the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act to protect employes' and beneficiaries' interests.

● Upward revision in amount and extended coverage of the minimum wage to several million more workers.

● Strengthening the unemployment insurance system and extension of its benefits.

● Improvements of the eight-hour laws relating to hours and overtime compensation on federal and federally assisted construction, and continued vigorous enforcement and improvement of minimum wage laws and federal supply and construction contracts.

● Continued improvement of manpower skills and training to meet a new era of challenges, including action programs to aid older workers, women, youth, and the physically handicapped.

● Encouragement of training programs by labor, industry and government to aid in finding new jobs for persons dislocated by automation or other economic changes.

● Improvement of job opportunities and working conditions of migratory farm workers.

● Assurance of equal pay for equal work regardless of sex, encouragement of programs to insure on-the-job safety, and encouragement of the states to improve their labor standards legislation, and to improve veterans' employment rights and benefits.

● Encouragement abroad of free democratic institutions, higher living standards and higher wages through such agencies as the Intl. Labor Organization, and cooperation with the free trade union movement in strengthening free labor throughout the world.

GOP Platform Is Tailored To Fit Goldwater Record

in public statements before and after the document was approved by the platform committee or in the convention itself.

- In the field of foreign policy the platform placed renewed emphasis on phrases and words which the presidential nominee, Sen. Goldwater, had mentioned in his long campaign—"victory for freedom," a "dynamic strategy" for the future, a "recasting" of foreign aid programs to make sure that "all" serve freedom, that "none bolster and sustain" what the platform termed "anti-American regimes," a denunciation of what it called "fawning amiability" as an effort to move on the "road to peace."
- There was a distinct pulling back, in the policy declaration, from some Goldwater positions perhaps deemed inexpedient, perhaps vetoed by congressional Republicans thronged in key positions.

The platform carried no suggestions of futility about the United Nations or of possible United States withdrawal. It called only for charter changes to "revitalize" the UN's "original purpose," also undefined.

The platform did not specifically repudiate any major national policy of the past.

It pledged that the nation's "sword" would be kept "sharp, ready and dependable" in the face of "the Communist drive for world domination." It termed the North Atlantic Treaty alliance the "great shield," which Republicans regard as "indispensable to the prevention of war and the protection of freedom."

The platform nevertheless avoided any flat policy statement that might seem damagingly inconsistent with Sen. Goldwater's stated "conservative" positions as given in hundreds of speeches, scores of Senate votes, several books including, most conspicuously, the Conscience of a Conservative, 1960, and Why Not Victory?, 1962.

The effect was to draw, in a sense, a map for objectives in which the candidate was given great leeway to fill in details.

New Departure

The form as well as the substance represented a departure from the platform structure of the past—a subject-by-subject declaration of what the party proposed in specific areas of foreign and domestic policy.

It contained no subject-by-subject declaration comparable to the 1960 platform on such broad subjects as "labor," "agriculture," "natural resources," "education," "human needs"—or "civil rights."

This made it exceedingly difficult to lay down planks side by side. There are no "planks," essentially, that are laid down this year.

All domestic issues are included in one catchall section—Section 3—stating that Republicans offer "policies and programs new in conception and dynamic in operation."

Specifics on these "policies and programs" are lumped together under three subsections labeled the party's "faith" in the "individual," the "competitive system," and in "limited government."

All foreign policy issues are included in a catchall section—Section 4—on "freedom abroad." Definitions are not supplied except in subsections on such things as "trusting ourselves and our friends," the "course" of communism, reduction of the risks of war, the place of the North Atlantic Alliance, the "geography" and "development" of freedom.

Two other sections, preceding these areas representing the heart of the policy statement, included a generalized introduction and an extraordinarily sweeping "indictment" of the Democratic Administration record across the four-year period under Pres. Johnson and the late Pres. Kennedy.

A breakdown of specific programs, insofar as they could be matched, reveals the difficulties of comparison.

In 1960 a major section on "labor" in the GOP platform pledged an "increased minimum wage" and "extended coverage . . . to several million more workers." It renewed previous Republican affirmations of "the right of employers and employes" to enter union-shop agreements subject to the limitations of state "right-to-work" laws authorized by the 1947 Taft-Hartley Act.

The 1964 platform is silent on the minimum wage, silent on the union shop, silent on "right-to-work" laws. It contains only three specific references to labor-management matters. They are to "restore" bargaining responsibility to labor and management, to oppose "unregulated monopoly, whether business or labor, and to "completely reorganize the National Labor Relations Board," ending what it termed "defiance of Congress" by the present board named by Kennedy.

The 1960 platform pledged a health program offering the aged "protection against burdensome costs of health care" through "a contributory system" (social security taxes). The 1964 platform is silent on the subject of social security health care.

1960 'Rights' Planks

The 1960 platform spelled out detailed proposals in the civil rights area, including vigorous "enforcement" of existing laws, desegregation of schools through "vigorous support" of court orders and through Dept. of Justice action, the elimination of discrimination in employment, in "housing constructed with federal subsidies," and elimination of segregation in "public transportation and other government-authorized services." It pledged vigorous enforcement and legislative action on voting rights.

The 1964 statements pledge "full implementation and faithful execution" of the new Civil Rights Act, passed with very substantial Republican support, and "improvements" adequate to meet "changing needs." But efforts to persuade the platform committee or convention to spell out specific additional Republican programs in the light of existing needs, either at the federal or state levels, were rejected.

The 1964 platform points on farm policy, foreign trade policy, social security, worker training and retraining, taxes and spending, were scattered through the subsections labeled "faith" in the individual, the competitive system, and limited government.

The subsection concluded, in each case, with a generalized statement that "in all such matters, it will be the Republican way" to achieve such things as fairness and savings and assure "maximum freedom."

The Goldwater "indictment" of the Democratic Administration constitutes a massive assault on what are termed "failures" in foreign policy, "weakness" and "undermining" in national security and defense, "failure" and "betrayal" in regard to "the poor" and "the farmer."

Dishonesty Alleged

The attack encompasses alleged dishonesty, coverups, hostility to business, failure to reduce unemployment in line with goals, incompetence, fiscal irresponsibility, and the promotion of "discord and discontent" through "extravagant" promises that it said "exploited interracial tensions."

The emphasis was extremely heavy throughout the domestic policy section and the preceding "indictment" on an alleged "centralized power" built up in the federal government by the Democratic Administration. There was no mention of any failure of state governments to modernize their structures and make their legislative assemblies up to date in representation.

On the issue of deficiency in state legislatures of proportionate representation for city and suburban residents, which the U.S. Supreme Court has said should be met by upsetting the existing favored treatment of rural minorities—the platform urges a constitutional amendment to upset the Supreme Court decisions.

The platform also asks a constitutional amendment aimed at court decisions ruling out state-directed prayers in the public schools. The proposal is not intended to overturn the leading decision (in a New York case where the prayer was required by the state's regents of education), but to meet the "opinions" of justices in later cases, committee leaders said.

Motives Are Clear, To Javits, at Least

San Francisco—Opponents of the five platform amendments turned down at the GOP convention here repeatedly expressed a lack of understanding as to the "purpose" of the proponents, suggesting some "ulterior" motive.

Stated Sen. Jacob K. Javits (N. Y.) as he began a speech supporting a reaffirmation of presidential control of nuclear weapons: "We well know the reason for the amendment. It is the position taken by a candidate" intimating a "shift to military commanders" of the decision on when nuclear weapons shall be used.

"We well know why this platform is so different from those of former years," said Javits.

MASS TRANSIT bill providing federal grants for cities with serious traffic problems is signed by Pres. Johnson with the smiling approval of Pres. John M. Elliott and Vice Pres. Walter Bierwagen of the Street, Electric Railway & Motor Coach Employes, standing left. Immediately behind and to the right of the President are Legislative Representatives Kenneth Meiklejohn and Jack Curran of the AFL-CIO.

Romney Charges R-T-W Denies Workers' Rights

San Francisco—So-called "right-to-work" laws are "not the answer" to problems of industrial relations and the economy, Gov. George Romney of Michigan told the Republican National Convention here.

These laws, whether national or state, are not the answer to economic problems, the Michigan governor told the platform committee, "because they deny to workers the same organization rights exercised by stockholders" who own corporations.

In business firms, "management and its policies" are chosen and directed "as a result of majority votes by stockholders," he pointed out.

The minority may not like it, but once the majority has spoken, "minority stockholders must accept the will of the majority or sell out."

So-called "right-to-work" laws deny the majority of workers in a bargaining unit the right to negotiate a union-shop security contract with an employer, even though the employer may be perfectly willing to agree to such a contract.

"In the American economy and political system," said Romney, "workers must have . . . [the] same rights of organization" as corporations' stockholders. This would include allowing employers and a majority of union workers to negotiate a union-shop contract, which would be binding on the minority of workers in the bargaining unit, he said.

Arguing that the country has developed both "monolithic monopoly employer groups" and "monolithic monopoly labor organizations," Romney indicated that he viewed with apprehension what he termed the "suffering" of the consumer.

He suggested an "immediate and complete review" of "power concentrations in the collective bargaining field—without favoring or harassing either labor or business," to do what he called "put the consumer back in the driver's seat" economically.

highly disciplined." He was roared at again as he described threatening letters and telephone calls, as well as more serious incidents, during his recent California presidential campaign against Goldwater.

"Some of you don't like to hear it," Rockefeller said, "but it's the truth."

The amendment was assailed by Rep. John W. Byrnes of Wisconsin, chairman of the House Republican Policy Committee, who objected to the "naming" of any group.

The significance lay in Goldwater's repeated refusal to repudiate support of his candidacy by Birch Society members, although he once termed the society's leader, Robert H. W. Welch, Jr., personally "intemperate and unwise."

The proposed amendment, offered by Sen. Hugh Scott (Pa.), Gov. William W. Scranton's floor manager, was beaten in a standing vote by a margin estimated as 7-1 or more.

A detailed civil rights plank amendment, urging faster school desegregation, a larger civil rights staff in the Dept. of Justice, vigorous action to guarantee employment and voting rights to Negroes, was backed by Sen. Clifford P. Case (N.J.), New York Assembly Speaker Joseph Carlino and Massachusetts Atty.-Gen. Edward A. Brooke.

It was beaten 897 to 409 on the long night's only roll call after it was opposed by Rep. William M. McCulloch (O.), House co-sponsor of the recent Civil Rights Act, and Rep. Charles Goodell (N.Y.). Efforts to write strengthened civil rights language and language denouncing "extremist" groups had failed in the platform committee.

Rockefeller said the Scranton forces and he had sought to offer floor amendments on social security, education and "right-to-work" laws in addition to those actually offered on civil rights, extremist groups, and a third issue of presidential control of nuclear weapons (as distinct from U.S. military commanders, who should be offered more field "leeway" in Goldwater's expressed views).

Convention leaders refused time for discussion of more than the three issues, Rockefeller said.

Christian A. Herter, former secretary of state under Pres. Eisenhower, urged the delegates to accept the nuclear control amendment. The delegates voted him down, too.

Two alternate and toned-down amendments on extremist groups and civil rights offered by Michigan Delegate Richard C. Van Dusen and backed by Gov. George W. Romney also were defeated on voice votes.

Goldwater, Miller Shift GOP to Right

Conservatives Rule Convention On Party Program, Candidates

Asked what he meant in a newspaper interview by terming Johnson the "biggest faker in the United States" and the "phoniest individual whoever came around" on civil rights issues, Goldwater said that in a campaign "a few brickbats will be thrown."

"I've known the fellow. I have nothing against him," said the Republican nominee.

The Goldwater victory, scored on the first ballot, came by a smashing vote of 883 to 214 for his closest rival, Gov. William W. Scranton of Pennsylvania, and 114 for New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller. Michigan's Gov. George W. Romney held on to most of his own state's delegates for 41 votes.

Scranton took the duty of appearing before the convention to declare that its platform, which he had fought hard to liberalize, "is broad enough for all of us to stand on," and "we can all build upon it."

The problem now is to "get rid of the Democratic Administration" which has "no foreign policy and a bad domestic policy," he declared as he promised to fight for Republican victories "at every level." He closed: "Let us work within our party."

The campaign tone had been previously set, to a high degree, by approval of a Goldwater platform characterized by an intense "indictment" of the Democratic Administration and a GOP program carefully framed to fit the senator's conservative background.

The convention's deeper meaning was clear:

• The Goldwater victory overturned a Republican pattern of three decades, in which predominant influence in selection of GOP presidential nominees was exercised by the northeastern moderate party wing.

Goldwater forces this year splintered and shattered this predominantly moderate influence in party affairs. The center of balance moved to the South, the Midwest and the Mountain states.

SEN. BARRY GOLDWATER

REP. WILLIAM E. MILLER

• A major instrument in the shift was the emergence of a powerful southern Republican bloc organized intensely for Goldwater. The southern state bloc disposed of 269 delegate votes, approximately 40 percent of the 655-vote convention majority needed to nominate. When the Arizona senator was rated weeks before the convention as within "striking range" of the first-ballot nomination he won, well over half his solid strength was his southern delegates.

Intensely conservative in economic views, the newly emerged southern GOP forces are exclusively white in leadership. The 11 states in the bloc named no Negroes as convention delegates, an unprecedented thing in Republican nominating assemblies in this century.

• A result was the civil rights battle on the Republican convention floor, with moderate and progressive leaders from the industrial states leading the battle for stronger, more specifically phrased platform declarations.

Presidential nominating convention showdowns on interracial issues have previously been an exclusive property of the Democratic party with its acknowledged segregationist southern wing. The Republicans in shifting the power base of their party have inherited a southern segregationist wing of their own.

• The California primary of June 2, in which Goldwater knocked Rockefeller out of the presidential race by a thin margin, was another major instrument of the Arizona senator's convention victory.

Across a period of more than a half-century California Republicans were allies of the northeastern moderate GOP wing—internationalist in foreign policy approach, progressive in domestic affairs. Within the past year self-described conservatives have fought for and won large parts of the party machinery.

It was the penetration and takeover of the California Republican organization that disturbed Governors Rockefeller, Scranton and Romney as they argued, unsuccessfully, for a renunciation of right-wing "extremist" elements by the GOP convention.

• A doctrinal political stridency was given to the Goldwater candidacy in the nominating speech by Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois, the GOP Senate leader.

Goldwater offers an "ideological choice," said Dirksen, to break out of "the controversy on the conservative position [that] has hovered over our party like a menacing specter." Giving "an inch here, a foot there, a mile" to "a socialist philosophy," Dirksen said, stalwart conservative Republicans finally began to "sit on their hands" on election day and the Goldwater choice, he indicated, would end this.

There were enormous ironies as Republican Party control passed into new hands.

Four years ago Sen. Goldwater had the duty of facing down half-rebellious delegates who had nominated Richard M. Nixon for President and telling them to behave themselves, to support the ticket, to survive to fight another day.

In this convention Nixon, who had hoped for another nomination in case of a deadlock, was assigned the task of "introducing" Goldwater to the delegates and thus of seeking to bind up the party's intramural wounds.

Gov. Rockefeller in 1960 had power to mold the convention platform in the direction of stronger pledges on social security and civil rights. He turned down Nixon's offer of the vice presidential nomination, according to Theodore H. White's book, The Making of the President, 1960, and obtained the "Fifth Ave. Compact" on platform changes.

The governor of New York was booed and derided as he appealed to the Goldwater delegates for liberalizing platform changes this year.

Sen. Goldwater in the 1960 convention, rejecting an effort to nominate him for the presidency against Nixon, said bluntly to the delegates: "Let's grow up, conservatives. If we want to take this party back, and I think we can some day, let's get to work . . . and push Nixon across the line."

The "conservatives" through the medium of the Arizona senator "took back" the GOP on July 15, 1964, in San Francisco.

Ticket Near Bottom Of COPE Ratings

Sen. Barry M. Goldwater and Rep. William E. Miller, the 1964 GOP candidates for president and vice president, have consistently voted against the programs and policies of the AFL-CIO in their years in Congress.

Goldwater, who is finishing his second six-year term in the Senate, is listed by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education (COPE) as voting "wrong" on 53 rollcalls. He does not have a "right" vote on any of the issues listed in the COPE voting records—issues ranging broadly over domestic and foreign policies.

In his 14 years in the House, Miller has voted "wrong" or against AFL-CIO positions on 47 rollcalls and "right" on 8 issues.

COPE voting records covering the years 1947-62 show Goldwater with a 43 wrong, 0 right record. In 1963 and 1964 to date this record is 10 wrong, 0 right. Miller has a 40 wrong, 5 right record for the earlier period and 7 wrong and 3 right in the 88th Congress to date.

Four from Labor On Welfare Panel

The reappointment of two labor representatives to the Advisory Council on Employe Welfare and Pension Benefit Plans and the appointment of two new labor representatives has been announced by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

Reappointed were Richard E. Shoemaker of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security; Wilbur Daniels, formerly of the Ladies' Garment Workers and now of the National Board of the Coat & Suit Industry; and four others from industry and the public. New appointees were Albert E. Epstein, associate research director of the Machinists, and Howard Young, Auto Workers' actuarial consultant, along with four others.

LAST-DITCH EFFORT to block nomination of Sen. Barry Goldwater was made at GOP convention by Pennsylvania Gov. William W. Scranton, center, aided by former Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, left, and New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller.

Federal Irrigation Pact Scored as 'Giveaway'

The AFL-CIO has asked a congressional committee to reject a proposed Interior Dept. contract which would result in a "giveaway" of federal irrigation water to big landowners in California's Central Valley.

Labor's "strong opposition" to the proposed water distribution plan for the Westlands irrigation district—part of the San Luis reclamation project—was voiced by George H. Taylor, an AFL-CIO economist.

Taylor told a Senate Interior subcommittee that the proposal "circumvents" federal reclamation law which prohibits the federal government from furnishing irrigation water to more than 160 acres of land owned by a single individual.

The Interior Dept. has contended that an "unavoidable" byproduct of furnishing water to farms in the federal service area will be to build up the underground water supply of large landowners. Among these big growers, the AFL-CIO testimony noted, is the Southern Pacific Railroad, which owns 65,000 acres in the Westlands district.

Taylor pointed out that the reclamation law requires large landowners to agree to sell off land in excess of the 160-acre limitation in order to receive federal water, and asked:

"Why doesn't the Interior Dept. cut Southern Pacific and any other like-minded excess landholders out of the water distribution system and deliver water only to those who comply with the conditions of the law?" He added: "These land barons want free federal water—but they don't want to obey the law on disposal of land in excess of the 160-acre limitation."

Taylor said the AFL-CIO's testimony also represents the views of the California Labor Federation.

Senate Bar Urged On AID Job Threat

The AFL-CIO has asked the Senate to delete from the foreign aid authorization bill a section allowing dismissal of employes of the Agency for International Development without regard to civil service procedures.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, in a letter to all senators, termed the provision "wholly unwarranted" and a "direct attack on the civil service." The Foreign Relations Committee included the "selection out" authority in the bill it sent to the floor, although a similar proposal had been rejected by the House committee.

Union Funds Seen Aiding Housing Need

New York—Welfare and pension plan funds can be an important source of mortgage money to finance urban and rural redevelopment, housing for the elderly, nursing homes and other specialized forms of housing, AFL-CIO Investment Dir. Alexander Bookstaver said.

Bookstaver told the fourth National Mortgage Conference here that there is a "tremendous" potential for investment of union and union-management trust funds in government-backed mortgages.

Many unions, he said, are overcoming an initial reluctance to enter the mortgage field and are modifying constitutional barriers for investment of funds in government-insured or guaranteed mortgages.

Large-scale investments have already been made and the program has barely gotten under way, Bookstaver told the conference, which was sponsored by a committee of the American Bankers Association.

The AFL-CIO investment program, he stressed, "was not created to compete with other types of investors." An expansion of socially-useful housing programs, he said, would assure an outlet for the mortgage money available from welfare and pension assets.

Hits Private Insurance 'Distortions'

A Senate subcommittee urged Congress to enact a social security program of hospital insurance for the elderly and accused commercial health insurance witnesses of having "concocted" statistics and "distorted" the facts in an effort to sidetrack the King-Anderson bill.

Contrary to the industry's claim, the Subcommittee on Health of the Elderly charged, only one out of four elderly Americans has even "reasonably adequate" hospital insurance, and nearly half have no protection at all. The subcommittee, headed by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), is a unit of the Senate's Special Committee on Aging.

Older persons who presently hold private health insurance "find themselves squeezed between higher premiums and shrinking benefits," the report declared, adding:

"It is quite clear that Congress has the responsibility and the obligation to act, and act quickly.

"It is equally apparent that enactment of a program of hospital insurance financed through social security is the logical course for us to follow."

All eight Democrats on the subcommittee signed the report; all four Republicans dissented, including GOP Presidential Candidate Barry Goldwater.

Goldwater in Minority

The Arizona senator joined in a minority report which defended the insurance industry, said there was no evidence that its statistics were deliberately falsified and accused the Democratic majority of having used "strong and emotionally charged" language.

The subcommittee report made these major points:

- Only 9 million of 18 million persons 65 and over had hospital insurance at the end of 1962. As to the claim of the Health Insurance Association of America that 10.3 million persons were covered, "the subcommittee is convinced that this is an inflated figure, concocted to create an illusion of great strides by private health insurance in extending coverage to the aged. In reality, however, the 'stride' was no more than a 'limp.'

"Based on our hearings and investigation, we are convinced that facts were distorted and manipulated in an effort to create an impression that Congress need consider no further action to meet the hospital insurance needs of the elderly."

- "Only one in four older peo-

Congress Digs Into Backlog

By David L. Perlman

Republican Presidential Candidate Barry Goldwater took a leading role in a bitter attack on the Johnson Administration's program as the Senate prepared to vote on the President's high priority anti-poverty bill.

The broad-ranging measure, brought to the floor by a 13-2 vote of the Senate Labor Committee, would provide work and job training for out-of-school youth in conservation camps and city-based projects. It would earmark federal funds for community self-help programs, subsidize part-time jobs for needy college students, help illiterate adults learn to read and write well enough to hold jobs, and establish a volunteer "domestic peace corps" to help improve conditions among destitute groups such as migrant workers.

To the Arizona senator, all this was a "Madison Avenue" vote-getting device which would treat "only the results, not the cause of poverty."

Goldwater was joined by a close political ally, Texas Republican Sen. John G. Tower, in a blistering minority report which set the tone for the Senate debate. The newly-adopted "Goldwater platform" of the Republican Party echoed the senator's dissenting views by charging that the Administration's war on poverty "would dangerously centralize federal controls."

'Massive Compliance' Sought:

Vigorous Labor Role Seen In Fair Employment Fight

Labor will use its economic weapons of collective bargaining and contract enforcement as well as education to help bring about "massive compliance" with the fair employment provisions of the Civil Rights Act, an AFL-CIO spokesman declared.

Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman stressed in a radio interview that the AFL-CIO does not intend to sit back and wait until July 1965, when the equal opportunity portion of the law takes effect.

He cited AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's announcement that the Executive Council will be asked to convene a national trade union conference to frame a program "through which the AFL-CIO can best help to implement the terms of the civil rights law" and "take the lead in assuring fair employment practices."

Slaiman pointed out that the "economic pressure" which unions can bring to bear to assure equal opportunity on the job include both the negotiation of non-discrimination clauses in union contracts and enforcement of such clauses through grievance procedures.

The federation's civil rights director was interviewed on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public affairs program heard over the Mutual radio network. One questioner asked if the AFL-CIO was satisfied with the Republican Party platform pledge of "implementation" of the Civil Rights Act after Meany had called for "vigorous enforcement" of its provisions.

GOP Platform Stand Hit

"No, of course not," Slaiman replied.

Labor, he said, is for "voluntary compliance, and we want to see as much of it as possible." But, he stressed, the very reason for having a law is that "voluntary efforts are insufficient by themselves."

He charged that the so-called

Republican Party Breach Widens Over Extremism, Civil Rights Issues

The Republican Party headed into the presidential campaign with its self-styled conservative nominee, Sen. Barry Goldwater (Ariz.), in firm control of the party machinery, although embroiled again in fierce internal warfare almost immediately after the traditional "unity" pledges had been submitted by the senator's beaten foes.

In a slow-spoken, deliberately-phrased speech accepting the nomination, Goldwater set forth the main lines of the attack he will wage against Pres. Johnson and the Democratic Administration.

The assault will include foreign policy, alleged corruption in the Administration, crime on city streets, a return to "proven ways."

Unsmiling, in deadly earnest, the Arizona senator stood before the convention his forces had mastered and proclaimed an uncompromising call to battle.

Those who wish to join us, he said, would be welcome, but "those who do not care for our cause we don't expect to enter our ranks in any case."

The Republican cause, he said, is "not to level out the world" but to "free our people" from centralized government's grasp so this nation can "light the way for liberty throughout the world."

The Republican doctrine does not propose that we "stagnate in collectivism or cringe before the bully of communism," he told the delegates.

Specifically it appeared from the Goldwater acceptance speech, from his selection of a hard-slugging running-mate, Rep. William E. Miller (N. Y.), from the party platform his forces insisted be adopted without alteration of a syllable, that the

Wirtz Backs Double Pay Overtime Rate

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told Congress that shorter workweeks negotiated by unions have increased employment and slowed the loss of jobs to automation. Legislation raising the penalty pay for overtime work to double time would have a similar impact, he said.

He told a House Labor subcommittee that the Administration is willing to drop its controversial proposal for tripartite boards to determine if overtime rates should be raised in a particular industry—a proposal criticized by the AFL-CIO. He suggested as an alternative that employers might be allowed two or three hours of over-

URGENT NEED for preserving the nation's 11 naval shipyards and the skills of their 88,000 civilian workers is emphasized by Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. at meeting of senators and House members who set up permanent watchdog committee and elected Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) as chairman. Seated center, lower level, is Gritta. To his left are Celler and Sen. Kenneth Keating (R-N.Y.), who nominated the chairman. Others are Congress members with naval shipyards in their district.

Threat to Shipyards Stirs Capitol Group

Nearly 100 members of Congress have approved formation of a permanent organization to work for the retention of the nation's 11 naval shipyards.

Meeting in the Old House Office Building at the invitation of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., the senators and House members discussed the threatened closing of several yards and the resultant impact on both the Navy and the shipyard communities.

Speakers stressed the urgency of preserving the Navy's $4 billion shipyard complex and the skills of its 88,000 civilian craftsmen and engineers in the face of dwindling staffs and transfer of shipbuilding contracts to private builders by the Defense Dept.

The conferees elected Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) as chairman. Celler named a steering committee of eight senators and 18 representatives to plan future procedure and declared without objection at meeting's end that the principles of a statement of objectives presented to the meeting "generally represent the views of all here present."

The statement pointed out that the shipyards, in nine states on both coasts and the Hawaii, are "integral parts" of the Navy's capability and strength, that their continued existence contributes to the morale of Navy enlisted men and the welfare of their communities, and that continued operation of all naval shipyards is "vital to the common defense and general welfare" of the nation.

In a statement to the committee, Pres. B. A. Gritta of the Metal Trades Dept. said he agrees with the unanimous opinion of a House Armed Services subcommittee that a "continuation of the existing naval shipyard complex is essential to national defense" and any effort to reduce or abolish it would impair our national security.

It is "the firm and studied position of the Metal Trades Dept., its affiliated unions and its naval shipyard councils that all of our existing naval shipyards are an integral and vital part of our entire naval establishment," said Gritta.

The yards are each essential to national security and defense and the well-being of their communities, and losses experienced by the shutdown of any one of them "would far exceed any relatively small immediate monetary saving" which might be achieved, he said.

Toronto Hatters' Pact Hikes Pay, Cuts Hours

Toronto, Ont.—A new three-year contract gives 250 members of the Hatters employed in 10 Toronto hat and cap shops wage increases of 15 cents an hour in two steps, with 10 cents retroactive to Jan. 1, and cuts the workweek from 40 to 37.5 hours with no reduction in take-home pay.

Union-Aided Bank Opens In Lima, Peru

The first workers' savings and loan association in Latin America, formed with the help of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, has opened in Lima, Peru.

For the first time in the 400 years of Latin American history, working men and women now have a facility for low-interest, long-term loans primarily for housing, AIFLD officials called it "a major milestone in free labor collaboration."

Called the Association Caja de Ahorros y Prestamos de la Alianza Sindical Cooperative—ASINCOOP for short—it will make housing loans up to $3,000 to Peruvian unionists, with repayment at low interest in up to 20 years.

On its board of directors are representatives of the country's principal democratic trade unions, including the Peruvian Workers Confederations, the white collar workers union and the Federation of Housing Cooperatives.

Initial financing is $10 million, of which $120,000 has been put up by the anti-Communist Peruvian unions. The rest is in the form of loans by the Agency for Intl. Development and the Peruvian government.

"This is part of a pattern now unfolding," said Dir. William C. Doherty, Jr., of the AIFLD Social Projects Dept. "Other banks of this type are being planned for other Latin American countries."

Struck Papers Lock Out 3,000 In Detroit

Detroit — Contract disputes between publishers of this city's two daily newspapers and two unions have resulted in suspension of publication of the Free Press and News and layoffs for some 3,000 employes, members of 16 other unions.

Members of the Printing Pressmen, Local 13, and the affiliated Paper Handlers, Local 10, stopped work July 13. Publishers locked out members of all other printing trades unions the next day and Newspaper Guild members July 17. Most non-union employes, notably at the News, were not laid off.

Two meetings, called by the U.S. Mediation & Conciliation Service at the request of the Detroit Council of Newspaper, Broadcasting & Associated Industries Unions, failed to break the stalemate. Talks were recessed until further notice and Sec.-Treas. A. J. Rohan of the Pressmen, here for the first meeting, returned to his headquarters at Pressmen's Home, Tenn.

Issues in dispute include, for the Paper Handlers, contract protection against installation of new equipment, improved insurance and hospitalization benefits, and an equalization of benefits at both papers; for the Pressmen, more washup time, equalization of benefits, and improved welfare benefits.

A union source said a troublesome issue is the refusal of the Free Press to pay time and a half for Saturday night work, a practice at the News.

Meanwhile some unions have started paying strike benefits and opened job placement services. Two stopgap newspapers, the Detroit Press and the Detroit Daily Bulletin, have been started by private interests to publish daily for the duration. A number of union members have been hired, said Executive Sec. Ronald C. O'Brien of the Guild.

U. S. Extends Ban On Training Bias

Government contractors have been ordered to comply with the non-discrimination rules of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training, even if their apprenticeship programs are not registered with the bureau.

The new rule was announced by the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

After 3-Month Strike:

Clerks Hail Victory Over Food Chains

Baltimore—A settlement hailed by the Retail Clerks as a "complete victory" after a three-month strike and lockout of 6,000 food store employes was ratified at a membership meeting here by a 98 percent margin.

The strike was called Apr. 17 at 57 stores of the Acme food chain. Six other chains operating 168 stores shut their doors and stayed closed until June 24, when they called back their locked-out employes.

Contract ratification signaled a return to work for the workers at Acme, last to settle, with benefits covering workers at all the chains.

The settlement, according to Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), will not change plans of his House Labor subcommittee to hold hearings July 28 and 30 on food industry labor practices. The hearings, originally set for July 21-23, were called by Rep. Adam C. Powell (D-N.Y.) to take testimony on "the relationship of the federal labor laws to the antitrust laws" and related matters, Roosevelt said.

Major Provisions

The new three-year agreement between RCIA and the employers here and in nearby states has these provisions, summarized by RCIA Vice Pres. Murray Plopper:

- Wage increases of $9 to $12 a week for full-time workers, 22.5 cents an hour for part-time employes.
- Retroactivity to Jan. 26, 1964.
- Inclusion of wage increases in minimum rates.
- Offering "available hours" of employment to present part-time workers before the hiring of any new part-timers.

The question of more work for those wishing it was the major cause of the strike against Acme, Plopper said. Employers had rejected this union objective until the final settlement, worked out with the aid of the U.S. Mediation & Conciliation Service.

The contract as finally written was accepted by union members who had fought to protect the jobs of present full-time workers and to create the largest possible number of full-time positions for those willing to work 40 hours, according to the union spokesman.

Union members in eastern Maryland and nearby states voted after the Baltimore meeting but the outcome could not be changed, the union said.

Court Upholds Right to Sue in Political Firing

Los Angeles—The U. S. Court of Appeals here has upheld a lower court decision that union employes dismissed for political activities have the right to go to court under the "bill of rights" section of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

The court upheld a district court decision that international representatives of the Machinists had a right to bring suit under L-G asking damages and reinstatement on the ground that they were entitled to the protection of the act.

The representatives, who are IAM members, had participated in an internal political campaign supporting a candidate for high union office who was defeated. They were dismissed after the election.

The circuit court, in its decision, pointed out that under Landrum-Griffin it is possible for a union to adopt the principle of "required political neutrality" for its employes, but that the IAM had made no effort to do this.

The IAM is planning to appeal the decision to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Meany Backs 2 Unions Fighting 'Secessionists'

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has called on West Coast state and local central bodies to give "all possible aid and assistance" to the Pulp-Sulphite Workers and the Papermakers & Paperworkers.

The two affiliated internationals are battling what Meany termed a "rump organization of secessionists" which is seeking to capture bargaining rights for a unit of 22,000 workers at 50 pulp and paper mills on the West Coast. Dissident groups broke away from the two international unions in a recent contract dispute to form the unaffiliated Association of Western Pulp & Paper Workers.

Calling for "full support" to the Pulp-Sulphite and Papermakers & Paperworkers "in their efforts to combat this destructive movement and to preserve the integrity of the bargaining unit as an AFL-CIO affiliate," Meany declared:

"You are herewith advised that any aid, assistance, cooperation or recognition of this secessionist group of its members is contrary to the best interests of the AFL-CIO and a violation of the duties and responsibilities of central bodies under the AFL-CIO Constitution and rules governing state and local central bodies."

It is the "duty and responsibility" of every central body to assist the two international unions in retention of their bargaining rights, Meany stressed. He added:

"I understand that the leaders of the dissident group are telling members that if they succeed in taking this unit into an independent organization, they will subsequently be permitted to affiliate with the AFL-CIO, either directly or through another international. For your information, these claims are entirely false. This office would not sanction, nor does the AFL-CIO Constitution permit, the issuance of an AFL-CIO charter to a group which has seceded from an AFL-CIO affiliate."

Paper Union Beats Raid by District 50

Rumford, Me. — The Papermakers & Paperworkers have successfully repulsed an effort by Dist. 50 of the unaffiliated Mine Workers to win back bargaining rights for employes of the Oxford Paper Co. here.

The vote in a National Labor Relations Board election was UPP 984, UMW 545, another "independent" union 253. The AFL-CIO union had been chosen by the workers over the UMW more than a year ago.

Revises Assessments:

ANG Convention Approves $2 Million Fund for Defense

Long Beach, Calif.—The Newspaper Guild's 31st annual convention here voted to increase the international defense fund to $1 million at the end of the year and to $2 million in five years.

The delegates approved, with minor changes, the proposals of a special strike policy committee to strengthen the defense fund, increase the level of strike and lockout benefits and provide for a more adequate and equitable assessment schedule to support them.

The proposal, as adopted by the convention, provides for raising the current $500,000 defense fund floor to $1 million next Dec. 31, to $1.5 million Sept. 1, 1967, and to $2 million Sept. 1, 1969. An emergency requiring monthly assessments would be deemed to exist should the fund fall below these amounts after they become effective.

The delegates approved a new strike benefit arrangement providing for either an increased schedule ranging from $35 to $65 a week, according to the number of dependents, or payment of 30 percent of salary, with the option up to each local. The old schedule ranged from $15 to $60 a week.

The new assessment schedule ranges from $1 to $6 a month, according to salary. It replaces a schedule ranging from 50 cents to $3.

Assessments Scheduled

Two special assessments to be collected by locals no later than November and December were authorized to meet the million-dollar figure by the end of the year.

The delegates also approved a proposal by the ANG executive board to change the base of per capita payments from a flat rate to a sliding scale based on 1⅝ percent of the average top-minimum salary paid reporters in Guild newspaper contracts. The change is expected to provide the international with increasing income and make it possible to undertake long-range fiscal planning.

The convention heard Dick Gregory, Negro entertainer and civil-rights leader, warn that the nation faces "internal destruction" if it does not solve its racial problem in the next five years.

"The day is over when the Negro in America will accept freedom on the installment plan," Gregory declared. "This struggle is not black against white; it's one of right against wrong. And wrong has never won."

A collection for the Council of Federated Organizations (COFD), conducted on the floor after Gregory's talk, yielded more than $660, with an additional $300 pledged and $500 contributed by the executive board immediately after the convention. COFD is conducting the Mississippi voter registration drive that has provoked segregationist violence.

The convention voted to extend and intensify the Guild's campaign for equal employment opportunity in the newspaper industry. It recommended cooperation with civil rights organizations in the effort and urged locals both to press for the hiring of minority-group employes and to encourage minority-group members to enter the industry.

Warning against the growing problem of newspaper automation, the delegates called for contract clauses to bar dismissals resulting from new processes, provide retraining for displaced employes and require advance consultation with the Guild before automated machinery is introduced.

Declaring that the inroads of automation make it unlikely that sufficient jobs to absorb the unemployed will develop in the private sector of the nation's economy, the convention urged a guaranteed base income of $5,200 a year for every family in the nation. Incomes below this figure, it said, should be supplemented by expanding public-works projects, direct cash payments or a combination of both.

Another resolution authorized ANG officers to seek congressional legislation to curb newspaper monopoly by requiring that outside bidders be given an opportunity to buy a failing newspaper at fair market value before it can be sold to a competitor.

GOP Attack Rebutted

The convention assailed attacks on newsmen at the Republican National Convention as "without precedent in their vituperative and irrational nature," terming them "unwarranted attacks on the objectivity of the press."

Two other resolutions condemned the Soviet Union's persecution of its Jewish population as "vicious" and "inhuman," and called on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to ratify the long-pending United Nations Genocide Convention "without further delay."

Bernard Stein of the New York Times was elected international vice president from the New York metropolitan region to fill a vacancy.

HAWAIIAN LEIS that have become traditional at Newspaper Guild Conventions are draped around the neck of Pierre Salinger, the late Pres. Kennedy's press secretary and now Democratic candidate for the Senate from California, by Malia Olendag (left), Honolulu entertainer who accompanied the delegation from the islands, and Mrs. Terry Mayer, wife of a Hawaiian delegate. Salinger was principal speaker at ANG's Long Beach convention banquet.

Butchers Vote Priority To Election Campaign

Hollywood, Fla.—The Meat Cutters ended their 21st convention here with a vow to step up their political action program to help defeat GOP Presidential Nominee Barry Goldwater in November.

More than 1,200 delegates unanimously approved a resolution calling for every member "to work in this election against the campaign of Sen. Barry Goldwater" in the months ahead. It urged that collective bargaining and organizing activity be secondary to election work and emphasized that "unless Sen. Goldwater is definitively and decisively beaten, there may not be any more collective bargaining and organizing as we know it today.

Pres. Walter Reuther of the Auto Workers said that the "trouble with Mr. Goldwater is that he doesn't have a program. He's negative. . . . He and the Birchers are trying to repeal the 20th Century."

James Farmer, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality, described Goldwater as a man "around whom the bigots and the racists are now rallying."

"Here is a man who declares that in his judgment the Civil Rights Act is unconstitutional, yet he asks the American people to make him the President, so that he can enforce that act," he said. "How is he going to enforce it when he believes it to be unconstitutional? With what vigor? With what enthusiasm? With what sincerity?

Bias Made 'Respectable'

"No, we'll find that many of the people who in the past have apologized for their prejudices now will be coming out in the open and apologizing no longer because they will have the respectable cover of a campaign by a candidate for the presidency."

Farmer pointed out that the trade union struggle and the civil rights struggle are in a "real sense" one and the same.

"We have a real kinship, and it is a kinship which must not and which shall not be broken," he declared.

He called for labor and the civil rights movement to close ranks "as never before to turn back the challenge of the Goldwater counter-revolution."

Funds Raised for CORE

Following Farmer's address, the delegates swiftly raised over $11,000 to contribute to CORE's civil rights program. More than $1,100 was immediately collected from delegates who dropped dollar bills into cardboard boxes. Leaders of delegations then began to announce local union pledges from floor microphones totalling $10,000.

The delegates approved a resolution on civil rights to establish a comprehensive program at both international and local union levels. A major activity will be the formation of local union civil rights committees to work closely with the union membership and the community.

San Diego, Calif., was chosen as the convention site in 1968.

U.S. Labor Seen as Major Force For Social Gains in Latin America

Cincinnati, Ohio—Organized labor in the United States and the Catholic Church "stand alone" in Latin America against the forces of communism "in the practical realm of housing, clothing and a decent wage," the Rev. Clifford Besse, S.J., said in a talk during Xavier University's summer lecture series.

"Who else is engaged in such work?" he asked. "The answer to that question can be determined by observing who the number one targets of the Communists in Latin America are today—the church and free labor.

"Depending on the relative strength of these two groups, communism will either fail or engulf all of Latin America."

Chairman of the university's Economics Dept., Father Besse paid tribute to the AFL-CIO for its "most effective job" in working for social justice south of the border. Many persons once active in their unions now are on the staffs of U.S. embassies and ministries in Latin American nations, he recalled, and added:

"It would not be overstating the point to say that much of the practical implementation of U.S. policy in Latin America today is administered by U.S. organized labor."

American labor is not only investing its own funds in housing projects for workers, he noted, but is making vigorous efforts to persuade U.S. firms to invest productive capital in Latin America.

Investment 'Sound'

"These investments are regarded as sound and productive, and are in no way regarded as a gift," he added.

Father Besse also praised "American labor's gift . . . financed by union funds," of "an extensive education program to promote the interests of free labor, and thereby to counteract the forces of communism." The program is conducted through the American Institute for Free Labor Development, which is jointly financed by labor and business. It includes 12-week training courses in Washington for union leaders from Latin American countries, with all expenses paid.

"In a way it can be said that a key goal in our Latin American policy is to save Latin America from communism and national socialism through the instrumentality of a free labor movement," Father Besse said.

He called for a change in Latin America's socio-political structure so as to create a middle class, eliminate the propertyless proletarian class and raise the workers' standard of living.

"This is the task that must be accomplished if communism is to be thwarted there," he said. "One major function of this task is to educate people in sound principles of economics and a sound application of Christian philosophy to the business world.

"Organized labor is committed to this goal in Latin America. Can you point to any basic error in their goal? Do you know of any other organization that is making this effort day-in and day-out on a well-organized basis?"

'Soundly Moral' Policy

Stable, efficient government cannot flourish, he said, so long as social habits and institutions "are geared to maintain political instability, caste distinction, racial and class prejudice, the hacienda system of ownership, the paterfamilias system of control of areas and the absence of a middle class."

"Organized labor, it seems to me is pursuing a soundly moral and economically proper policy when it directs its efforts at creating a middle class and providing the average worker with a family savings wage," he said.

Disputes Umpire Named by CLC

Ottawa, Ont.—H. Carl Goldenberg, Montreal lawyer and one of Canada's most experienced arbitrators and conciliators, has been named impartial umpire of jurisdictional disputes by the executive council of the Canadian Labor Congress.

The last CLC convention adopted new constitutional machinery for settling jurisdictional differences, with arbitration of disputes which cannot be settled by a mediator or mediators drawn from the Canadian trade union movement. In announcing Goldenberg's appointment CLC Pres. Claude Jodoin said he has served on more royal and special commissions and settled more labor disputes than any other Canadian.

Nation's Housing Need Stressed by Shishkin

Labor's support for a "massive expansion" of housing programs and home construction is stressed in an article in the 1964 yearbook of the National Housing Conference. The author is Boris Shishkin, economist and secretary of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee.

Urging congressional approval of comprehensive housing and community development legislation, Shishkin declared:

"No program is more essential to the economic and social strength of the country. If affirmative action is not forthcoming, the result could be catastrophic."

Stressing that stepped-up construction activity would be "a prime weapon" against unemployment, Shishkin noted that housing outlays constitute almost one-sixth of the nation's gross national product.

He cited studies showing that construction of 10,000 houses represents approximately 20,000 man-years of employment and generates a market for materials producers and suppliers of $50 to $66 million, plus an additional $15 million spent on furnishings and appliances.

Labor, Shishkin said, supports a long-term, 12-year federal housing program "because experience has shown that under a policy of authorization by fits and starts, brief gains never catch up with relentless losses in the national housing inventory."

Shishkin noted that the labor-supported goal of equal opportunity in housing "is far from won and must, therefore, be assured in all programs in which housing is provided with federal aid" or mortgage guarantees.

EIGHTY-FIVE GRADUATES of the first national institute held by the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries—and some of their male instructors—are shown before the Center for Labor Education & Research at the University of Colorado, Boulder, where the sessions were held. Eight state councils and 28 international unions were represented among the students.

CWA Hits 'Hodgepodge' Of Bell's Wage Zones

Elimination of the "gross inequities" caused by a "senseless hodgepodge" of wage zones—107 in the Bell telephone system alone—will be the key goal of the Communications Workers in a round of contract negotiations starting Aug. 9 in Detroit, the union has declared.

A substantial general wage increase will be another main objective, along with improved job differentials and reclassifications; items of critical importance to individual locals, and no lowering of contract standards.

These objectives were adopted by the 63-member rank-and-file CWA collective bargaining policy committee at a three-day meeting in Washington, D. C.

The theory that wages should follow a community level "made sense 50 years ago" but is completely out of date now, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne commented. When negotiations start next month with Michigan Bell, the union will begin seriously to get Bell's 107 wage zones "boiled down to a sensible number," Beirne declared.

Asked what number would be "sensible," he answered "about seven, as things are now."

During the 1964 round of negotiations, CWA will be bargaining on the basis of wage reopening clauses in the Bell System and on all contract items with other telephone firms. Bell talks will be concentrated on basic wages at each step of the experience progression schedule, schedule length and design, job differentials and reclassifications, and town reclassifications.

In a resolution dealing with wages, the policy committee pointed out that workers' buying power has lagged behind the nation's rapidly rising productivity since the mid-50s. Between 1956 and 1963, it continued, the real volume of production rose 24.4 percent, but the buying power of all employes in the private economy, per hour worked, increased only 17.1 percent.

"What America needs is not a lid on collective bargaining and wage increases . . . but strong unions, effective bargaining and substantial improvements of wages and fringe benefits," the committee declared.

Asserting that public policy includes the wage-price guidelines "that have been with us since 1962," the committee said it feels the guideline policy has been "grossly misinterpreted."

A close examination of that policy in the January 1964 report of the Council of Economic Advisers, the committee said, reveals "a careful avoidance of the rigidity of interpretation" imputed to it by the press and the business community. It concluded:

"Considering wage history, profit, productivity, investment and the price status of the industry, it would be appropriate and consistent with public policy if wage increases in the communications industry should exceed the Administration's wage guidelines for 1964; this is especially true when the gross wage inequities existing in the industry are taken into account."

7 Percent Profit Rate

In the telephone industry, the committee said, profits have been climbing at a yearly rate of 7 percent—faster than the U.S. economy as a whole. Productivity rates in the industry have been increasing at a rate well over 5.5 percent but, the committee declared, telephone wage increases have been "near or below" long-term productivity figures for the economy as a whole.

On fringe items, the statement declared, it shall continue to be CWA's policy to seek two weeks' vacation after one year of service, three weeks after 10 years and four weeks after 15.

Efforts shall continue, the committee directed, toward "establishing pension plans where none exist, elimination of all social security deductions from pension calculations, increasing all minimum pensions to $125 a month, reducing years of service required for retirement on pension, and introducing survivors' rights under pension plans" where they do not now exist.

Canadian units were directed to resist any employer attempt to reduce pension benefits because of payments they make to the Canada Pension Plan.

CWA Steps Up Community Action

The executive board of the Communications Workers, meeting in Washington to plan ways of "getting more" for CWA members, took time out to adopt a program to "give more" to communities in which members live.

The program involves stepped-up community service activities, public relations and local organizing to help maintain a friendly climate in which the union may operate.

A CWA staff representative will be assigned to coordinate community service and public relations work in each of the 10 CWA districts. Each will get a week's training at a CWA educational institute, Sept. 13-18, at Front Royal, Va.

85 Complete Auxiliaries' 1st Institute

Boulder, Colo.—Eighty-five leaders of union auxiliaries who completed the first week-long national institute sponsored by the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries received certificates at "graduation" exercises on the campus of the University of Colorado.

The institute was conducted by National Auxiliaries' officers and the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education with the cooperation of the university's Center for Labor Education & Research. The students came from eight state councils and 28 international unions.

Wide Range of Topics

A wide range of topics was discussed, including the role of auxiliaries, community services, legislative issues and COPE, civil rights, international tensions, full employment and an understanding of "right, left and center."

Directors of the institute were Walter H. Uphoff, labor education director of the university, and Mrs. Marcella S. Beatty, executive director of the National Auxiliaries, assisted by three other Auxiliaries' officers — Pres. Beatrice Warwood, Sec.-Treas. Elda Luebbert and Vice Pres. Catherine Gelles.

The faculty included, besides Uphoff and the officers, Jack Sessions of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education; Jack Lutz of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Services Trades Dept.; Mrs. Margaret Thornburgh, western area director of COPE's Women's Activities Div., and Community Services Rep. Berkley Watterson.

University faculty members who assisted were George W. Zinke, CLEAR director; Kenneth R. Hammond of the Dept. of Psychology, and Malcolm Correl, director of general education. Arthur Carstens, director of labor education at the University of California at Los Angeles, also participated.

Speakers included Dir. Mary Dublin Keyserling of the Labor Dept.'s Women's Bureau; Pres. Herrick S. Roth of the Colorado AFL-CIO, and Executive Vice Pres. Joseph Amter of the Peace Research Organization Fund.

IUD Official Named Public Welfare Adviser

Leonard Lesser, assistant to the president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., has been named to the 12-member Advisory Council on Public Welfare charged with reviewing the public assistance and child welfare programs for which federal funds are appropriated. It will report to the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare by July 1, 1966.

Court Challenge Seen:

New York City Sets $1.50 Pay Minimum

New York—Mayor Robert F. Wagner (D) has signed a bill establishing a $1.50-an-hour minimum wage law for New York City which a labor spokesman said will "mean meat on the table" for low-paid workers estimated by another source to total 400,000 here.

Eighteen spokesmen for the New York City Central Labor Council and other union groups testified for the bill. Employers headed by the Commerce & Industry Association said enactment would be "municipal economic suicide" costing 66,000 persons their jobs.

An association of laundry owners which successfully challenged a similar law in 1962 said it will ask the courts to set this one aside also. Wagner said the city would "welcome" a legal test.

The law provides that every employer shall by Oct 1. pay no less than $1.50 an hour to his employes in every occupation except for executive, administrative or professional employes; outside salesmen; janitors of dwellings with less than 12 families; students and volunteer workers in non-profit institutions; staff counsellors in children's camps, and several other groups—clergymen, babysitters, newsboys, and part-time workers in theaters, among others.

The new city minimum is higher than both the state minimum, which goes from $1.15 to $1.25 an hour on Oct. 15, and the federal pay floor of $1.25 for most covered workers and $1 for those newly covered in 1961. The last figure will go to $1.15 an hour on Sept. 3.

Labor supporters of the bill are confident it will survive the test of constitutionality because of a new state law, passed by the legislature in 1963, giving local governments more home rule powers.

Wagner signed a law in October 1962 which the state courts killed on the ground that wage regulation is a field pre-empted by the state. The bill would have required payment of $1.25 an hour for one year, then $1.50. Labor supported that law too.

The new law, said Sec. Morris Iushewitz of the city AFL-CIO central body, is "badly needed" and will mean "meat on the table" for many low-paid workers. Iushewitz had urged the mayor to sign it, as did local AFL-CIO Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., Pres. Peter J. Brennan of the New York State Building & Construction Trades Council, and other union representatives.

Iushewitz said labor has urged such a measure for many years and has "high hopes" the city's right to enforce it will be upheld by the courts.

Fight to Go to Harvard Won by Shop Steward

Fall River, Mass.—A 20-month dispute over the right of a local union president to get a leave of absence to study at Harvard University was settled here when management of Harvey Probber, Inc., furniture firm, reached agreement with the Furniture Workers.

UFW Pres. Morris Pizer said company officials agreed, at a meeting with representatives of the union and the State Board of Conciliation & Arbitration, to grant Americo Ramos a leave when he next requests it.

Ramos is president of UFW Local 159 at Probber's, where he works as a frame assembler. He plans to enroll for a three-month Harvard Trade Union Program next spring.

Pizer said Ramos won a Massachusetts State AFL-CIO Scholarship in 1962, along with two others out of a field of 24 contenders. Management refused to grant the leave, asserting that Ramos could not be spared from work because of a "backlog" of orders.

The union filed unfair labor practice charges, which were upheld by a trial examiner and then by the National Labor Relations Board. Facing possible court action by the NLRB for enforcement of its decision and intervention by the state arbitration board, the firm dropped its opposition.

Vigorous Union Man

At the NLRB hearings, union witnesses had testified that Ramos was the union's chief steward at the Probber plant and as such, was a vigorous union leader who actively enforced the contract.

When Ramos received word that he had won the Harvard scholarship, he posted a letter to that effect on the plant bulletin board, received congratulations from his fellow workers and two company officials, and five months later requested a leave in writing.

The union contract specifies that leaves will be granted for valid reasons if workers "can be spared from production." On Jan. 10, 1963, the firm's executive vice president—one of those who had congratulated Ramos—denied the request in writing without listing any reason.

NLRB Examiner James V. Constantine found that while management had refused to grant the leave on the ground that Ramos could not be spared from his job, it had failed to produce any proof of its claim. Upholding union charges, he ruled that the firm's expressed reason was only a pretext used because of resentment over Ramos' forceful union leadership. The NLRB agreed, and ordered the firm to stop discriminating.

Phone Union Credits COPE With a 'Save'

Milwaukee—Wisconsin members of the Communications Workers have been told by CWA State Dir. Edward V. Peil that labor's political strength was directly responsible for enactment of a law worth $845,000 in benefits.

Peil referred to legislation allowing telephone company employes to continue to receive discounts on their phone bills and permitting free phone service for retired phone workers.

The Wisconsin Public Utilities Commission had barred the free service and limited the amount of the discount. The state CWA director said the Wisconsin labor movement gave "outstanding" help to the union in winning passage of the new law and in securing its signature by Gov. John W. Reynolds (D). It represented, he said, a big return on the voluntary COPE contributions made by CWA members.

Keel of USS Samuel Gompers is Laid

GREETING was extended to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany by two men who work on the USS Samuel Gompers, W. G. Clitterbaugh and Marvin Lillie. At left, Assistant Labor Sec. James J. Reynolds.

THE KEEL WAS DECORATED with bunting and carried a portrait of Gompers as it hung suspended in midair before being lowered into place at the climax of an impressive ceremony.

USS SAMUEL GOMPERS, named in honor of the founding president of the American Federation of Labor, will be built by union workers under the bargaining agreement between the Bremerton Metal Trades Council and the Puget Sound shipyard. The first destroyer tender to be built by the Navy since 1945, it will be 644 feet long, have an 85-foot beam and displace 20,500 tons. It will be manned by 135 officers and 1,668 enlisted personnel. Construction will take about two years. When completed and outfitted the ship will be able to make all repairs to destroyers, including nuclear power plants and missiles, and will accompany the fleet. In announcing that the vessel would be named for Gompers, Pres. Johnson said "the social and economic position of American workers today is to a large extent attributable to his efforts." He called Gompers "a man who believed in and worked for peace" but who "knew its best guarantee is the power of self-protection." At right Meany makes the principal address at the keel-laying. Above, he cuts his initials (inset) into the keel before the ceremony. Looking on are, left to right, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) and Paul G. Warner of the Bremerton Plumbers & Pipe Fitters.

AT THE KEEL-LAYING: From left, Pres. Hunter P. Wharton, Operating Engineers; Pres. Russell M. Stephens, Technical Engineers; Pres. Russell Berg, Boiler Makers; Pres. B. A. Gritta, AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.; Pres. James A. Suffridge, Retail Clerks; Wirtz; Meany; Jackson; Pres. C. W. Sickles, Asbestos Workers, and Pres. Peter T. Schoemann, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters.

DOWN INTO PLACE the keel of the USS Samuel Gompers is lowered as Meany (left) and Wirtz watch intently. Gompers, born in England, was a member of the Cigarmakers. He died in 1924. Fittingly, the Puget Sound shipyard has long been a stronghold of government employe unionism. It was the first in the nation to negotiate a contract with a Metal Trades Council.

Spotlight on Congress

THE POLITICAL spotlight has shifted back from San Francisco to Washington and the wind-up sessions of the 88th Congress, underscoring the importance of the two-year legislative record in the election campaign.

The intense controversy stirred by the Goldwater nomination has for the moment tended to overshadow the fact that 35 Senate seats are up in the November balloting as well as all seats in the House. The senators and representatives facing the voters will to a great extent be judged on their records in the 88th Congress as well as by the candidates at the "top of the ticket."

To date the performance of the 88th Congress has been a good one. The first session was notable for the enactment of far-reaching health and education legislation and the ratification of the nuclear test ban treaty.

The passage of the historic civil rights bill and the tax cut have dominated the second session so far. But in the few weeks before the Democratic convention Congress has a fairly full agenda to complete the record to date.

High on this agenda is hospital care for the aged through social security, the President's anti-poverty program, housing and hospital construction legislation, a pay increase for government workers, the commission on automation and the entire range of appropriation bills geared to the needs of the various agencies and their programs, especially funds to enforce the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

There is time enough to enact all these measures before the onset of the Democratic convention, measures that will round out a two-year record that could make the 88th Congress one of the most memorable in American history.

Issue or Propaganda?

THE TECHNIQUE of measuring public opinion and reaction to propaganda phrases and slogans has been around a long time but when a polltaker fails to draw the distinction between the propaganda line and the issue he is not in reality measuring anything.

Lou Harris, a veteran and respected pollster, fell into this trap recently in attempting to measure public opinion on GOP Presidential Candidate Barry Goldwater's known views, including a so-called federal "right-to-work" law. His poll showed that a majority of his sample agreed with Goldwater on the need for such legislation.

What Harris' question did not report or reflect was that the phrase "right-to-work" is a phony phrase worked up by anti-union forces to attack the basic right of union and management to agree to a collective bargaining contract covering union security.

The inherent falsity of the phrase in describing this relationship between labor and management has been documented in a number of court cases and most recently in Oregon, where the state's Supreme Court ruled that the phrase was fraudulent and misleading and could not be used in a petition title.

Earlier this year the voters of Oklahoma decisively defeated a "right-to-work" proposal although a poll taken by Harris early in the campaign showed a majority in favor of "right-to-work." When the campaign against the proposal developed and its true union-busting objective was disclosed, the voters turned it down.

If the pollsters are trying to gauge public opinion on important issues then they have the obligation to present the issues accurately rather than using pat propaganda phrases worked up by proponents of one side of the issue.

New York Times Editorial:

GOP Disaster, Threat to Nation Seen in Goldwater Nomination

The following is excerpted from an editorial appearing in the New York Times of July 19, 1964, titled "Disaster at San Francisco."

WITH THE NOMINATION of Sen. Barry Goldwater for the Presidency of the United States, the right wing of the Republican party has at last won the great victory it had vainly sought for so many years. It has succeeded in naming as leader of the party and standard-bearer in the national election a man who is the very symbol of radical reaction; it iced the cake with a vice presidential nominee in complete consonance with Sen. Goldwater; it beat off every attempt to liberalize the platform; it now sees central control of the party machinery safely in its own hands.

The triumph within the party of the Republican revolutionaries of the right is complete, so complete that almost no substantive concessions of any kind had to be made at San Francisco to the moderate, much less to the progressive, wing.

Sen. Goldwater's remarkable success, which almost no one would have predicted six months ago, is due to a complex of factors. One of the most important of these is that a large part of the basic Republican party structure—the county committeemen, the precinct captains, the workers in the grass roots, especially from west of the Alleghanies and south of the Potomac—does believe in the kind of Republicanism that Sen. Goldwater represents. These were the Republican "pros" who formed the basis of the late Robert A. Taft's strength at the 1952 convention and earlier.

We do not believe that this group, important though it is, represents, or in recent years has represented, the majority of Republican voters. There is no evidence, either in polls or in primaries, that it does; and there is a great deal of evidence that it does not. Yet it had clear control of the San Francisco convention.

But Sen. Goldwater's appeal, however limited it may at this time be, is of course not confined to this segment of the party faithful. There are the radical extremists of the far right, whose influence and whose voices were painfully evident at San Francisco. There are the ominously unknown numbers of people in both North and South who resent and fear the social and especially the economic intrusion of the Negro into their heretofore exclusive domain, and who believe that they can get along with Sen. Goldwater and his kind of Republican party better than with the Democrats—as they undoubtedly can and as he encouraged them to believe in his acceptance speech. Finally, there are those Americans who, politically speaking, long to return to the womb. They are ready to translate into political action their yearning for what seems like a simpler, more moral, better-ordered past; and Sen. Goldwater, with his simplistic answers for the most complex problems, is their man.

BUT HE IS NOT the man for the modern, progressive Republicanism that until last week had controlled the party for a generation and had represented its broad rank and file. He is not the man for the problems of the age we live in. He is not the man to guide the destinies of the United States for the next four years.

He is on the contrary a man whose foreign policy is unthinking and whose domestic policy is unbelievable. And so, by and large, are the views expounded in the platform.

His political philosophy, insofar as he has any, is contradictory and confusing. His statements and his votes have repeatedly favored a super-nationalistic, militaristic stance. In one breath he calls for decentralization of government, in the next he favors policies and programs that would require even greater centralization. In one breath he talks of freedom, in the next he says that "extremism in the defense of liberty is no vice." This is nothing less than the doctrine, antipathetic to all American tradition, that the end justifies the means.

The Goldwater nomination is a disaster for the Republican party. It is a shattering defeat for the forces of progressive conservatism. Gov. Scranton deserves full marks for a gallant if belated try to save the party from itself, but the Republican leader who comes out of the fray with greatest honor in defeat is Gov. Rockefeller.

But the nomination of a Goldwater-Miller ticket on a Goldwater platform is more than a disaster for the Republican party. It is a threat to the country. The Goldwater approach to nuclear weapons, the Goldwater formula for mastering communism, the Goldwater view of civil rights, the Goldwater attitude toward trade and aid, social security, education, poverty, taxation—these are only some of the reasons why his Presidency would be calamitous.

It seriously reflects on the maturity and stability of this country that a man holding such views, running on such a platform, could be nominated by one of the two great political parties—or what is left of it.

Morgan Says:

GOP Vice Presidential Nominee Lacks 'Ready-Made Stature'

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m. EDT.)

SAN FRANCISCO—Around the turn of the century, Finley Peter Dunne's garrulous barkeep, Mr. Dooley, made some devastating observations about the vice presidency. I won't even attempt his inimitable Irish accent but here is what he said:

"You can't be sent to jail for it, but it's a kind of a disgrace. It is principally because of the vice president that most of our presidents have enjoyed such rugged health. The vice president guards the president, and the president, after sizing up the vice president, concludes that it would be better for the country if he should live yet awhile."

Morgan

Others have compounded this image of ineffectuality. In the 1930s the role of the endearing but bumbling Throttlebottom in George Gershwin's delightfully sardonic musical comedy, "Of Thee I Sing," became a synonym for the occupant of the office that is first in succession to the White House if something happens to the president. Gradually Washington and the country have been re-evaluating the vice presidency, but a good joke perishes stubbornly. It expired, presumably, in Dallas last Nov. 22.

The stunning but too easily forgettable fact is that in this century alone four presidents have died in office and two more nearly died. Theodore Roosevelt became president when William McKinley was assassinated. Calvin Coolidge succeeded Warren G. Harding after the latter succumbed to an illness right here in San Francisco. Harry S. Truman, who had been presiding in virtual obscurity over the Senate, began presiding over the country when a fatal stroke felled Franklin D. Roosevelt 19 years ago last spring. And Lyndon B. Johnson was sworn in as the nation's chief executive in the presidential jet minutes before it bore him and its heart-breaking burden, the body of John F. Kennedy, back to Washington from Texas last November.

Woodrow Wilson fell so desperately ill late in his second term that for all intents and purposes his wife, not he, made the decisions of the presidency. And Dwight D. Eisenhower was victimized first by a serious heart attack, then an intestinal obstruction called ileitis and a mild cerebral occlusion.

After Pres. Kennedy was murdered, the country and Congress quickly took stock of the problem of presidential succession. A bundle of legislation was introduced to fill the gap when the vice president takes over a dead president's job. And the nation, according to the columnists, the commentators and—perhaps more importantly—the reactions of ordinary citizens indicated a demand for a vice president with all the qualities of leadership.

The legislation is still pigeonholed on Capitol Hill but presumably the mood of Americans still is that the running mate of a presidential nominee must display obvious presidential qualifications and not be chosen for cynical reasons of expediency merely to strengthen the ticket by "balancing" it with his geographic or other appeal to special sections or groups.

FIFTY-YEAR-OLD William E. Miller, a native of Lockport, N. Y., a small town near Buffalo, may well have presidential potentialities locked inside his well-groomed, self-possessed person. But the reasons most readily available from Goldwater headquarters for his choice as the running mate for the Arizona senator on the Republican ticket are that he is a Roman Catholic from the politically most important eastern state, that his voting record as a congressman is vaguely "middle of the road" and that he is an aggressive campaigner.

While top strategists at the White House are apprehensively respectful of the campaign talents of Sen. Goldwater as an adversary to Pres. Johnson, it can be said on excellent authority that the President and his aides are far more astonished than unhappy about the selection of Rep. Miller for the GOP No. Two spot.

He is, as one convention observer put it, a kind of junior Richard Nixon, a "gut fighter" and an accomplished debater with much of the ex-Vice President's slashing style but singularly without the experience which Nixon had 12 years ago when he left the Senate to run with Gen. Eisenhower. And although in recent years he has served both as congressman and as chairman of the Republican National Committee, Miller is almost unknown whereas Nixon in 1952 had already achieved something of a celebrity status for his assiduous congressional labors in "exposing" Alger Hiss.

In contrast the most likely prospects for the Democratic vice presidential nomination are already national figures in their own right—Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, Defense Sec. Robert McNamara, Peace Corps and anti-Poverty Dir. Sargent Shriver, Atty. Gen. Robert Kennedy and others.

Undoubtedly Sen. Goldwater had his own good reasons for picking Rep. Miller but competing with his possible Democratic opposite number on a basis of ready-made stature does not seem to have been one of them.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

(Willard Shelton, whose commentary on the Washington scene normally appears in this space, is on vacation.)

ANY RESEMBLANCE between the Republican Party of 1960 and the Republican Party of today has been shattered by the "Goldwater platform" adopted by the Republican National Convention in San Francisco.

The 1960 GOP platform recognized some of the needs of workers and did call for federal concern and federal action in the field of social welfare.

The Goldwater platform speaks of labor almost entirely in a different fashion and speaks of social welfare programs—when it does—almost entirely in terms of 19th Century "charity" programs to answer the needs of the poor.

The Goldwater platform has no separate section devoted to labor and labor legislation. Instead, paragraphs dealing with labor are hidden away.

Here are some of them:

- "Constant opposition to any form of unregulated monopoly whether business or labor," which is an indirect way of calling for legislation that would place labor under the anti-trust laws.
- Support for a "fair and adequate" program for providing "necessary supplemental farm labor" which can only mean a revival of the foreign farm labor, or bracero, program which is due to expire this year.
- Incentives for employers to hire teen-agers, including broadening of temporary exemptions under the minimum wage law, which can only serve to undermine minimum wage protection.
- "Complete reorganization of the National Labor Relations Board to insure impartial protection of the rights of the public, employes and employers, ending the defiance of Congress by the present Board."

Compare these references to labor and the GOP 1960 platform:

- While supporting Taft-Hartley, that platform did express support of the right of unions to negotiate the union shop. Goldwater is a confirmed "right-to-worker," but the platform makers apparently decided to ignore the issue which has hurt the party in more than one election.
- After boasting of Republican action in increasing the minimum wage, extending unemployment compensation and other improvements for workers, the 1960 platform called for upward revision in the amount of coverage of minimum wage legislation to "several million more workers." The Goldwater platform says nothing on this.
- Strengthening the unemployment insurance system and extending its benefits. Again, nothing in the Goldwater platform.

Much the same is true on the social welfare front.

All of the stress of the Goldwater platform is on reliance on the individual's "rights and capacities" to advance his own economic well-being and to do what he wants with his money. The role of the government is minimized.

- The 1960 platform was considerably warmer on these subjects.
- It boasted of improvements in social security under the Eisenhower Administration.
- It called for continued efforts to clear slums, new programs to stimulate development of housing for the elderly, and nursing homes; a stepping-up of federal housing programs for middle and low income families.
- It called for stepped-up federal powers to combat water pollution and air pollution.
- It called for increased federal authority in protecting the health of consumers through the Food & Drug Administration.

On the other hand, the Goldwater platform is chiefly noted for its failure even to mention such programs. Instead, it throws the burden of such programs on the states and cities, limiting the federal role to a better tax system.

The Goldwater platform, all in all, is straight from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce; has a conservative, if not reactionary, businessman's approach to all problems, and represents a sharp switch from moderate Republican philosophy. (Washington Window—PAI).

Washington Reports:

Wirtz Stresses Jobs as Vital To Civil Rights Act's Success

SUCCESS OF CIVIL RIGHTS legislation depends not only on the cooperation of the public, but also on auxiliary programs for job opportunities, education and housing, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

Jobs, Wirtz said, are of special importance. "The private economy just hasn't been doing its part on this and we are not kidding ourselves," he asserted. "It doesn't matter what educational, training or retraining programs we have unless there are jobs at the end of them. There have got to be more jobs."

The secretary said: "There are today about 1.75 million more jobs than a year ago. Most of that increase has come in the last 6 or 7 months; there is reason to believe the tax cut has invigorated the economy.

"But if the private economy doesn't produce the additional jobs we need under the present set-up, then I am sure the public will insist upon doing whatever is necessary to see that it does. . . . It is important, as Pres. Johnson has said, that if the present program doesn't produce the needed jobs, we will see what it takes to produce them."

Wirtz stressed the need of emphazing the role of the people, rather than the government, in the success of civil rights.

THE "MOST IMPORTANT legislation at the moment," Wirtz said, "is the Economic Opportunities Act (the Administration's anti-poverty program), which is now before Congress, and must be passed without delay. It will permit, within the next 12 months, training of half a million boys and girls between the ages of 16 and 21. It will give a second chance, or at least another chance, to them."

Wirtz said he regarded the Civil Rights Act as one applying to the "disadvantaged," rather than only to Negroes or minorities. He said these are the persons who have not had as much or as good education, who have worse living conditions, less incentive, and among whom there is more juvenile delinquency and crime, as a consequence.

"We have to break this cycle," he asserted.

JOBS IN PRIVATE INDUSTRY are needed now as one of the most important essentials to the success of the Civil Rights Act, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, right, declared in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People. Harry W. Flannery was the reporter.

How to Buy:

Furniture, Rugs, Tires Offer Values for Careful Shoppers

By Sidney Margolius

AUGUST IS THE BIG MONTH for home furnishings sales, with reductions available on furniture, bedding, rugs, household linens, curtains and drapes. Also look for cut-price specials on tires just before Labor Day.

But shop food values closely this month. Prices are rising, especially on meats.

August also is the month factories and dealers trim price tags on current model cars to clear them before the new ones arrive this fall. Even sharper price cuts will be available in September. Economy minded drivers who prefer a relatively simple, compact car may find the late summer price concessions a double-barrelled opportunity. For one reason, on approximately the same size and model you typically save about $150 at the close of the model year. For another, the forthcoming 1965 models are going to be longer, more powerful and more luxurious, with consequently higher operating costs.

In general, the manufacturers are planning to push larger cars next year with expensive optional features such as bucket seats. Because the auto industry has just completed a record sales year, it is convinced the public wants more size and power, and that the demand for compacts has dwindled. The industry made much the same mistake in 1959-1960, and had a recession as a result.

Here are tips on other August buying opportunities:

FURNITURE: In shopping the August furniture sales, we advise comparing values at three stores at least, including one department store, one so-called "discount store" and one independent specialty furniture store. Department stores are especially sales-minded and often offer sizable reductions in the August sales. Discount stores often sell furniture for about 10 percent less than standard prices. But specialty furniture stores, especially when pressing for volume or in need of cash, sometimes are the biggest price cutters.

Beware the stores that emphasize installment terms, and especially those that promote large groupings such as "15-piece suites." Often the additional pieces consist of cheap lamps, pictures, etc., thrown in to build up the appearance of value. Often a complete set, such as a full bedroom set, does offer more value than assembling separate pieces, if you do need all the pieces. But at sales you sometimes can find individual pieces, sharply reduced, that can be assembled into a set.

Maple usually gives you more for your money than most other hardwoods. But you need to make sure whether you are being sold genuine maple, not gumwood finished in maple. Solid maple is closely grained. Gumwood may be satisfactory for your needs, but don't pay a "maple" price for it. Also examine the finish carefully to make sure it has depth and smoothness without the shininess characteristic of poorly made furniture. Oak also often is used in moderate price Early American furniture, and is closely grained, strong wood. Walnut is the most widely used furniture wood today and makes strong, stable furniture although often a little more expensive. Mahogany usually is the costliest furniture. Pine often is the least expensive, and is satisfactory if carefully selected.

One simple way to compare values is to compare the same size chest in different offerings. Be sure the chests are the same size in depth as well as height and width. Some inexpensive chests may be only 15 inches deep; others 16, and the better qualities 17 to 18.

RUGS: Prices of nylon rugs have been reduced this year and offer good value. But "nylon" rugs can vary tremendously in quality, even rugs bearing the name of the same fiber manufacturer, such as duPont. You need also to compare the closeness of weave, thickness of pile and weight.

TIRES: There are few really standard prices on tires. Gas stations, tire specialty dealers and discount stores all cut prices of the national brands in varying degree, while the large retailers such as consumer co-ops and mail order houses feature their own brands, made by the same national brand manufacturers, at low prices.

Nor are grades standardized. In general, most manufacturers sell a premium tire, first line (original equipment grade), second line, third line, and some even fourth line or "economy" tire. You cannot depend on the nomenclature. What may be called a "deluxe" tire actually may be one of the lower grades.

Premium tires typically sell for $27-$30 for the 6.70-15 tubeless, including excise tax; first-line, $20-23; second-line, $18-$20; third-line, $12-$16, and lower grades, $10 or less. The lower grades are not recommended. For hard use on a car you expect to keep for some time, the first line provides a high degree of wear and safety. For moderate use, or a car you may not keep long, a second line tire may be satisfactory.

FOOD BUYING CALENDAR: Meat prices are going up with pork more expensive. Beef, while rising, is still relatively reasonable. Best dinner buys are turkeys and broilers. Also take advantage of the bumper crop of plums this year.

Mrs. Peterson:

Public Revolt Seen On 'Humbug' in Ads

NEW YORK—Out-and-out fraud can be punished by law, but what is almost equally bad is the "respectable humbug" that is used against the housewife, in the opinion of Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson, Pres. Johnson's adviser on consumer problems.

Mrs. Peterson told the Magazine Promotion Group here that American consumers are about to start a "revolt against humbug—against the massive assaults that are made on the human intelligence by some of today's most conspicuous advertising."

Exaggerated claims for questionable products, phony association of products with completely unrelated situations or subjects, and appeals to the worst rather than the best of human motivations were listed by Mrs. Peterson as the kind of humbug that needs to be cleaned up.

Mrs. Peterson said that the President's consumer program was "part of an overall program to improve the quality of life in the United States—to advance what the President has called the 'Great Society.' "

Most complaints about advertising, she said, have focused on television advertising, whereas the general reaction to magazine advertising tended to be favorable.

She listed four guidelines for good advertising:

- It tells in simple terms what is available in the marketplace, how much it costs, and how it will perform.
- It contributes to the consumer's right to comprehensive shopping by making clear on packages and labels the cost per unit and the quality of the product.
- It presents a true view of reality, backed up by appeals to the consumer's intelligence rather than to his emotions and prejudices.
- It contributes the use of its talents and facilities to worthwhile causes and understanding of important problems confronting the nation.

Mrs. Peterson applauded the advertising community for cooperating with the federal government through the Advertising Council, and enjoined the advertising profession to help the nation take a "giant step toward establishment of the Great Society" by seeking to improve the quality of American life and culture through devoting "as much time to, and space to information as it does to persuasion."

Questions & Answers on Equal Pay Act

The following questions and answers on the equal pay for women law that went into effect last month are excerpted from an article in the July 1964 AFL-CIO American Federationist prepared by the federation's Dept. of Research.

1. What employes are covered by the Equal Pay Act?

All employes covered by the minimum wage provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act also are protected by the Equal Pay Act. Their employers must not discriminate among them on the basis of sex in the payment of wages. In general the act applies to workers in interstate commerce, except for certain occupations and industries which are specifically exempted in whole or in part.

Equal pay protection, however, applies only within single establishments of any particular employer. The law does not require equalization of job rates between employes working in different establishments of the same employer. An "establishment" means any physically separate place of business of an employer, such as a plant in one location and a warehouse in another.

2. What types of pay are included under the Equal Pay Act? Are fringe benefits included?

The Equal Pay Act specifically requires equalization of "wage rates" for men and women doing equal work. The term "wage rate" includes all types of rates, whether on a time, piece or job basis. Overtime pay rates are included as well as straight time pay rates.

Fringe benefits are not included as "wages" under the Fair Labor Standards Act and thus are not included under the Equal Pay Act.

3. Must jobs be exactly alike in order for the equal pay requirement to apply?

No. Jobs must be essentially alike in their basic characteristics but they do not have to be identical. Minor differences, such as would not ordinarily be taken into account in deciding on wage rates, should be disregarded.

4. Must jobs that are wholly dissimilar be compared for equal pay purposes?

No. Jobs that are fundamentally different in the type in duties required are outside the scope of the Equal Pay Act. Bookkeepers need not be compared with file clerks, for example, or janitors with assemblers.

However, job titles alone are not enough to establish that jobs are alike or are different—the actual requirements of the job are what count. The general term, "retail clerk," for example, may cover both jobs that are very much alike (e.g., selling men's wear and selling infants' wear) and jobs that are quite different (selling major electrical appliances versus infants' wear).

5. What standards must be met in order for work to be considered "equal?"

Jobs are to be considered "equal" if they require "equal skill, effort and responsibility." Each factor is to be considered separately and only if a job measures up to another on all three counts will it be considered "equal" to the other job. A job might be equal to another in skill requirements, for example, but if it requires less effort or less responsibility the equal pay requirement would not apply. Minor differences in skill, effort and responsibility, however, should be disregarded in making an overall judgment of whether two jobs are "equal."

Jobs also must be performed under "similar working conditions" to require the same pay.

6. What is meant by "equal skill?"

"Skill" includes such factors as experience, training, education and ability. Only such skills as are actually needed to perform the job should be taken into account. Skill that an employe has but which is not needed for the job should be disregarded.

An employe's individual efficiency in performing his or her job is not in itself a factor to be considered as part of the skill requirement.

Where the skill requirements are equal, the fact that one employe may use the skill for a greater portion of time when another employe should be disregarded. For example, if two employes are employed basically as typists but also required to run a calculating machine, the fact that one runs the calculator more frequently than the other would not make the skill requirements fundamentally different.

Even where certain specific job duties differ altogether for some of the time, the skill required may still be "equal" in degree. Thus if a man and a woman both work as typists for two-thirds of the time but, in the remaining one-third, the man runs the calculator and the woman does copy work, the jobs might nevertheless still be judged to require "equal skill." This would be true if no extra degree of skill is required for the calculator work. The skill requirements would definitely differ, however, if it should turn out that the calculator operation actually requires more training and is normally better paid than the typing work, while the copy work done by the woman requires less training and is normally paid less.

7. What is meant by "equal effort?"

"Effort" is the physical or mental exertion needed to perform a job.

Effort may be "equal" even though the type of effort is different. An extra degree of manual dexterity required in one job, for example, may offset an extra degree of physical exertion required in another. Thus male check-out clerks in a supermarket may spend part of their time in the physical effort of moving heavy stock. Female check-out clerks may spend the same amount of time in work requiring extra manual dexterity, such as in rearranging displays of spice boxes or other small items. The difference in the kind of effort required would not justify a wage differential.

Requirements for occasional or sporadic extra effort on one job as compared with another should be disregarded.

Where additional effort is a regular part of one job as compared with another, however, a wage differential may be justified. This would be so, for example in the case of a male assembler at the end of an assembly line who regularly spends part of his time lifting the assembly and placing it on a pallet, a duty not required for female assemblers.

A wage rate differential based on differences in the degree of effort required must apply uniformly to men and women. Where lifting is required for some men, for example, and not for others, a higher rate than is paid to women would be justified only for those men actually required to do the lifting and not for all men.

8. What is meant by "equal responsibility?"

"Responsibility" refers to the degree of accountability required in the performance of the job. Only significant types of responsibility should be taken into account—not minor extra chores (such as, for example, giving an employe the "responsibility" for turning out the lights in his department at the end of the day).

Inclusion of supervisory functions in an employe's job would be one example of additional responsibility justifying a wage differential. Extra pay for a "relief" supervisor in training for a supervisory position would be a case in point. Where it is the practice to pay both men and women higher rates when they perform such supervisory duties, there would be no question at all as to the validity of a differential.

Another example would be special entrustment with money. A sales clerk with the responsibility for deciding whether to accept personal checks from customers in payment for goods could reasonably be paid more than a clerk without such responsibility.

9. What is meant by "similar working conditions?"

Generally, employes performing jobs requiring equal skill, effort and responsibility are likely to be performing the jobs under similar working conditions.

Minor or inconsequential differences in working conditions should be disregarded. The mere fact that two jobs are in different departments, for example would not in itself establish that the conditions of work are different.

On the other hand, very clear dissimilarities would remove the jobs from consideration under the Equal Pay Act. This would be the case, for example, where one sales person sells a product exclusively inside a store and another sells the same product away from the store. Also, repair work done in a shop would be performed under different working conditions from repair work done in customers' homes.

10. What are the exceptions to the equal pay requirements?

The Equal Pay Act is not designed to interfere with ordinary pay practices or systems under which individuals normally receive different rates of pay even though performing equal work.

Thus the law specifically excepts differentials arising out of the operation of (1) a senority system (2) a merit system or (3) a system which measures earnings by quantity or quality of production.

In addition the law makes a general exception for any other type of pay differential not based on sex.

Pay differentials of a non-discriminatory nature may occur in such situations as the following:

- Night shift differentials: Extra pay provided for hours worked on the night shift.
- Red circle rates: Unusual, higher than normal wage rates maintained for special reasons, such as in the case of an employer who must reduce help in a skilled job and who transfers the skilled employes to lower paid jobs without reducing their rate so as to have them available when they are again needed for their former jobs.
- Temporary reassignments: Continuance of an employe's regular pay rate for periods when the worker is temporarily assigned to lower or higher paid work.
- Entrance rates: The practice of providing a range of rates at which new employes may be hired depending on their individual background and qualifications.
- Training programs: Trainees under a bona fide training program may be assigned from time to time to various types of work and their pay may differ from that of the employes regularly engaged in such work. Provided the trainee rates apply equally to both sexes, there would be no violation of the law.
- Part-time employes: Special rates for part-time workers differing from the rates paid to fulltime workers doing the same or equal work will not violate the equal pay principle if the special rates apply uniformly to both men and women.

11. Who administers the Equal Pay Act?

As part of the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Equal Pay Act is administered by the U.S. Dept. of Labor through its Wage & Hour and Public Contracts Divisions. Inquiries about the act may be made to any of the Wage-Hour field offices or regional offices or to the Wage-Hour Administrator in Washington.

12. How does the Dept. of Labor find out about violations of the Equal Pay Act?

Violations may be discovered through regular inspections of establishments carried out by wage-hour investigators. Violations also are brought to the attention of the department through specific complaints made by individuals. All complaints and information concerning violations are kept completely confidential.

13. What can an individual do who believes he or she is being discriminated against under the Equal Pay Act?

A person who believes he or she is not receiving "equal pay" as required by the law can get in touch with the nearest office of the Wage & Hour and Public Contracts Divisions of the U.S. Dept. of Labor. If the complaint appears valid, a wage-hour investigator will make a regular inspection visit to the establishment. If a violation is found, he will seek the employer's voluntary compliance with the law, including payment of any back wages due. Back wages can be recovered for a period of up to two years (but not for any period before the effective date of the act). If the employer refuses to comply, the secretary of labor can apply for a court injunction to enforce compliance, including payment of back wages due.

Alternatively, a person may make a written request to the secretary of labor to bring a court suit on his or her behalf for payment of back wages which have been withheld in violation of the law. The secretary may bring suit, however, only if no unsettled point of law is involved.

Finally, as a third method, an individual can bring a court suit of his own for back pay plus "liquidated damages" (not to exceed the amount of the back pay) and attorney's fees and court costs. Such an individual suit may not be brought, however, if the person already has been paid back wages found to be due under the law or if the secretary already has filed suit to collect the wages.

14. Suppose an employer tries to fire a worker for making a complaint under the Act?

It would be a violation of the law for an employer to discharge an employe for filing a complaint or otherwise taking part in any proceedings under the act.

15. What are the responsibilities of labor unions under the Act?

Labor unions are specifically forbidden to "cause or attempt to cause" an employer to discriminate in the payment of wages on the basis of sex.

Unions may not strike or picket to induce an employer to establish or maintain a discriminatory wage rate, nor may unions demand any terms or interpretation of terms in a collective bargaining agreement that would require the employer to discriminate in violation of the law.

Unions representing employes share with the employer the responsibility for seeing that agreed-upon rates do not violate the act. Thus unions must not agree to rates they know to be in violation.

No special penalties have been added to the Fair Labor Standards Act that apply specifically to unions. Rather, unions and their agents are subject to the general penalty provisions applicable to any person who violates the act.

16. What is the relation of the federal Equal Pay Act to similar state laws?

Both state and federal law must be complied with.

Labor-Aided Troupe Brings Bard to Parks

New York—Thousands of New Yorkers to whom Shakespeare has been merely a name are seeing the Bard's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" without cost in all parts of the city this summer.

A touring troupe, financed in part by organized labor, is presenting the play before capacity crowds in parks and playgrounds, band shells and recreation centers and on baseball diamonds—and the audiences are eating it up.

The mobile theater tour is under the auspices of the New York Shakespeare Festival and ties in with the world observance of the Bard's 400th birthday. It is under the direction of Joseph Papp.

The project was conditioned upon the raising of $70,000, with the Taconic Foundation agreeing to put up $35,000 if Papp and his aides could raise the rest.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council made a grant of $5,000. Two units of the Ladies' Garment Workers, the Skirt & Sportswear Workers and the Undergarment & Negligee Workers, gave $500 each. The Drug & Hospital Employes gave $150 and the Hatters $100. The largest contribution came from Beech-Nut Baby Foods and its subsidiary, Cafe Bustelo.

The English-language tour opened June 29 and will run through August, with final performances scheduled for Aug. 28 and 29 at the World's Fair. Seven performances will be given in Spanish in four different boroughs during the first week of September.

Hotel Workers Win Social Security Ruling

A clause in the New York City hotel contract giving employes social security credit on their tip income has been validated by the Social Security Administration.

The New York Hotel & Motel Trades Council, which represents 35,000 organized hotel workers, received notification of the decision from SSA Commissioner Robert M. Ball. It will mean an increase of about $43 monthly in retirement benefits for the average covered worker.

The contract clause requires the employes and their employers to assume that the small wage specified in the agreement plus the tips the waiter or other tip employe receives total $70 a week, and the social security taxes must be paid on that amount.

It was first negotiated in 1962 and went into effect Jan. 1, 1963. The federal government, which collects income taxes on tips, ruled however they were not to be regarded as wages insofar as social security was concerned.

The union council inaugurated a campaign to have the ruling reversed which reached a climax last spring, when a delegation of 240 workers came to Washington to discuss the situation with Ball and other SSA and Internal Revenue officials.

Ruling Retroactive

Additional supplemental materials were submitted by both the union and the Hotel Association, and Ball announced that the $70 weekly "may be deemed to be creditable as wages for social security benefit purposes." The ruling was made retroactive to June 1, 1963.

Council Pres. Jay Rubin called the decision "a major breakthrough in the long fight to end the injustice suffered by tip workers under the social security system."

However, he said, the union will continue its efforts to have Congress remedy the exclusion of tips from income for social security purposes. The House Ways & Means Committee recently approved a bill correcting the situation.

UAW Local Launches Own High School Class

Kansas City, Mo.—School bells are ringing again for 237 members of the Auto Workers who, until this summer, hadn't been inside a classroom for years.

The 237 summer scholars meet twice a week in the union hall, directly across Highway 69 from the Ford assembly plant where they all work in suburban Claycomo. Third shift workers assemble at 2 p.m. and those on the second shift at 5:15 p.m. every Tuesday and Thursday.

Some of the students are school "dropouts" who, after 20 hours of classwork, will take tests qualifying them for the equivalent of a high school diploma. Others are taking "brushup" courses in favorite subjects.

Sanctioned by State

Frederick R. McLeod, director of freshman English at the University of Missouri, is teaching intensified courses sanctioned by the state Dept. of Education.

Don Davis, president of UAW Local 249, started the whole thing when he distributed handbills at the assembly plant gates asking questions like these:

"Did the depression jerk you out of school? Did your father die before you finished high school? Did you marry your high school sweetheart and have to find a job? Did you go to war before you graduated?"

Davis's comment: "Friend, there are a lot of us in the same boat. Don't be ashamed, do something about it."

Union stewards reported a lot of members interested in the education idea but nobody expected the rush to enroll. Davis stressed a point that appealed to a good many students. He put it this way in his handbill:

"Class sessions will be at the union hall and will be as comfortable as a bull session on a back porch."

The students average a ninth grade education and, said Davis, have two things in common: "They're not satisfied with their education; they want to earn that high school diploma." He added:

"Like my wife—she had a half-year to go when her dad was killed. So she had to leave school to go to work."

State Senator Helped

Credit for an assist is given by the union to Missouri State Sen. William B. Waters, who helped get state accreditation for the school. Waters, who served as chairman of a state legislative committee on education from 1961 to 1963, praised the program because "education is increasingly important in terms of jobs and careers."

McLeod, who teaches adult education classes on the university level, declared that he never has taught a more receptive group of students.

"They are attentive and eager to learn," he said. "There is a real feeling that something is being accomplished. They come to class well prepared, and they make the most of their time."

Most students study English grammar and usage, general mathematics, and reading. At the end of each class session the union furnishes refreshments, and plans to pay the state fee of $6 per student for examinations.

Insurance Workers Fill Board Vacancy

The Insurance Workers have announced the election of Harry D. Forster, Miami insurance agent, as a member of the IWIU executive board, and the appointment of Richard D. Valenti, veteran Prudential agent, as a union staff representative.

Congress 'Hoaxed,' Edelman Charges

John W. Edelman, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, made this comment on the McNamara subcommittee report on health insurance coverage of older Americans:

"Congress now has more evidence than it needs to realize it has been hoodwinked and hoaxed by organized medicine and the private insurance business into a shameful sell-out of millions of elderly citizens."

He said the report demonstrates that "the only fiscally-sound and practical way to meet the desperate health care needs of older Americans is through a social security-financed hospital insurance bill."

Anti-Poverty Bill Sparks Senate Clash

for the Republican convention, plunged immediately into its legislative backlog in the hope of winding up its business before the Democratic convention convenes Aug. 24. If the goal is reached, it would be the earliest adjournment of Congress since 1958.

The House, with bipartisan support, quickly passed a labor-supported bill to establish a National Commission of Technology, Automation & Economic Progress. It was approved, 259-75, under a suspension of the rules procedure requiring a two-thirds vote.

The proposed 14-member commission, including labor and management representatives, would be charged with setting up an advance warning system to alert the nation to future impacts from automation and recommending measures to Congress, labor and management to meet the problems which will arise. The bill now goes to the Senate.

- The Senate voted 53-8 to confirm LeRoy Collins, former governor of Florida, as director of the new Community Relations Service established by the Civil Rights Act to help local communities cope with problems of desegregation.
- Pres. Johnson asked Congress to appropriate $13 million to carry out programs authorized by the Civil Rights Act, including $2.5 million to set up the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and funds to enable the Justice Dept. to hire additional attorneys to handle civil rights cases.
- The Senate approved by voice vote a pay increase of 2.5 percent for most servicemen and officers. Larger increases—of 8.5 percent—would go to officers with less than two years of service, whose base pay hasn't been raised since 1952. No raise, however, would go to draftees and other enlisted men with less than two years of service.
- The House Rules Committee cleared for floor action a bill raising social security benefits 5 percent, financed by an increase in both the social security tax rate and the taxable wage base. The bill was reported under a no-amendment rule which would bar an attempt to add a hospital insurance provision on the House floor.
- The House approved—by voice vote without dissent—an Administration bill authorizing $287.6 million for a four-year program of construction grants to build and rehabilitate nursing schools, a student loan program and direct grants to nursing schools to help meet the cost of increased enrollments. The bill, which now goes to the Senate, is patterned after the aid to medical and dental school program enacted last year.
- A House Judiciary subcommittee began hearings on a proposed constitutional amendment which would overturn the Supreme Court's ruling that both houses of a state legislature must be apportioned on the basis of population. The amendment, by Rep. William M. McCulloch (R-O.), would permit one house of a legislature to be apportioned on a basis other than population if approved by the voters of a state. The recently adopted Republican Party platform specifically endorsed the proposal and GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) has introduced the amendment in the Senate.

On deck in the Senate was a foreign aid authorization bill, to be quickly followed by an appropriations measure. The House has already acted on both bills. The AFL-CIO and its government union affiliates have urged the Senate to knock out of the bill permission for the Agency for Intl. Development to fire or "select-out" employes without regard to civil service procedures or appeal rights.

House and Senate conferees were expected to reach early agreement on a pay raise for government employes and officials. Slightly differing bills have been passed by the two houses.

Poverty Bill Opposed

The poverty bill faces another hard battle in the House, where an almost solid bloc of Republicans is lined up against it. The House Rules Committee, after lengthy hearings, was expected to clear the bill early in the week.

Administration supporters drew encouragement from the remarks of one of the bill's leading opponents, Rep. Peter Frelinghuysen, Jr. (R-N. J.), senior GOP member of the House Education & Labor Committee.

"Everybody seems to have his mind made up," said Frelinghuysen. "Nobody wants to vote for poverty in an election year."

ple hold adequate hospital insurance under the definition of adequacy established by the American Hospital Association. Well over half of all commercial hospital insurance policies pay only $10 or less a day toward hospital room and board charges."

- Blue Cross has in the past "come closest" to providing adequate coverage. "But now Blue Cross, under competitive and cost pressures, is employing a variety of devices . . . which reduce the extent of protection." The older Blue Cross subscriber faces a "double-barreled pressure" of shrinking benefits and rising premium charges, as some Blue Cross plans attempt to shift from the traditional "community rating" principle to the "experience rating" method which may double premium costs for the elderly.
- The best of the commercial health insurance plans are priced beyond the means of most older persons—$500 to $600 a year for an elderly couple.
- The so-called "State 65" programs, where several insurance companies combine to operate a pooled-risk plan, "have made virtually no progress in meeting the needs of the aged. They are costly now and will cost even more in the future."

It's "firm conclusion," the McNamara subcommittee declared, is that "private health insurance—with respect to the aged—is losing ground, not making progress . . . As a result, increasing numbers of our older people are confronted with financial catastrophe brought on by illness."

A Look at Tactics:

South Seen as Key To GOP Strategy

By Willard Shelton

"Democrats who think the election is in the bag will be in for a sad surprise if they stop working now," said Pierre Salinger, his party's senatorial candidate in California, immediately after the Republican National Convention.

An analysis of the campaign strategy of GOP Presidential Nominee Barry Goldwater, matched against the brilliant success he scored in pre-convention operations, suggests that Salinger's warning is a realistic one.

It was widely known in advance of the convention that Goldwater's managers had based their nomination hopes on what was called the "southern strategy." It was openly revealed if not volunteered.

The "southern strategy" called for Goldwater forces to sew up delegate strength in Republican party conventions in the 11 states of the Old Confederacy plus the border state of Kentucky; to build on this by picking up delegates in the sparsely populated or middle-sized states west of the Mississippi; and to strike the killing blow by winning just two or three of the Big Seven industrial states.

The southern state Republican parties, as Henry Cabot Lodge suggested, are made up of Johnny-come-lately, recently converted Democrats. (Said Lodge, former Republican Massachusetts senator, former GOP kingmaker with Eisenhower in 1952, former ambassador: "I'm not going to be driven out of my party by people who until three years ago were Democrats.")

Pungently said but irrelevant; there is no law against changing parties. The white southern new Republican leaders are no more humane on race issues than the Democratic organizations they left behind them; indeed, it is the Democrats—Gov. Sanders of Georgia, Sen. Russell of Georgia, Sen. Stennis of Mississippi and others—who have shown compassion for the southern Negro and have appealed to their people to accept the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and to live with it. The Republicans sent "lily-white" delegations to San Francisco.

Economic Issues Involved

They are basically in revolt on economic issues. They resent the changes they see in national life as more and more people move into huge urban-suburban metropolitan complexes. They dislike unions, federal "intrusions," what they call big "spending," what they call "welfare" programs. They have decided they can fight more effectively against national Democrats by moving into the Republican Party.

To them, the Negro revolution and Negro demonstrations are another example of something strange and unpleasant that the far-away federal government is either inciting, or meddling with, or at least tolerating. And they are, whether Lodge likes it or not, authentic Republicans.

The 11 Old Confederacy states, plus Kentucky, had 303 votes in the GOP convention; Goldwater got 292 of them. (This includes Texas, one of the Big Seven industrial states.)

There are 21 states west of the Mississippi, small to medium in size, that had 360 GOP delegates; Goldwater got 272 of them. The 292 southern votes and 272 trans-Mississippi votes gave him 564 toward the 655 he needed for nomination. When he won California's huge bloc of 86 in a binding primary that, by tradition at least, means something, he was at the 650 mark—on the verge of nomination, in short, without the massive piling-up of 52 out of the 58 Illinois votes, 56 out of 58 from Ohio, 30 out of 32 from Indiana, 20 of 40 from New Jersey.

The remainder of the total that gave him 883 first-ballot votes came from 75 delegates scattered through mid-Atlantic and New England states despite the fact that they are the home territory of Governors William W. Scranton, Nelson A. Rockefeller and George W. Lodge and Ambassador Lodge, his adversaries to a man.

The application of the "southern strategy" to the Nov. 3 election presents different problems, of course. Then it will be not a matter of quietly capturing obscure party state conventions but of winning popular vote majorities against an incumbent President with many advantages, both from his incumbency and from his proven skill in national affairs. The arithmetic, nevertheless, has its points of interest.

There are 538 votes in the Electoral College (three added this year for the District of Columbia) with 270 needed for a flat majority.

Two of 'Big 7' Needed

Eliminating the Big Seven states of California and Texas for the moment, the Old Confederacy states plus Kentucky have 112 Electoral College votes and the 21 small-to-medium trans-Mississippi states have 126, making a total of 238. Any two of the Big Seven states—those with 20 or more Electoral College votes—would give Goldwater more than enough—and this disregards New England, the smaller Mid-Atlantic states and Indiana.

The Goldwater campaign managers say they are going after all 50 states, that they have moved their thinking forward since they used to talk about "winning" without the big states east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio.

The one thing certain is that they are going to wage total war for the South, the Mountain states, the trans-Mississippi Prairie states and the Southwest, including both California and Texas.

As for the Northeast the Goldwater effort is likely to be to chop down the normal Democratic plurality in the cities in the hope of carrying whole states.

Republican Party Breach Widens Over Extremism, Civil Rights Issues

GOP campaign themes will include:

- A charge that the Administration pursues a weak, "vacillating" and "no-win" policy in Germany, in Laos, in Vietnam, in regard to Castro's Cuba.
- A drumfire of charges that "centralized" government in Washington has robbed the people of freedom to solve their own problems, including the problems arising from abrasive racial difficulties.
- An effort to capitalize on white resentment of Negro demonstrations—the "backlash" factor, although how emphatic and continuous will be is as yet undetermined.
- A "no-compromise" attitude toward the moderate wing of the Republican party as spelled out in the two sentences of the Goldwater acceptance speech that deeply disturbed many northeastern Republican leaders, evoked an ovation from his convention supporters and enraged New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller. These were the sentences, which in the convention context could scarcely be interpreted as other than deliberately provocative :

"Extremism in the defense of liberty is no vice. . . . Moderation in the pursuit of justice is no virtue."

Rockefeller's reply was almost instantaneous: The senator's statements were "dangerous, irresponsible and frightening." The Illinois GOP candidate for governor, Charles H. Percy, asked an "explanation" from the nominee; Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.), the party's Senate floor leader who had placed Goldwater's name in nomination, said he would seek an elaboration.

Goldwater's possible desire to capitalize on the "backlash" factor in regard to civil rights appeared primarily in the total failure of the candidate or the platform to speak about murder of rights workers in the South, the burning of churches, the resistance to Negro voter registration, plus a heavy emphasis on charges that the Administration was "exploiting" the race issue.

Said the platform:

"This Administration has exploited interracial tensions by extravagant campaign promises, without fulfillment, playing on the just aspirations of the minority groups, encouraging disorderly and lawless elements, and ineffectually administering the laws."

Both Dwight D. Eisenhower and Goldwater followed with speeches denouncing "crime in the streets" without mentioning crimes committed in the backwoods in resistance to the new civil rights law. So did the vice presidential nominee,

'Scandals' Cited

The platform and various convention speakers sought to wrap around Johnson's neck responsibility for scandals arising from the operations of two individuals—Billie Sol Estes, a get-rich-quick promoter who defrauded both other individuals and eastern financial circles and now is sitting in a Texas prison, and Bobbie Baker, onetime Senate majority clerk about whom GOP Republicans are charging a Senate Committee "cover-up."

Goldwater tightened his grip on Republican Party machinery with the election of 41 new members of the 106-man body. With Dean Burch, his own nominee, in as new national committee chairman, Goldwater chose John Grenier of Alabama, who had masterminded his highly complex Southern Delegations Communications Center at the convention, as coordinator for the southern part of the presidential race.

There was at the convention, in addition, an extraordinary emphasis on the Republican doctrine that "the press" is unfriendly.

Eisenhower got his biggest ovation when he talked about "sensation-seeking columnists and commentators." Rep. Steven B. Derounian (N. Y.) assailed "the press" in a speech opposing one of the platform amendments offered by the Michigan and Pennsylvania delegations. Former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon added a phrase that he hoped Goldwater would not be made "Mr. Republican Whipping Boy of 1964."

Goldwater, in a plane stop at Chicago while en route from Phoenix to Washington, D. C., said he thought it would be a "good idea" if he and the President could jointly agree to make civil rights a "quiet issue" during the campaign.

The Republican nominee got a dividend when Alabama's Gov. George C. Wallace abandoned his third-party drive and withdrew from the presidential contest. It was generally agreed that Wallace, if running, would take votes from Goldwater rather than from Johnson, and Wallace made it clear that with the Goldwater nomination he no longer felt any compulsion to offer himself as a third-party candidate.

Three GOP Senators Balk At Backing Goldwater

Three Republican senators, including two candidates for reelection, said they cannot "as of now" support their party's presidential nominee, Barry Goldwater.

New York's two senators, Jacob K. Javits and Kenneth B. Keating, and Maryland Sen. J. Glenn Beall said in separate statements that they differ with the nominee on several basic issues, including "extremism" and civil rights. Keating and Beall are in election battles this year.

A veteran Republican congressman, Rep. James G. Fulton (Pa.), also bolted the national ticket. Fulton, elected from the Pittsburgh area, said he would run on the 1960, not the 1964 GOP platform. He termed Goldwater a "radical."

There were other rumblings of dissatisfaction from the GOP's "moderate" wing. Michigan's Gov. George W. Romney parried questions about whether he would support Goldwater and said he would concentrate on his own state campaign. Vermont Sen. George D. Aiken said he would "wait and see how the campaign progresses."

None of the dissenters bolted the party or formally endorsed Pres. Johnson. Keating and Javits suggested that the forthcoming New York State Republican convention should write its own "supplemental platform."

Immigration Quotas Hit As Biased

Revision of U.S. immigration laws is "long overdue," Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky declared in a statement to the House Judiciary Committee.

Potofsky termed the present "national origins" quota system "short-sighted and discriminatory . . . a violation of the humanitarian principles on which this country was founded."

He urged approval of legislation introduced by Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) and Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.).

This, he said, "would put an end to discriminatory quotas, provide for the admission of immigrants on the basis of what they can contribute to America and to reunite families" and allow for the admission of refugees, "a provision which can strengthen our posture as a leader of the free nations."

Greater Advances Forecast:

Job, Production Rise Hailed by Johnson

Recent economic trends indicate a stronger employment situation and promise a job growth that may begin to cut into the unemployment problem, according to the Johnson Administration.

Pres. Johnson and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz based optimistic statements on the latest government reports which showed strong advances in the gross national product, in non-farm employment and in personal income.

The President described the economic gains as "notable" and forecast "even greater" advances for the remainder of the year.

Wirtz personally notified the White House of the Labor Dept.'s detailed job report for June, which showed a rise of 600,000 to a record high of 59.1 million non-farm payroll jobs. This was 100,000 more than the substantial gain usually occurring this time of year.

The strong job growth is expected to continue through the rest of the year and "eat into the unemployment total," he said.

Earlier, the Labor Dept.'s summary job figures for June showed unemployment rising by 1.1 million to a total of 4.7 million as teenagers and young workers aged 20-24 flooded into the job market. The seasonally adjusted jobless rate moved up to 5.3 percent from May's 5.1 percent.

In the summary, the Labor Dept. reported a job rise of 850,000—all in agriculture. The non-farm employment total remained unchanged at 66.1 million when it was expected to rise by nearly 400,000, the summary said.

Divergences Not Uncommon

But the detailed report, showing an extra-seasonal jump of 600,000 to 59.1 million in non-farm payroll employment, presented a more favorable picture, the Labor Dept. noted. It said short-term divergences between the two reports are not uncommon, with the figures tending to coincide over the longer term.

The summary report is based on household surveys by the Census Bureau. The detailed report is based on payroll data from employers, hence the smaller non-farm total. Both reports, said the Labor Dept., show a non-farm job rise of 1 million since November, seasonally adjusted, and a job increase of about 1.5 million over June a year ago.

The seeming paradox of sizable job gains and a higher unemployment rate was explained by Labor Dept. manpower experts. In times of slack, teenagers and young men drop out of the labor market in perceptible numbers. But, as employment increases, those who had stopped looking for work reenter the labor market. Thus, if job growth is to dent unemployment, it must be great enough to cover normal labor force growth, those reentering, and the jobless.

The detailed job report showed gains in June in all major industry divisions except government, the Labor Dept. said.

In the key factory sector, employment increased by 194,000 to 17.4 million—the highest June level in nearly a decade, the report pointed out. The factory sector totaled 17.7 million in June 1953.

Factory Workweek Up

The factory workweek rose by 12 minutes to 40 hours and 54 minutes, the highest June level in the postwar period, the report added. After adjustment for seasonal influences, the factory workweek has held at 40.6 hours or more for five months, the longest sustained run at this level since 1955. Overtime advanced by 12 minutes to 3.2 hours, the highest since the record was started on it in 1956. The increase in hours pushed up weekly earnings by 50 cents to a new high of $103.50, the report said.

Wirtz, commenting on the record overtime, said the continuance of high overtime hours was of concern to the Administration, which would prefer the hiring of more workers.

The gross national product—the total output of goods and services—rose by $9.7 billion in the second quarter to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $618.5 billion, the Commerce Dept. reported. This gain, on top of the $9.8 billion increase of the first quarter, means the GNP promises to exceed the Administration's forecasts of $623 billion for this year.

Personal income rose by $11.4 billion in the second quarter to a total $491.3 billion. Johnson noted this is a record rise over the same period last year.

The President said the combination of tax cuts and increased income means the average American is getting $139 more after-tax income than he did a year ago and a total rise of $556 for a four-person family—"a remarkable advance."

The increase in the GNP was traced mainly to greater spending by individuals. Johnson, noting this, added that personal savings also increased, putting people "in a better position to buy more in the months ahead."

Wirtz Urges Double Pay On Overtime time a week at time-and-one-half rates to meet "emergency" situations, with doubletime required for additional hours.

He said a Labor Dept. survey shows that the average employe on overtime works 9 hours beyond his regular workweek, and added:

"More overtime hours were worked in manufacturing during June of 1964 than in any June during the past decade; yet the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate was 5.3 percent. It doesn't make sense to have 4.7 million men and women unable to find work they seek at the same time as extensive overtime is being worked."

Wirtz cited the 40-hour week negotiated by the railroad nonoperating unions in 1949 and the 25-hour week negotiated by New York construction electricians in 1962 as examples of spreading employment through reduction in hours.

In 1948, he said, when railroad shop workers could be employed up to 48 hours at straight time pay, the average hours worked a week was 46.2. In 1950, with premium pay required after 40 hours, the average dropped to 40.8.

There is "a strong presumption," Wirtz said, that the reduction in hours prevented the loss of 140,000 railroad jobs.

Referring to the contract negotiated by Local 3 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in New York City, Wirtz said:

"At the time that this contract was negotiated, there was widespread belief that it was just a device to boost overtime pay."

In actual fact, he told the subcommittee, even though the volume of construction dropped during the next year, 800 to 1,000 new jobs were created.

The secretary acknowledged that the legislation—still in the subcommittee stage—is not being pushed by the Administration for enactment in the brief time left in this session of Congress. But he said he would favor action in the new Congress.

As for the predictions by industry and business groups of dire effects on the economy if the overtime penalty rate were raised, Wirtz had a caustic rebuttal.

He submitted to the subcommittee a long list of similar management prophecies of disaster made when Congress was considering the original Fair Labor Standards Act and other pioneering social legislation, including social security and the Walsh-Healey Act.

$2 Billion Slash Urged In Federal Excise Taxes

The AFL-CIO has recommended to Congress a $2 billion cut in federal excise taxes next year.

Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger urged the House Ways & Means Committee to give top priority to repealing taxes on "necessities of daily life" which fall heaviest on low and moderate income groups.

Labor is opposed in principle to sales and excise taxes, Goldfinger said, because they bear "no relationship to ability to pay" and often act as a drag on the economy. He cautioned, however, against an immediate across-the-board repeal of all excise taxes, which would cut off $15 billion in revenue needed to finance federal job-creating programs.

Goldfinger told the tax-writing committee that it would be "unconscionable" if tax reductions are "pocketed" by business as extra profits instead of being passed on to the consumer. He said the committee should seek evidence that the savings will be passed on through lower prices before approving specific cuts.

The "worst form" of excise tax, Goldfinger said, is that levied at the manufacturing level. Because of traditional percentage markups, this usually results in a price increase to the consumer higher than the amount of the tax, he pointed out.

He warned also against those who supported elimination of excise taxes as a "pretext" for imposing a general sales tax, either at the retail or manufacturing level.

Cut Tied to Budget Proposals

The specifics of a tax cut, Goldfinger said, should be considered in relation to the federal budget proposals for next year.

In labor's view, he added, "priority should be given to increasing federal investments in job-creating measures to improve our public services—measures to create job opportunities and to effectively utilize our expanding productive capacity, as well as to provide public improvements of lasting worth."

He listed the accelerated public works program, the anti-poverty and Appalachia proposals, and adoption of housing and community development legislation as "measures of vital importance to the American people."

Goldfinger said there is some social sanction of excise taxes designed to discourage consumption of certain products or services, and a rationality to persons using federal highways bearing the largest share of financing their cost. But, he stressed, there is "little rational justification" for continuing scores of excises imposed during wartime and other emergency periods.

"Most are clearly levies on the purchase of items of common use and they bear most heavily on moderate and low income families," he added. "Moreover, while certain good and services are now subject to an excise tax, comparable and competing goods and services remain untaxed."

15 Rail Unions In Canada Get 19.1c Pay Raise

Montreal Que.—Wage increases averaging 19.1 cents an hour will go to 100,000 non-operating employes of the two major Canadian railroads in the next two years under an agreement signed by the joint negotiating committeemen of 15 unions and officials of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways.

The agreement embodies recommendations of a federal conciliation board. The employers said they could not afford to accept them but changed their minds after meetings with Prime Minister Lester Pearson, who said the government will review railroad finances after six months to determine if additional subsidies are needed by the two transcontinental lines.

The agreement calls for wage increases of 6 cents an hour retroactive to Jan. 1; 3 cents an hour as of July 1; 2 percent next Jan. 1, and another 3 percent July 1, 1965, calculated on basic rates as of Dec. 31, 1963.

Also agreed to was a boost of $10 in the weekly indemnity payable to beneficiaries of the health and welfare plan, plus an increase from $1,000 to $1,500 in life insurance coverage.

Vigorous Labor Role Seen in Fair Job Fight

"white backlash" to civil rights legislation has been caused to a large extent by "a campaign of misinformation" by opponents of the new law.

Some people, he said, believe that the legislation will require "a certain percentage of Negroes to be hired in every establishment, qualified or not." He added:

"Now, of course, there is no such provision in the law . . . But the fact is that many people have believed this propaganda."

On a broader front, Slaiman noted, labor's drive to bring about equal job opportunity includes support for programs to "bring more jobs into the economy," coupled with better education and special training programs for "the underprivileged, the undereducated and the underqualified."

Local unions, he said, have gone into predominantly Negro vocational schools to tell students about apprenticeship programs and encourage them to apply for openings.

There is a "natural" political alliance of labor, Negro and underprivileged people of all races, Slaiman said in response to a question, because all would be benefited by such measures as minimum wage improvements, federal aid to schools, medical care for the aged and anti-poverty legislation.

These groups, he noted, have both "a common interest" and "common political enemies."

Johnson Asks Labor's Aid In Rights, Poverty Drives

Full U.S. Aid Urged On Senate

The Senate prepared to vote on the Administration's $3.5 billion foreign aid authorization bill under strong urging from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to keep the "already stripped-down" funds intact and eliminate authority to fire certain government employes without regard to their civil service rights.

Meany emphasized the AFL-CIO position in letters to all members of the Senate.

In calling for authorization of the full amount of aid funds sought by the Administration, along the lines of the House-passed bill, he cited labor's long support for "effective foreign aid to strengthen the defense capacity of free nations and to promote economic and social progress throughout the free world."

Meany declared, however, that labor regards as "essential" the passage of an amendment to be offered by Senators Frank Carlson (R-Kans.) and Olin D. Johnston (D-S.C.) to strike the "selection-out" and other firing authority from the bill approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The provision would permit the dismissal of certain employes of the Agency for Intl. Development without giving them recourse to civil service procedures.

The House-passed bill contains no provision for such "selection out."

Other Bills Moving

Meanwhile, a host of other major measures—including Pres. Johnson's key anti-poverty program, a pair of conservation bills and amendments to increase social security retirement benefits—moved through the legislative mills as Congress hastened toward adjournment.

The omnibus anti-poverty bill was cleared by the House Rules Committee, 8-7, with debate expected to begin the week of Aug. 2. Committee Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.) and Rep. William M. Colmer (D-Miss.) joined five Republicans in opposing the bill. Almost solid GOP opposition to the measure and Smith's description of it as "this crazy bill" portended a bitter floor fight.

A slightly scarred, trimmed-down version of the bill was passed by the Senate on a 61-34 rollcall. It authorizes $947.5 million for operation of the program in fiscal 1965, $15 million less than the Administration had requested.

In its essential features, the bill would create a Job Corps to give training and remedial education to 40,000 youths, establish a work-study program for needy college students and a work-training program to keep potential "drop-outs" in school, earmark federal funds for commu-

PIONEERING EXPERIMENT in providing one-the-job training for several hundred unskilled, long-term unemployed workers is launched with an agreement between the Labor Dept. and the Mayor's Human Relations Commission of Evansville, Ind. The trainees will be employed in a variety of local business and industrial firms, which will receive subsidies from federal manpower training funds. Seated, left to right, are Mrs. Joan Bowers, director of the Mayor's Commission; Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, and Commission Chairman James B. Iglehart. Standing are Commission Vice Chairmen James Landers and Ervin Weil, and Bernard McAtee, staff representative of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities.

Leadership Role Stressed at Parley

Organized labor has a major role to play in securing nationwide support of the new civil rights law in waging the war on poverty and maintaining a healthy economy, Pres. Johnson declared at a White House reception for more than 300 trade union leaders.

He called on the labor officials specifically to exercise leadership in the civil rights area, telling them:

"America's labor movement won its great strength and freedom and respect through the law. You who pursued that long struggle can serve your country and your cause now by urging your communities to trust the law of the land and help it to prevail."

The President pledged to "use all the resources I have to make sure those who claim rights—and those who deny them—bend their passions to peaceful obedience of the law of the land."

Addressing the labor leaders in the East Room shortly after a live television press conference, the President stressed that at the head of America's agenda of unfinished business "is one imperative—assuring the rights of all of our people under the law and assuring respect for the law from all our people."

Gains Cited

His plea on civil rights climaxed a talk in which he pointed out the economic gains in his eight months in office and the fact that this will be the "first peacetime Administration in a century unmarred by economic recession or depression."

Despite the gains, he noted that "unemployment is still too high," although it has dropped in eight months from 5.9 percent of the labor force to 5.3 percent, and that there are Americans at the bottom of the economic ladder, "far more than we can tolerate."

The President emphasized that "poverty at home is an enemy of our society as much as aggressors abroad," that poverty amid plenty "can subvert our prosperity and undermine our stability."

Suffridge Asks Curb On Chains

Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks has called on Congress to prohibit industry-wide lockouts by retail store employers and to conduct a "full-scale investigation" into the pricing and labor relations policies of the nation's major chain stores.

Citing the just-settled 10-week lockout of 5,000 food store workers in Maryland and Delaware by employers seeking to break a strike of 600 workers against another chain, Suffridge told a House Labor subcommittee that the employers, by advance agreement, cut off the primary food supplies of one of the nation's biggest cities and demonstrated their conviction that "their economic power places them above and beyond the law."

The head of the 400,000-member retail union called for an investigation leading to legislation to curb such power. He recommended that Congress:

- Amend the Taft-Hartley Act to outlaw industry-wide lockouts, provide for interim injunctions on petition by the National Labor Relations Board, and make employers who engage in concerted lockouts liable to damage suits.
- Require employers and their associations to file annual reports on their labor relations expenditures and funds under the Landrum-Griffin Act, which requires unions to report their income and expenditures.
- Amend the antitrust and other laws to prohibit agreements requiring individual employers to abide by group decisions involving labor relations.
- Amend the wage-hour laws to guarantee equal pay to part-time employes for equal work and end job "slaughter" by "greedy employers" trying to save money on pensions and the like.
- Control the devices by which employers aid each other, such as subsidies and "sub rosa" agreements in labor disputes.

Congress has repeatedly acted to regulate unions but has left employers and bargaining associations of employers in a "dark unexplored cave of interstate labor relations," said Suffridge, the first witness at hearings ordered by Rep. Adam C.

Among GOP Leaders:

Goldwater Moves To Weld Support

A campaign to solidify Republican Party support for presidential nominee Sen. Barry Goldwater is under way as the men who helped secure the nomination for the Arizona senator took charge of the party machinery.

Most of the attention was centered in Washington where Goldwater opened the campaign with meetings with GOP congressmen who had supported his nomination drive and with top Republican congressional leaders. Other meetings were planned with all GOP members of Congress, governors and party leaders.

The drive to consolidate party support for Goldwater, the party's self-styled conservative nominee, followed announcements that a number of important Republican moderates and liberals would not support Goldwater or would run independent campaigns.

Sen. Hugh Scott (R-Pa.) joined four other GOP senators in holding up decisions on whether they would support Goldwater, declaring he would not "compromise my principles" to support issues he doesn't believe in. Senators Kenneth Keating and Jacob Javits (N. Y.), Glenn Beall, (Md.) and Clifford Case (N. J.) have taken similar positions.

As the Republicans mapped campaign plans the Democrats were preparing for the party's national convention opening in Atlantic City Aug. 24.

The convention arrangements committee selected Sen. John O. Pastore (R. I.) as convention keynoter, House Speaker John McCormack as permanent chairman and House Democratic Leader Carl

'Fantastic' Auto Profits Spur UAW Bargaining

Detroit—Profits of the nation's three top auto manufacturers are so enormous that there is no further excuse for denying their workers and customers a fair share in the "unbelievable profitability" of the industry, the Auto Workers declared here.

UAW negotiators, facing a contract expiration deadline of Aug. 31 at General Motors, Ford and Chrysler Corp., challenged the Big 3 to "let all segments of the community" share in their "fantastic" income.

GM reported profits of $1.1 billion after taxes for the first six months of 1964, Ford $324 million and Chrysler $114 million—new highs for all.

UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock, the chief union negotiator at GM, said that under present company policies "all the extra benefits of this tremendous profitability go only to the corporation's owners and managers."

"Workers do not get their eco-

Clerk's Chief Gives Backing to Johnson

Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks, a registered Republican, visited the White House to tell Pres. Johnson he will work for his election in November.

The union head, who is an AFL-CIO vice president, said he voted for Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1952 and 1956 and for John F. Kennedy in 1960. He's for Johnson now, he said, because "the preservation of peace in the world must rest upon wisdom" and "the man whose finger can press the button of eternity should be a wise and thoughtful man."

Truck Group, IAM Reach Training Pact

The trucking industry's first national apprenticeship training standards have been established in a new contract signed by the Machinists and the American Trucking Association with the approval of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

It was hailed by IAM Pres. A. J. Hayes as making possible "mutual benefits to the entire industry and its employes." He called it a "great step forward" when the industry and the union "can sit down and work out a national program to develop its own training program."

ATA Pres. John Akers described the pact as "an enlightened approach representing great progress for management and labor alike."

Craftsmanship Assured

The purpose of the agreement, as spelled out in the introduction, "is to insure a sufficient supply of thoroughly trained mechanics to carry on the tradition of craftsmanship."

The standards provide that apprentices be selected without regard to race, creed, color, national origin or physical handicaps, with qualifications to be determined by aptitude tests, school grades and previous work records. Applicants generally must be between 18 and 30 years old, but some exceptions may be made.

The agreement recommended that apprentices' wages be based on a percentage of the journeyman's rate, starting at 45 percent during the first 500 hours and progressing to 90 percent during the last 1,000 of the required 8 000 hours.

Local or area joint committees were proposed to determine the need for apprentices, establish minimum qualifications and assume responsibility for the operation of local training programs.

Federal Jury Convicts Hoffa In Fraud Trial

Chicago—Teamsters Pres. James R. Hoffa was convicted by a federal jury here on four counts of defrauding the union's Central States pension fund of millions of dollars. He faces a possible jail sentence of 20 years.

The conviction was the second this year for Hoffa. In March he was found guilty by a federal jury in Chattanooga of jury tampering and was sentenced to eight years in prison and a fine of $10,000. Hoffa is appealing the Chattanooga conviction and is expected to take similar action in the Chicago case.

The Chicago trial involved charges that Hoffa and six other defendants conspired to borrow about $25 million from the Teamsters' Central States pension funds "by means of false and fraudulent pretenses" and diverted more than $1 million of the funds to themselves.

Hoffa and the six were found guilty on the conspiracy charge and on at least one other count. The Teamsters president was found guilty of three counts in addition to the conspiracy charges.

The jury of four women and eight men deliberated over three days before reaching their verdict. The trial ran for 13 weeks.

The maximum penalty for each of the four counts on which Hoffa was found guilty is five years and there is a possible fine of $1,000 on each of three counts and $10,000 on the conspiracy count.

Hoffa is one of 16 trustees of the $280 million pension fund covering more than 200,000 Teamster members in 20 states.

Growth Potential Cited To Technical Engineers

Seattle—Pres. Russell M. Stephens of the Technical Engineers forecast a future brimming with growth for the union as he opened its convention here.

Stephens, addressing 100 delegates representing 15,000 U.S. and Canadian members, reported that the union had recently granted a charter to scientific employes of the Office of Manned Space Flight, a branch of the National Aeronautics & Space Administration.

The AFTE's newest members, he said, include engineers and scientists planning space flights to the moon, some of whom earn as much as $22,000 a year. "This is unusual," he noted, "but the labor movement is attracting this type of personnel. . . . We have tremendous growth potential. We expect to grow rapidly."

Membership of such caliber, he said, is proof that professionalism and unionism are compatible.

Stephens also pointed out that the USS Samuel Gompers, the destroyer tender now under construction at the Puget Sound Naval Shipyard in nearby Bremerton, will be built by union labor. The AFTE, he noted, has been granted exclusive recognition as representative of technicians at the yard.

Warning on Birchites

The AFTE president, expressing fears that a segment of the public "seems to be embracing the philosophy of the John Birch Society," declared that "only through strong union activities can we combat this trend." He urged delegates to spur special efforts within their locals to encourage citizens everywhere to register and vote in the coming elections.

Stephens voiced full support for Pres. Johnson's civil rights, anti-poverty and education programs. He lauded the President for keeping the economy at a high level by carrying on the policies of the late Pres. Kennedy in "a smooth transition."

The AFTE president's informal address was the high point of the convention's opening sessions as the delegates referred most of the union's internal business to special committees.

Greetings were extended to the convention by Pres. Joseph Davis of the Washington AFL-CIO, Lt. Gov. John Cherberg, Seattle City Council Member Floyd Miller, representing Mayor J. D. Braman, and Thomas Walters of the U.S. Civil Service Commission.

Major business on the convention's agenda included election of officers. Stephens, who has headed the union since 1952, is a candidate for reelection along with the entire slate of AFTE officers, including Sec.-Treas. Albert G. Ross of Toronto and six vice presidents: Timothy J. Flynn, Portsmouth, N. H.; Edgar Heintzleman, Philadelphia; Richard Nash, Quincy, Mass.; Leonard Dawkins, Kankakee, Ill.; Henry Nelson, Seattle, and Ben Snook, Peterborough, Ont.

For Federal Plan:

CLC Council Lists Pension Standards

Ottawa, Ont.—The specifications of a federal pension plan with benefits geared to highest earnings prior to retirement were drawn up by the executive council of the Canadian Labor Congress at a meeting here.

The council also acted on a wide range of other subjects referred to it by the CLC Montreal convention in April.

It said the pension plan should provide for universal and compulsory coverage of all wage and salary earners and the self-employed, with contributions from workers, the self-employed, employers and the government. Benefits should be high enough to assure adequate standards of health on retirement, and should be provided for survivors, the council maintained.

It called for eligibility at age 65; provisions for early retirement, without lowered benefits, due to total and permanent disability, and with lowered benefits in case of voluntary retirement before age 65; full portability; protecting the purchasing power of benefits against inflation, and improvement of benefits in keeping with rises in general living standards.

For the old age security plan now in effect, the executive council proposed a $75 monthly benefit payable at 65 years; an escalator clause to give automatic protection against price increases, and a periodic review by Parliament with a view to adjusting benefits to reflect changes in living standards.

In other areas, the council urged:

UNEMPLOYMENT: A progressive shortening of hours with no reduction in take-home pay, "consistent with growth in productivity," with provincial central bodies urged to seek legislation firmly establishing the 8-hour day and 5-day week; establishment of the federal winter workers' program on a permanent basis to permit long-range planning; fulfillment of "the promise of full employment made during the last electoral campaign;" longer vacations and a minimum of nine paid statutory holidays; a $1.50 per hour minimum wage; development of secondary industry, particularly to use Canadian raw materials; expansion of world trade and a ban on contracting out of work to avoid living up to a union contract.

HOUSING: An accelerated program of public housing for low income groups and senior citizens; reduction of interest rates and control of land costs; greater activity by union groups in housing problems.

CONSUMERS: Establishment of federal standards on quality and packaging; suppression of trading stamps and similar practices; compulsory provincial inspection of slaughter houses and meat packing plants; legislation requiring finance and loan firms to state all charges clearly and in detail; and income tax allowance for some education costs.

ECONOMIC MATTERS: Establishment of a development bank of Canada to mobilize savings now controlled by financial institutions and channel them into development of the economy in cooperation with provincial agencies; public ownership of major national utilities, and a "more progressive" income tax schedule to ease the burden on low income groups.

PARLIAMENT: Restriction of speech-making to avoid waste of time, with creation of a permanent speakership in the House of Commons; more adequate consideration of private members' bills; greater publicity for campaign contributions and spending, and the establishment of fixed election dates every four years, except when the government suffers defeat meantime.

WORLD AFFAIRS: Proposals for Canadian membership in the Organization of American States were endorsed and past stands calling for world disarmament, exclusion of nuclear arms from Canada, expansion of the Canadian foreign aid program and support of the United Nations and its agencies were renewed.

Rail Unions Hit Grievance Delays, Urge Binding Decisions by Board

U.S. railways are frustrating settlement of disputes with their employes for as long as 9 years by appealing virtually every arbitration award to the courts, four union men testified before the House Subcommittee on Transportation & Aeronautics.

Workers have no such choice open to them when they lose, said Legislative Rep. Al H. Chesser of the Railroad Trainmen. Intl. Rep. Robert E. Stenzinger of the Machinists—the latter a member of the National Railroad Adjustment Board, Div. II, which hears disputes involving non-operating employes—spoke in support of a bill to make all awards by the four divisions of the board enforceable without retrial on the merits.

Grievant Testifies

The two other witnesses were Fred A. Hardin, BRT general chairman on the Southern Railway's eastern division, and A. E. Anderson of Selma, Ala., a BRT member who has a dispute pending before the board's Div. I, the tribunal for operating employes.

Anderson said his grievance with the Southern Railway has been pending since 1958. A trainman on that road for 32 years, he was fired and filed an appeal. The board ordered him reinstated with full seniority and pay for all time lost, but the road refused. Meanwhile Anderson took the only job he could get, that of hotel clerk at $160 a month, he said, while waiting for the courts to rule.

Chesser told the subcommittee that under present law, awards requiring the payment of money are not final and binding on both parties, but all others are. This means, he said, that if the unions lose a case the decision is final and binding—there is no provision for appeal, even though a number of such decisions are erroneous.

In contrast, he added, "when the railroad loses, and the decision of the board requires the payment of money, no matter whether large or small, it can have the issues retried" by the simple process of refusing to comply with the board's order. The unions then must drop the case or institute enforcement proceedings. They may not use economic force, he declared, under a recent Supreme Court decision.

All three BRT witnesses also testified in support of another proposed bill to establish regional adjustment boards to resolve disputes without referring them to the board in Chicago.

Div. I will decide some 125 cases this year out of a total backlog of 4,000 cases, said Chesser. He estimated that at the rate of 150 cases a year, 27 years would be required to clear the docket even if no other cases were filed. Stenzinger testified that Div. II requires about 2.5 years to process a grievance.

Jobless Rate Hits 5.2 Percent in Canada

Ottawa, Ont.—Canadian unemployment dipped in June to 282,000 or 4 percent of the labor force, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics reported, but the key seasonally adjusted rate rose to 5.2 percent.

A surge of students into the labor market cut the usual seasonal decline, but the number of jobless was 11,000 less than in May and 22,000 fewer than in June 1963. The 4 percent rate compares with 4.4 percent in June; the seasonally adjusted rate of 5.2 percent was up from the 4.7 percent level of the two previous months.

nomic equity," he said. "UAW insists this is wrong. The workers, who contribute their fair share to make this corporation so fantastically profitable, have the right to an equitable share in the profits they help make possible."

Woodcock said consumers, too, could have their equity in profits through lower prices for GM products. He added: "GM can easily do this and still make highly satisfactory profits. The union has urged continually that this be done."

Ford's profit figures "smashed all records" both in the first half of 1964 and in the second quarter, said UAW Ford Dept. Dir. Ken Bannon, who commented:

More for Stockholders

"Stockholders are sharing in these increased profits in increased dividends—up 11 percent from last year—and increased assets per share, up 9 percent.

"The company's executives will also share generously. . . . The amount set aside for bonuses in the first half of 1964 is $29.5 million, compared to $25 million in the same period last year—an increase of 18 percent."

Bannon said the increase in profits after taxes was 16.9 percent for Ford worldwide operations, comparing the 1964 first half with 1963's first half. The rate of return on investment in operations employing UAW members will be about 21 percent this year—roughly twice the average for all U.S. manufacturing firms, he said.

Chrysler's profits after taxes for the first half of 1964 were "an incredible 46.9 percent higher than in the same period last year," said UAW Chrysler Dept. Dir. Douglas Fraser, who noted that this was in marked contrast with like periods of 1958, when the firm reported a loss of $52.2 million before taxes, and 1961, when the reported loss was $32.3 million before taxes.

"The profit figures provide irrefutable evidence," he declared, "that Chrysler can pioneer in improving the wages and fringe benefits of its workers and provide substantial price cuts for buyers of Chrysler cars and still make generous provision for executives and owners."

Biggest Profits Ever

A union statement recalled that GM's profits of $1.59 billion for all of 1963 were "more than any industrial corporation ever made in the history of the world," and asserted the latest announced profits "promise to leave that record far behind."

The UAW's objective in current negotiations is to win wage increases keyed to increases in national productivity and to have the fruits of company profits shared with workers in the form of better pensions and early retirement, improved insurance, more relief time, improved health and welfare and other "fringe" benefits.

UAW negotiators reported little progress has been made on meaningful issues and prepared to suggest, in letters to local leaders, that the time may be at hand for membership votes on strike authorization at GM or Ford, possibly Chrysler, too.

Union spokesmen have expressed dissatisfaction with the pace of contract talks this year. At GM, Woodcock told newsmen nothing has happened so far to indicate that management wants an agreement by contract expiration time.

Negotiations opened early in July with the end of August as the target date for settlements with the Big 3. The timetable calls then for resumption of talks with American Motors.

Auto industry negotiations, covering about 575,000 workers, will be followed by talks for other UAW members in the farm implement industry.

'Stage' Is Set For Plant Tours

Doraville, Ga. — Auto workers here are laughing over the guided plant tours which General Motors management has been conducting to disprove UAW charges that most auto plants are "gold-plated sweatshops."

Visitors were toured through assembly plant areas which took work crews 13 days with overtime at time-and-a-half and double time rates to get in shape. They saw shiny paint, six new water coolers and additional fluorescent lights in one working area, then moved outside to a tent for cold drinks.

Three days after the last tour, work crews removed the fluorescent lighting, the UAW has reported.

Congress Urged to Ban Industrywide Lockouts

Powell (D-N. Y.), House Labor Committee chairman, into practices of the retail industry.

Suffridge, relating the history of the 13-week strike against the Acme food chain in Baltimore and the 10-week lockout of 5,000 RCIA members by other employers, said it followed a pattern of employer conduct across the nation which he called "deeply ominous in its implications for a democratic society." He urged the subcommittee to "begin the vital task of unmasking this menacing combination of employer forces."

The witness testified that the ostensible reason for the coordinated action of the seven Baltimore chains in "shutting off the primary source of food to a community of more than 1 million persons was a legal fiction that the union's strike against one employer" threatened the "integrity of their bargaining unit."

'Whipsawing' Held Impossible

Asserting that the suggestion that a single local union could successfully "whipsaw" several of the largest and most powerful corporations in the nation "does not make much sense," Suffridge declared:

"When an association of major food chains locks out 5,000 workers and deprives 1 million people of their normal source of food, that employer group is not merely trying to preserve the integrity of any bargaining unit.

The reason for such a lockout, he said, "is to coerce and intimidate the employes."

Suffridge declared that industrywide lockouts are "in every respect a basic contradiction" of national labor policy and should be prohibited by making them unfair labor practices under the Taft-Hartley Act, subject to interim injunctions at the request of the National Labor Relations Board pending final board decision.

The Maryland food store dispute ended on July 18 when the parties reached final agreement, three weeks after six chains called off their lockout and the union had continued picketing Acme stores only.

Suffridge said "there is a good reason to believe that this and other employer associations operate through express or implied economic coercion to force unwilling employers to abide" by group policy decisions.

"We have been reliably advised," he said, "that one of the seven chains in the Baltimore dispute wanted to reopen its stores during the lockout" but feared economic reprisal. In addition, he said, the bylaws of the employer association have been interpreted to mean that serious legal consequences might befall the rebellious member.

"In other words," he declared, "these employers agreed on when and how they could close all their stores to the public and no one of them could reopen his store without running the risk of economic reprisal of a sub rosa type of legal liability" to the other employers.

This conduct raises serious questions of possible antitrust law violations, said Suffridge.

RETAIL CLERKS Pres. James A. Suffridge, right, was the leadoff witness when a House Labor subcommittee held hearings into food industry practices which led to a recently-settled three-month strike against the Acme stores in the Baltimore area and a lockout by six other chains employing some 5,000 workers. Also shown is the subcommittee chairman, Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.).

Montana Unionists Cited For Flood Clean-Up Aid

Great Falls, Mont.—The American Red Cross has given a citation to more than 300 members of AFL-CIO unions who voluntarily gave over 3,000 man-hours to clean the mud and debris from the homes of recent flood victims.

The flood waters, which struck June 8, ravaged 10 counties in Montana and three counties in Idaho. They took the lives of 15 known persons, with 17 others missing and presumed dead.

For nearly a month after the waters receded about 20 union members formed themselves into teams each day and helped those who needed assistance the most —the elderly, the crippled and the ill—get rid of the muck and slime that had been swept into their homes. Some gave a few hours of work, others worked up to three full days.

The citation was presented to Peter J. Gilligan, business manager of Plumbers & Pipe Fitters Local 139 and secretary of the Great Falls Building Trades Council, who coordinated the campaign. The presentation was made by Dan Bachman, Red Cross disaster relief director for the operaiton, and Herb Knight, manager of the Cascade County Red Cross chapter.

Gilligan disclaimed credit for his role and praised instead Murray Nicholas of the Machinists and the Local 139 office secretary, Gwen Parsons.

Red Cross rehabilitation aid will have been given to 1,346 families when the relief program is completed, officials said.

Federal Grant Curb Hit as Unnecessary

The AFL-CIO urged the Senate Government Operations Committee to kill as "unnecessary" a bill to provide periodic review of federal grants-in-aid to states and communities.

The bill would require automatic termination after 5 years of any federal grant program involving two or more states, or subdivisions of two or more states, unless an expiration date is specified by law. It would apply to all programs enacted by the 89th or subsequent Congresses, including new categories of aid added to existing programs.

In letters to members of the committee, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller noted that some of the most important grant-in-aid programs require matching appropriations by states.

Since the legislatures of many states meet only once every two years, Biemiller said, "without knowledge that the Congress would continue a program, all state legislatures would rightfully be reluctant to appropriate matching money. As a result, programs will operate ineffectively, when at all, during the last year of a bill's life. Personnel morale will flow like an ebb tide. Money will be needlessly wasted."

Labor Can Lead the Way

TRADE UNION support for a political candidate can be an important and meaningful step or it can be an empty gesture depending entirely on whether or not union members are registered to vote.

In too many parts of the country union and non-union members alike have not exercised the privilege of free men to participate in the political decisions which affect every aspect of their lives by marking a ballot on election day.

They have not discharged their obligations as citizens in a democracy because they have not taken the few simple steps that would transform them from observers to decision-makers: the steps involved in meeting the requirements to become a registered voter.

This country cannot mobilize its full potential to meet the challenge posed by the enemies of democracy if its citizens default on their democratic privileges.

The trade union movement cannot move towards its objectives of economic security, political freedom and human rights if its members do not participate in the political decision-making.

This is the why of the AFL-CIO's registration campaign, a non-partisan effort to sharply increase the number of Americans who will participate in the November election.

THE REGISTRATION campaign is one element of the drive to win a wider participation by all Americans in the political process; the second element is the actual act of voting.

On the basis of past records the election of a President of the United States in November will be by a minority of those Americans eligible to vote. There are many factors that affect the failure to vote but they all have the same effect—to keep millions of voters, otherwise eligible, away from the polls on Election Day.

The result is that since the formation of modern American political parties no President has ever been elected by a majority of those eligible to vote. This stems from other reasons than literary tests or residency laws, etc.

There is the myth that one vote doesn't count very much in the eventual result—a myth that has been exploded in election after election and especially in the dramatically close presidential election of 1960.

There is the cynicism that portrays politics as a "dirty" business that should be avoided.

There is also the overriding apathy, the let-George-do-it approach, that strikes at the core of the democratic structure.

Trade unions can lead the way in the fight to strengthen and extend political democracy by working through COPE to get all eligible voters registered and qualified to vote, by stirring widespread discussion of the issues and by convincing voters to translate their interest in the election by contributing their dollars to the cause of political education.

Wirtz Backs Bill:

Automation Commission Seen Major Aid to Job Adjustments

The following is excerpted from a statement by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz before the Senate Subcommittee on Employment & Manpower on the proposed National Commission on Automation & Technological Progress.

THE NATIONAL COMMISSION on Automation is designed to help . . . the future shape of the economic world and our daily lives, our level of living, our industries' ability to compete in world commerce, the strength of our national defense, and, in a very fundamental sense, the viability of democracy.

Automation and other revolutionary technological advances can be the key to unlimited economic opportunity. They can make real the dream of ending poverty. At the same time, these developments include forces which, if left unchecked, can cause hideous blemishes in our society.

Unfortunately, the history of economic progress is not always a story of progress for all. Economic progress, overall prosperity, are essential, and the maximum use of new discoveries is a vital part of such progress. But it is not enough. The real issue is not how far or how fast we are advancing on the whole, or on the average; it is how many people are being left out.

Too many people are being cast aside, being left out, today, by the revolutionary technological changes which are taking place. There is no need for this, and we cannot permit it to continue.

It is important that "the public"—in the broader sense which distinguishes it from "the government"—be involved in the development of a program designed to apply our new discoveries for the benefit of economic progress without leaving those displaced to bear the burden of adjustment.

The revolutionary nature of much of science and technology today is evident.

THE MAGIC of electronic computers is well known. They were originally developed primarily for military and scientific purposes during and after World War II. Then they were slowly adapted for civilian use. These great "brain" machines have been hailed as the salvation of overworked clerical staffs, and decried as a dire threat to the jobs of white collar workers.

There is no doubt that these great machines are a force for good. Without them we would have no earth satellites and no guided missiles. They can remove the drudgery of human processing of vast amounts of complicated and technical data . . .

We also know from industries which have long been subject to change that technological advances can have drastic effects on workers by reducing the number of jobs and changing their nature.

We are all too familiar with the effects in the railroad industry—a 50 percent drop in employment between 1947 and 1963, with more to come.

We are all also familiar with the drastic decline in agricultural jobs—from 8.3 million in 1947 to 4.9 million in 1963, a drop of over 40 percent.

As a moral and humane society we must make sure that where workers are displaced by technological advances they are not left to bear the burden alone but are given help to make the necessary adjustment.

The commission called for by the bill will make recommendations for action in this area.

In addition, our country's great unmet needs constitute a challenge to our technical and social ingenuity, with which the new commission must be deeply concerned.

Whether our children and our children's children will find this country a tolerable place in which to live will depend, in large measure, on the progress we make today and tomorrow in solving such basic problems as our increasing water shortage (whether by desalinization of sea water or other means); the pollution of the rivers and atmosphere; and the problems of mass transportation, housing and community facilities which threaten the future of our ever-expanding metropolitan areas.

"I don't care if that automation machine helped put a man in space. It still makes a lousy buttonhole."

Morgan Says:

FCC Majority Gives Its Blessing To 'Saturation' Sales Pitches

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is exerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

THE IDEA OF HEAVEN to a lot of businessmen in the broadcasting industry seems to be a solid schedule of commercials minimally interrupted by programs of any kind.

There once was a radical theory that radio and TV stations were supposed to operate in the public interest. A pattern was sketched whereby they would bring to their communities large and well-balanced helpings of news, music, art, religion, education, controversy and entertainment, in return for which public service they would be allowed a reasonable profit in the approved tradition of free enterprise by selling time to advertisers for commercial messages. But somehow, largely because no clear-cut agreement was ever reached on a standard of values or a division of time, the commercials became more and more important and therefore in the inexorable logic of the trade, more and more frequent.

Morgan

The inevitable has now happened. The Federal Communications Commission, the agency which is supposed via its mild police powers to remind broadcasters of their conscience and their responsibilities, has, in effect, given its blessing to a gradual saturation of programs with advertising.

The FCC granted a full three-year renewal of the licenses of eight radio stations despite a staff finding that all had violated, sometimes flagrantly, their own stated standards concerning the length and/or frequency of commercials.

The decisions were close, 4 to 3 in each case. The stations involved were in Natchez, Meridian and Jackson, Miss., Bogalusa, Baton Rouge and New Orleans, La., and Fort Smith, Ark. The majority gave no reason for or defense of its actions, but that empty eloquence was made even more hollow by a stinging rebuke from Commission Chairman E. William Henry in a dissent.

Henry, who happily is turning out to be as courageously outspoken in his position as his controversial predecessor, Newton Minow, accused his four majority colleagues of failing their "elementary" responsibilities.

In May 1963, the FCC decided tentatively to adopt as part of its rules the National Association of Broadcasters' voluntary code restricting the time and frequency of radio and TV commercials. But several hitches emerged almost immediately. In the first place many broadcasters do not belong to the NAB and even many others of those who do fail to live up to its commercial code.

Then Congress responded loyally if partially to lobbyists' cries of "interference." The House forthwith passed a bill which would strip the FCC of any authority to set standards on the length or intervals of ads in broadcasting. The Senate has not acted but even the House committee report emphasized that a station's policy on commercials was a proper matter for the FCC to consider in renewing licenses.

In his dissent Henry charged that the FCC majority had dodged even this watery responsibility and thereby encouraged the pervading sloppiness, neglect and outright cynicism with which radio and TV station owners have come to approach the issue of over-commercialization.

". . . AT SOME POINT," he said, "warnings must cease and action commence. At some point, an agency that hopes to hold the respect of the public and the industry it regulates must do more than cry 'wolf!' "

What, then, to do?

"I would at a minimum," Henry wrote, "issue short-term, probationary licenses to any broadcasters who have failed to provide acceptable explanations for substantial departures from their own commercial policies.

"And I would continue to inquire wherever we find a broadcaster who seems to be ignoring the standards he professes or who fails to profess any meaningful standards."

Selfish interests invariably try to brand this kind of talk from a bureaucrat as "federal intervention in private enterprise" and "creeping socialism." It is excesses, in broadcast commercials for example, which demand intervention and what really should give the public the creeps is this:

If a broadcaster follows no principle to avoid advertising saturation, what assurance is there that he will be fair and honorable in the quality of the programs he squeezes in between his commercials?

Washington Reports:

Economic Aid to Vietnamese Held Essential to War Effort

THE ECONOMIC AID program in Vietnam is an essential part of the war effort there, David E. Bell, administrator of the Agency for Intl. Development (AID), declared in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service program, Washington Reports to the People, heard on 700 radio stations.

"We have a strong program in the rural areas," Bell said. "We have our own civilians—young men mostly—out there. Many of them are running real risks, helping the villagers to undertake improvements in health, education and agriculture, everything that is essential to demonstrating that progress can be made under the free Vietnamese government.

"In addition, we are also providing economic assistance to an economy, over-strained by the necessities of war. We are providing imports, helping to stabilize the economy. Without our economic effort, the military operation could not be carried on."

Bell noted that U.S. economic aid to other nations has been so successful that it has been completed in 17 countries and is coming to an end in 14 more. The end of foreign aid, however, cannot be accomplished overnight, he said.

"There are some countries we are working with that are in very primitive circumstances and where it will be years before we can hope they will be on their own feet and able to move forward by themselves," he added.

Taiwan, where the government of Free China is now situated, was cited by Bell as one example of successful economic assistance.

"They have developed their agriculture, industry, schools, health services," he declared. "Their governmental efficiency has increased. They have a going concern. It is a progressive economy that is yielding more income and more benefits for the people every year."

DEMOCRACY also has benefited in Taiwan, Bell reported, observing that "there has been a steady increase in the extent to which the legislature has a voice in making decisions, and the extent to which the mayors and other elected officials are not necessarily from Generalissimo Chiang's party, the Kuomintang."

Israel, which has been a democracy from the first, is another example of the success of foreign aid, he continued. The Israelis, he said, "are now in a position to meet the growing needs of their people by their own resources, by normal international trade and by normal access to world capital markets."

"Foreign aid," he declared, "is essential to the interests of the United States. For our own society to be effective and to flourish we must live in a world in which institutions are free and where governments are democratic. That is why foreign aid has been supported by all the Presidents since the end of World War II."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

(Willard Shelton, whose commentary on the Washington scene normally appears in this space, is on vacation.)

A GROWING NUMBER of liberal and moderate Republicans are finding that they cannot support GOP Presidential Nominee Barry Goldwater.

To date, five Republican senators and a sizable group of GOP congressmen say they cannot conscientiously endorse Goldwater at this time.

Many other GOP moderates have not sought to hide their unhappiness with Goldwater and may, at most, just give lip service to the top of the ticket.

The Goldwaterites seem to be unperturbed by the exodus, while Senate Minority Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen has tried to pour oil on the troubled waters.

The three basic issues which sparked the revolt were debated at the GOP convention in San Francisco. They are the failure of the convention to write a stronger plank on civil rights; the rejection of a repudiation of such extremist groups as the Communist Party, the Ku Klux Klan and the John Birch Society, and the refusal of the party to state that nuclear decisions should be kept solely in the hands of the President.

THE MOST controversial point now is contained in two sentences in Goldwater's acceptance speech at the GOP convention:

"Extremism in the defense of liberty is no vice . . . Moderation in the pursuit of justice is no virtue."

The first reaction to this came from Gov. Nelson Rockefeller of New York. He castigated the statement as "dangerous, irresponsible and frightening."

"Any sanction of lawlessness, of vigilantes, of the unruly mob can only be deplored," Rockefeller said. "The extremism of the Communists, the Ku Klux Klan and of the John Birch Society—like that of most terrorists—has always been claimed by such groups to be in defense of liberty."

Goldwater has not backed off from his statement. He did try to rewrite the meaning of extremism, saying that D-Day in Europe in 1944 was an extreme act. However, this was rejected by Goldwater critics who pointed out that this was a responsible action sponsored by the United States and other governments engaged in a war of survival.

SUPPORTERS of Goldwater have been careful not to offend white supremacy, Birchites and other extreme groups—factors which have added to the disenchantment of the moderates.

This paid off when Gov. George Wallace of Alabama, who threatened to split the segregationist vote for Goldwater in the southern states, dropped out of the presidential race.

Then, the ultra right-wing Constitution Party, meeting in Houston, Tex., revised its strategy when Wallace withdrew. The group now plans to accept the same presidential electors as the Republican Party.

A key official of the John Birch Society in Houston said that most members of his group will be working diligently for the election of Goldwater. Philip Blair Jones, a Southwest coordinator for the Birchers, declared:

"The majority of our members will undoubtedly support Goldwater. But I will take no public position, and members who do work for Goldwater will do so as individuals."

With the Goldwater nomination, the Birchers are starting a membership drive. (PAI).

U.S. FOREIGN AID has been successfully concluded in 17 countries and is on the way out in 14 more, AID Administrator David E. Bell declared in an interview in his offices at the State Dept. Bell, left, was interviewed by Harry W. Flannery for the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

Major Bills Advance:

Anti-Poverty Plan Faces House Battle

nity self-help programs, aid rural families and small business, and create a domestic Peace Corps.

Two compromise "states' rights" amendments approved by the Senate would give governors 30-day veto powers over establishment of Job Corps camps or privately contracted anti-poverty programs in their states. Another amendment accepted by the Administration eliminated controversial direct grants to poverty-stricken farm families and replaced them with a program of loans up to $1,500.

Lausche Amendment

The Senate also passed, by a 49-43 rollcall, an amendment proposed by Sen. Frank J. Lausche (D-Ohio) to eliminate authority for farm development corporations to buy up large tracts of farm land and resell them at appraised value in family-size units. Lausche also was the author of the amendment striking $15 million from the proposed $50 million authorization for the entire rural poverty section.

In other congressional developments:

- The House approved by a voice vote the Land & Water Conservation Fund bill which would set up a national pay-as-you-go fund to buy and develop additional recreational areas for public use. The fund is expected to build at the rate of $150 million a year once it gets into operation.

Meanwhile $60 million in repayable advances are authorized annually over an eight-year period. Sixty percent of the fund will be available to the states on a matching grant basis and the remaining 40 percent will be used for federal recreation areas.

The fund would draw revenue from existing motor boat fuel taxes that now go to the highway fund, the proceeds from sale of surplus federal lands, and modest admission and user fees at national parks.

The AFL-CIO had given strong backing to the measure as "of great importance to all working men and women." Prior to the House vote, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote all representatives that the next few years would be "vital" in meeting the "tremendous expansion" of demand for outdoor recreational space. Lands suitable for this purpose must be acquired rapidly before they are irretrievably lost or become prohobitive in cost, he said.

- The House also was expected to give easy passage, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, to a Wilderness bill differing somewhat from the measure already passed by the Senate. The purpose is to give statutory protection to existing national forests set aside originally by administrative order and to add to the wilderness system by including additional areas in the future. The House bill would set aside 9 million acres immediately and save 52 million acres for future review. The Senate version would cover 14.5 million acres now and up to 46.5 million more later.

- By an overwhelming 388-8 rollcall vote, the House approved an across-the-board increase of 5 percent in social security retirement benefits, plus liberalized benefits for widows and children and broader coverage. The improved benefits would be financed by slight increases in social security taxes paid by workers and employers and application of the taxes to the first $5,400 a year in earnings rather than the present $4,800.

When the bill reaches the Senate, proponents of hospital insurance for the aged under the social security system—which failed to attract enough support to clear the House Ways & Means Committee—have indicated they will try to attach the old-age hospital care provision to the House-passed measure.

- The Senate Labor Committee approved extensions of both the Hill-Burton hospital construction act and the National Defense Education Act.

The Hill-Burton extender, identical to a House-passed measure, would authorize $1.3 billion in grants over five years for construction and modernization of hospitals and non-profit nursing homes and for planning coordinated health facilities on an area-wide basis.

The education bill, containing minor variations from the measure awaiting House action, would step up and extend for three years the program of loans to students and loans and grants to educational institutions for teaching science, mathematics and foreign languages. It would add English, history and geography to subjects for which aid is available and broaden the eligibility requirements of schools which may obtain such aid.

- The Administration's 1964 housing bill cleared the Senate Banking Committee, but without some of the new programs the President had recommended. Eliminated, for example, was the Johnson proposal for a broad program of aid in developing satellite communities.

Basic features of the 15-month bill approved by the committee call for 45,000 more public housing units over the period, $850 million in urban renewal grants, $150 million for farm housing loans, $30 million for urban planning grants, $25 million in grants for urban park areas, $75 million for housing for the elderly, and new aid for displaced families and businesses.

HOSPITALIZATION protection of the nation's senior citizens by private insurance companies covers only about half of all elders, and adequate protection covers less than 25 percent, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Nelson Cruikshank (second from left), said on Labor News Conference, broadcast over the Mutual radio network. He was questioned by Jerry Blizin (left), Washington correspondent of the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times, and Joseph Hutnyan (second from right) of United Press.-Intl. Frank Harden (right) was the moderator.

King-Anderson Need Underlined by Study

The fact that less than one of every four Americans over age 65 has hospital insurance that meets the adequacy standards of the American Hospital Association underlines the need for a social security approach to such insurance, according to AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Nelson Cruikshank.

An investigation of private health insurance coverage by a subcommittee of the Special Senate Committee on Aging, headed by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), showed that only half of the 18 million citizens 65 and over have any health insurance at all, Cruikshank said on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public affairs radio program produced in cooperation with the Mutual Broadcasting System.

The subcommittee majority took the view that private insurance cannot do the job within the financial means of most senior citizens, Cruikshank explained, while the minority claimed private insurance actually is providing coverage for those who want it.

"The majority backs up its position by a very careful statistical analysis," he continued. "They show that about 50 percent of the aged people have 'some kind' of hospital insurance. . . .

"The minority just makes bland assertions, but never backs them up with the tables and the sort of careful analysis that is given in the majority report. I think that the people who take the trouble to read the report carefully will find that the majority position, saying that only about 50 percent have it, is much more effectively documented than the minority report."

Cruikshank went on to explain that the American Hospital Association regards as adequate a hospitalization insurance policy that pays at least 75 percent of the hospital bill. The "great majority" of the private policies, he said, pay a maximum of $10 a day, whereas the average cost of room service alone is more than $20 a day.

He refused to abandon hope for enactment of hospitalization under social security at this session of Congress.

"I think there is hope that it will be added to the social security bill [increasing benefits] as it comes out of the House," he said. "It will be added on by the Senate, and go back to conference."

The hospitalization bill, co-sponsored by Rep. Cecil R. King (D-Calif.) and Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N. M.), was bypassed in the House Ways & Means Committee, where proponents could not raise enough votes to send it to the floor. The lineup was 12 Democrats for the bill, 10 Republicans and three Democrats against.

"There was a feeling all last spring that the Ways & Means Committee was going to take favorable action," Cruikshank said, "so the people who favor the bill settled back on their oars a little bit. Now there is a widespread feeling of disillusionment and, I must say, some bitterness about the committee's failure to act favorably."

If just one Republican had supported the proposal, he said, then the entire House would have had a chance to vote on it.

Cruikshank was questioned by Joseph Hutnyan, Capitol Hill reporter for United Press-Intl., and Jerry Blizin, Washington correspondent for the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times.

George Delaney Heads New AID Labor Office

George P. Delaney, veteran trade union official and former U.S. worker delegate to the Intl. Labor Organization, has been named director of the newly-created Office of Labor Affairs in the Agency for Intl. Development.

He will continue to serve as a special assistant to Sec. of State Dean Rusk and as the State Dept.'s coordinator of international labor affairs.

The Office of Labor Affairs will have a staff of about 20. Delaney's deputies will be Kenneth J. Kelley, formerly secretary-treasurer of the Massachusetts AFL and AFL-CIO, and Arnold Zempel, government career officer in the international labor field.

The office will be a coordinating center for regional labor specialists in carrying out their operating responsibilities; formulate objective and policies in developing and executing regional and national labor programs; review programs and projects; serve as consultant in the recruiting and assignment of labor personnel, and make certain that on all aspects of each country's programs, AID labor objectives receive adequate consideration.

In addition the office will maintain liaison with the U.S. labor movement and coordinate relations with other agencies in support of AID labor programs.

Delaney, a native of Washington, joined the Molders in 1928, became an international organizer in 1938, and after war service was named an AFL international representative in 1947.

While U.S. worker delegate to the ILO he served as a member of the Governing Body, resigning to become director of organization for the Operating Engineers in 1958. The following year he became a special assistant to the secretary of labor and on Mar. 17, 1963, shifted to the State Dept.

Jagan Union Loses Guiana Sugar Strike

The democratic Man-Power Citizens' Association of British Guiana has defeated a violence-marked six-month strike in which the Communist-led Guyana Agricultural Workers Union sought to wrest away bargaining rights for some 25,000 sugar workers.

The GAWU is a front organization for the pro-Communist People's Progressive Party led by Prime Minister Cheddi Jagan. It ended the walkout following a PPP meeting.

The MPCA has represented sugar workers in British Guiana for 23 years and is one of the strongest sugar industry unions in the world. It is an affiliate of the British Guiana Trades Union Council, which in turn is an affiliate of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Leaders of the GAWU have been accused of widespread arson and murder during the strike, which was marked by more than 160 deaths, the burning of hundreds of acres of cane fields, and the bombing or wrecking of the homes of scores of MPCA members. It was reported Jagan acted to end the walkout after wealthy supporters applied pressure following the recent bombings of Indian-owned businesses. East Indians constitute the source of Jagan's political strength.

The MPCA, which represents workers of both African and East Indian descent, was caught in the middle of the racial clash touched off by Jagan in the closing days of the strike. He has succeeded in dividing the two racial groups, both of which are now seeking to create pockets of actual partition.

The MPCA has filed charges against the British government, based on Jagan's activities, with the Intl. Labor Organization. Specifically it has charged violation of ILO conventions guaranteeing the right to organize and bargain collectively, the right of association, and freedom of association and protection of the right to organize.

Sen. Clair Engle Succumbs at 53

Sen. Claim Engle (D-Calif.), died at his Washington home at the age of 53.

He served in the Senate for six years after 21 years' service as a representative. Stricken by a brain tumor 11 months ago, he had failed to respond fully after two operations and withdrew his name from the California Democratic senatorial primary.

Living Is Easy On $2,000 a Year

To assume that a retired man and wife with income of $2,000 a year are in serious financial straits or incapable of buying health insurance "simply does not jibe with reality," according to the Republican presidential candidate, Sen. Barry Goldwater (Ariz.); the man who nominated him, Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.), and a GOP colleague, Sen. Frank Carlson (Kan.).

The statement appeared in their minority views dissenting from the report of the Senate Subcommittee on Health of the Aging. The majority found that the best of the commercial health insurance plans cost at least $500 a year—25 percent of the Republicans' $2,000.

Leadership Role Stressed:

Johnson Asks Labor Aid on Rights Act

throughout by applause and especially during his comments on civil rights. The President opened the session by noting that "responsible leaders of labor are part of the responsible leadership of our American economy and society—and that is why you are here." He noted that the meeting was the fifth time since he became President that labor leaders have been invited to the White House to discuss national problems.

The President introduced members of the Cabinet and three of them spoke briefly—Defense Sec. Robert McNamara on the Defense Dept. program to eliminate waste and step up efficiency; Sec. of State Dean Rusk on the problems in Viet Nam, Cuba, Berlin and other trouble spots in the world; Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz on labor and manpower problems.

The President personally greeted every labor official before leaving for a conference with GOP Presidential Nominee Barry Goldwater for a discussion on civil rights in the campaign.

Johnson, reciting the gains in various sectors of the economy since he has taken office and since the beginning of the Kennedy Administration, made these points:

- Since November the typical family of four has gained almost $370 more after taxes "to save or to spend." In the past 3.5 years, this typical family has gained $1,200 in after-tax take-home income.
- In June 72 million Americans were at work with 5 million more at work at non-farm jobs than in February 1961. Average weekly earnings in manufacturing reached $103.50, an all-time high.

Compassion, Not Coercion

To keep up this course of expansion and prosperity the President pledged continuing reliance on "our tradition of compassion" rather than "toying with the expedients of coercion."

Recalling the depression of the 1930s, Johnson said the nation has prospered since then because the system was committed to "offer jobs for the jobless, not jabs; provide home for the homeless, not hate; give love for the children, not lectures." The nation has commitments to full employment, equal rights and equal opportunity, universal education and security for the aged, and all those shall be kept, he said.

At a luncheon earlier in the week for business and financial leaders, Johnson had called also for their assistance in support of the civil rights law and spelled out the benefits to business of the 41-month expansion in the economy.

Celler Group Firms Stand On Shipyards

A 26-member congressional working committee has adopted a policy statement calling for the retention of all 11 U.S. naval shipyards and declaring that the closing of any yard or a substantial cut in personnel "could only be achieved at the expense of our national security and the well-being of the communities" in which they are located.

At its first meeting, the committee authorized its chairman, Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.), to seek a meeting with Pres. Johnson to appeal for prompt action to stay any closings or cutbacks pending an expected report by the Dept. of Defense.

The committee was formed at a July 22 meeting of more than 100 senators and representatives with Celler, Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., and representatives of Metal Trades Councils at all the yards.

In its statement of policy the committee agreed to "propose, join in and work for" legislation which would require the secretary of defense to obtain the approval of both the House and Senate Armed Services committees before taking any action to "close down, phase out, put on a standby basis or lease or sell" any existing naval shipyard.

Named to a subcommittee on legislation headed by Rep. Robert L. Leggett (D-Calif.) were Senators Kenneth B. Keating (R-N.Y.) and Thomas J. McIntyre (D-N.H.) and Representatives Thomas P. Gill (D-Hawaii) and Hugh Carey (D-N.Y.).

KKK Leaders Back Goldwater

The grand dragons of the Ku Klux Klan in Alabama and Georgia have endorsed the presidential candidacy of Sen. Barry Goldwater.

Robert Creel, Alabama KKK leader, said of Goldwater "I believe what he believes in. I think the same way he thinks."

Calvin F. Craig, Georgia KKK leader, declared "with Goldwater, we've got a chance to regain states rights."

Goldwater also won the wholehearted endorsement of the ultra rightwing Conservative Party. The party said the senator took "a fine position on most issues," but that it could not support the GOP platform because it was "watered down."

FEATURED IN THE AFL-CIO's newly-produced film "When the Day's Work is Done" is a discussion of labor's community service activities with Dave Garroway, left, the film's narrator, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and, at right, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph Beirne. Scene's details are discussed with Dir. of Public Relations Albert J. Zack, second from right. The half-hour documentary will be shown over television on Labor Day.

Goldwater Meets GOP Leaders In Move to Solidify Party Support

Albert as chairman of the Platform Committee.

The Platform Committee will open its sessions in Washington on Aug. 17 and meet in the city through Aug. 19, with the hearings to be resumed in Atlantic City in the days immediately preceding the opening of the convention if there is a need.

Aug. 22 Meeting

The Democratic National Committee will meet in Atlantic City Aug. 22 to approve final arrangements for the convention.

The Republican sessions in Washington came after a 16-minute meeting between Goldwater and Pres. Johnson at the senator's request to discuss the civil rights issue in the upcoming campaign. A brief joint statement was issued declaring that "racial tension should be avoided" during the campaign.

Earlier the same day at a news conference the President said "I propose to discuss and debate the hard and difficult issues in the spirit of attempting to resolve them, and on the assumption that the American people are willing to listen and are intelligent and that they are unafraid."

"The test of a free society, the President said, "is that it discusses and resolves these issues intelligently. It doesn't sweep them under the rug when they become difficult." He noted also:

"If Sen. Goldwater and his advisers, and his followers, will follow the same course that I intend to follow and that I expect the Democratic Party to follow, which is a course of rebuffing and rebuking bigots and those who seek to excite and exploit tensions, then it will be most welcome and I think it will be a very fine contribution to our political life."

At his series of meetings with GOP congressional leaders, it was reported that Golwater would challenge the President to a series of television debates, a report that was confirmed in part by the GOP's nominee's campaign manager, Denison Kitchel, who said he believed the senator would get the better of any such exchange with the President. He affirmed also that Goldwater was making an all-out drive to achieve party unity and that "nobody is going to be read out of the party."

Areas of Strength

Dean Burch, Goldwater's choice for Republican national chairman, indicated that the Goldwater campaign will stress the candidate's areas of strength, generally acknowledged as the South, West and Midwest, but would not ignore any geographical area.

The unification drive in the GOP was highlighted also by Goldwater's announcement that two top Republican leaders—former national chairman Leonard Hall and Ohio National Committeeman Ray Bliss—would serve on the nominee's campaign steering committee.

In addition to the meetings with Goldwater supporters in Washington, the Republican National Committee plans breakfast sessions with all GOP members of the House and Senate and a "summit" in mid-August in Hershey, Pa., including all GOP governors and top party leaders. This would include Governors William Scranton of Pennsylvania and Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York, former Pres. Eisenhower and Vice Pres. Nixon.

While attention centered on Goldwater and the presidential campaign there were these other political developments:

- In Pennsylvania the State Supreme Court rejected the final appeal in the Democratic senatorial contest of Apr. 28 ruling out so-called blank ballots. The 3 to 2 ruling gives the senatorial nomination to Genevieve Blatt, state secretary of internal affairs, over Justice Michael A. Musmanno. She will oppose Republican Sen. Hugh Scott in November.
- In Georgia Gov. Carl E. Sanders named two Negro delegates and two alternates to the state's delegation to the Democratic National Convention for the first time in modern history.
- In Mississippi the state Democratic convention voted to send an uncommitted and unpledged delegation to the national convention and to put up a slate of electors pledged to the Democratic ticket. Reporters attending the convention said that most of the delegates prefer to endorse Goldwater. The convention recessed until Sept. 9, after the national convention has acted.
- In Arkansas Gov. Orval Faubus easily won renomination for a sixth term. His November opponent will be Republican Winthrop Rockefeller, brother of the New York governor.
- In Louisiana all incumbents easily won renomination except for Rep. Gillis W. Long in the Eighth District. He was defeated by his cousin, Speedy O. Long, who accused the congressman of not being segregationist enough.

Make Labor Day Safe, Union Members Urged

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has called on all affiliates to take an active part in the sixth annual Labor Day Safety Campaign and to "work diligently" in a united effort to make labor's own holiday a safe one.

The campaign is staged jointly by the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, of which Vice Pres. Richard F. Walsh, president of the Stage Hands, is chairman, and the Labor Conference of the National Safety Council, headed by Safety Dir. Victor E. Whitehouse of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

As chairman of this year's campaign, Meany named Vice Pres. O. A. Knight, president of the Oil Workers.

"Through our unions," Knight said, "let us make a point of issuing reminders to our members that Labor Day, the summer season's last major holiday, is a time to exercise utmost precautions."

International union presidents in urging their locals to join in the drive also were asked to call on them to sponsor a campaign among members to have an approved safety belt installed in their cars and to use it constantly. A list of approved belts made under union conditions may be obtained by writing John D. Connors, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington 6, D. C.

Material to help promote the campaign has been available from the National Safety Council. It includes an announcement of a $50 award for the best cartoon aimed at reducing the Labor Day weekend toll published in a labor paper or magazine just prior to the holiday.

Social Action Parley To Cite John Brophy

John Brophy, veteran labor leader who died last year at the age of 79, will receive a posthumous award for distinguished contributions in the field of social action at the convention of the National Catholic Social Action Conference convention in Boston Aug. 13-16.

To be honored with Brophy, whose more than 60 years as a union member included the vice presidency of the Mine Workers and a major role in the former CIO, will be Dorothy Day, co-founder with the late Peter Maurin of the Catholic Worker movement.

Council Hits GOP Platform On 'Extremist' Issue, Labor

NEWSPAPER, RADIO AND TV reporters crowded the news conference at which AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced the Executive Council's condemnation of the Republican Party platform. Assails Stand on Nuclear Weapons

By Saul Miller

Chicago—The AFL-CIO Executive Council branded the Republican platform adopted in San Francisco "an insult to the intelligence of the voters" and said it should be rejected by the people with "disdain" as offering "nothing to meet the problems of 20th Century America."

The unanimously adopted statement was coupled with two others sharply assailing the Republican Party's handling of the issues of political "extremism" and presidential control of atomic weapons.

The 1964 elections received major attention at the three-day summer meeting of the council along with a broad AFL-CIO program to make a "living reality" of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, and a strong statement of support for Pres. Johnson's actions in Viet Nam.

Both the elections and civil rights will receive national trade union attention early in September when the 166-member AFL-CIO General Board meets to give formal endorsement to a presidential candidate and map campaign plans for November, and a wider conference of AFL-CIO officials at all levels to develop a civil rights program keyed to implementation and enforcement of the new statute.

Pres. George Meany told a news conference that the issue posed by the Republican platform and its selection of candidates is the "bread-and-butter issue of the survival of the trade union movement."

Meany said on the views of Sen. Barry Goldwater, the GOP presidential nominee, "I think he feels the country would be better off if we didn't have trade unions." The GOP program as contained in the platform, Meany added, would "jeopardize" all the things that the trade union movement has fought and worked and hoped for.

'Extremism' Denounced

Declaring that the attempt to make political "extremism" a synonym for patriotism is "obvious nonsense," the council said, declaring flatly that "extremism means the death of the labor movement and the death of liberty itself."

In the language of American politics, the council said, "extremism" can only mean "the radical elements of both the far left and the far right—the Communist Party on the one hand, and such groups as the Ku Klux Klan and the John Birch Society on the other. We reject them all."

On the question of control of atomic weapons, the council said it "vigorously opposes any attempt to change the law which entrusts only the President of the United States" with the responsibility for the use of nuclear weapons.

Toward 'a Living Reality':

Five-Point Rights Drive Set, National Conference Slated

Chicago—The AFL-CIO has pledged its "unremitting efforts" to the new struggle to translate the 1964 Civil Rights Act "into living reality in every phase of American life."

The drive to make the "national consensus a national reality" was spelled out in a statement adopted by the federation's Executive Council here, which set out a basic five-point program and summoned a national trade union conference to work out detailed plans to implement the campaign.

The conference, called for Sept. 2 in Washington and to include officers of all AFL-CIO affiliates, state central bodies and a number of local central bodies, was charged by the council with developing programs in the following areas:

- The education of union members and other citizens as to the actual terms of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The goal is to assure that all union officials and members understand the facts of the law and their meaning. Federation departments, regional directors and affiliated unions are instructed to draw up a program and see that it is effectuated.
- A great broadening of the work of AFL-CIO community task forces, with emphasis on state and city central bodies working with religious, civic and civil rights organizations in their communities toward achievement of equal opportunity in the schools and in all public facilities and places of public accommodation.
- Major attention to the voluntary achievement of fair employment practices among organized and unorganized employers alike in the year before Title 7 of the Civil Rights Act takes effect in 1965. All unions are urged to step up their efforts to negotiate and enforce non-discrimination clauses in collective bargaining contracts and to make a careful check on employer compliance.
- The need for adequate funds and vigorous administration of the new law to prevent emasculation of, or a back-door attack on, the historic legislation. This must not be allowed to happen to the "greatest social advance in a century," the council said.
- Continued observance of the law by all AFL-CIO affiliates and central bodies to determine any inadequacies that may have to be presented to Congress for further legislative action.

July Jobless Rate Drops Below 5 Percent Mark

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's jobless rate broke below 5 percent in July for the first time in 53 months, the Labor Dept. has reported while cautioning that the rate may "snap back."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz welcomed the extra-seasonal unemployment decline of 900,000 as "encouraging" but issued this firm reminder:

"The drop in unemployment from 5.3 percent to 4.9 percent means that 3,813,000 people are still out of work. That's an awful lot of people to be left out of a record high prosperity."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany issued this statement:

"The AFL-CIO hails the good news that the unemployment rate has dropped below 5 percent for the first time since 1960. With both productivity and the labor force increasing rapidly, many additional months of continued improvements are needed before an approach to full employment can be reached.

"It is our fervent hope that gov-

Council Backs Johnson In Viet Namese Crisis

Chicago—The AFL-CIO Executive Council pledged "the complete backing of the American labor movement" to Pres. Johnson on U.S. retaliation to North Viet Namese attacks on American naval vessels in international waters in the Gulf of Tonkin.

The council interrupted its meeting here to listen to the President's Aug. 5 speech at Syracuse, N.Y.—the day after he ordered U.S. air strikes at North Viet Namese torpedo boat bases—and immediately sent the President the following wire:

"The AFL-CIO Executive Council, which just interrupted its meeting in Chicago to listen to your magnificent message of strength to the free world, unanimously and enthusiastically pledges you our complete support. As you so correctly stated, all America is united in the pursuit of peace and in total opposition to all aggression. You can count on the complete backing of the American labor movement and you will receive it."

At a news conference later in the day AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the President's move against the North Viet Nam aggressors was the "only action" he could take. The entire course of history has demonstrated that there is "no future in appeasing aggressors," he said, declaring he believed that all Americans would strongly support the President's policy regardless of political differences.

The council had earlier adopted a strong statement endorsing the U.S. government's general position on the fighting in South Viet Nam and then called on the free world labor movement to support the people in that country in their fight against totalitarian aggression and their effort to build a country based on democracy and social justice. The statement specifically urged strengthening of the labor movement in South Viet Nam. (Story on Page 3.)

Action Urged To Continue Works Plan

Chicago—An urgent plea to Congress to extend and expand the "job-creating" accelerated public works program was made by the AFL-CIO Executive Council to prevent more than 100,000 jobs from vanishing.

The council asked for all possible speed, noting that bills to continue the program have been approved by the full Public Works Committees of the House and Senate and await floor action.

The need is "imperative," the council said, for action before adjournment of the 88th Congress. All funds provided by the Public Works Act of 1962 have been committed, it said, and the last of the projects soon will be completed. A "huge backlog" of previously authorized projects remains, the council pointed out, "waiting only for the funds to put them into effect."

As long as the overriding economic challenge is jobs, it added, the employment provided by the needed public works projects is essential both to the unemployed and the newcomers entering the labor market.

The council said that 6,000 projects have been undertaken in 3,000 of the nation's communities hardest hit by unemployment and that the facilities provided will have a total value when completed of $1.7 billion. These projects, the statement added, have helped to improve the public facilities of depressed communities and put thousands of Americans to work at useful jobs both on construction sites and in providing materials, equipment and transportation.

The unemployed "deserve no less" than extension and expansion of this program, the council said.

1,250 Credit Unions Organized by Labor

Madison, Wis.—Organized workers in the United States have established 1,250 credit unions through their trade unions, according to the 1964 Credit Union Yearbook.

'Millions' Committed For Investment Trust

Chicago—The AFL-CIO-created mortgage investment trust—a pooling of union funds for investment in government guaranteed mortgages—is ready to function with a "number of millions of dollars" already committed.

The Executive Council received this report from Alexander Bookstaver, director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Investment, who said there has been an "excellent response" from affiliated unions.

The mortgage investment fund, which allows small and large unions alike to participate in purchasing government - backed mortgages, was approved by the council at its February 1964 meeting and by the General Board during the same sessions.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany reviewed and explained the development of the idea in detail at a news conference, stressing the goals. He listed these as helping increase income for pension, welfare and other funds by investment at higher rates of return, while at the same time encouraging development of housing to replace slums and reducing excessive interest rates. The higher rate of housing construction which would stem from this program would also provide jobs for trade union members both in construction and affiliated fields, he noted.

Meany said the potential of the investment fund was in the billions of dollars and that the possibilities were "almost limitless" if all unions participate to the best of their ability.

He noted that use of union funds to support housing projects in a number of Latin American countries was having a great impact in the entire hemisphere and especially the construction of the John F. Kennedy housing project in Mexico City, where AFL-CIO unions will put up $10 million in mortgage funds fully backed by U. S. government guarantees.

Meany said there are plans working through the Social Projects Dept. of the American Institute for Free Labor Development to finance in other countries, especially Africa.

National Conference Set To Shape Rights Drive

tion Pres. George Meany made the following points on civil rights:

- Trade union members are knowledgeable on the civil rights issue and will be less affected than others by the so-called "white backlash" to the Civil Rights Act. Meany acknowledged that the "backlash" problem exists and will have some effect on the election campaign.
- Groups indulging in fighting and rioting in the streets are harming the cause of civil rights. The people as a whole have to accept the idea that discrimination and segregation must be ended and that there must be obedience to the law of the land. When this happens, the country will be "a long way down the road" to achieving equal rights for all.
- The labor movement has had some success in the South, as well as some resistance, in pressing its campaign against discrimination. In general the AFL-CIO is "much encouraged" and "making progress."
- A problem of discrimination within trade unions exists "and we make no pretense about it," but a great deal of progress is being made. As it does exist, the issue is on the local level. On the national level an intensive campaign is being waged on discrimination.
- The civil rights problem is tied directly to the economic situation and is essentially a bread-and-butter issue. Trade union members understand this, especially in regard to the high rate of unemployment among Negroes and other minority groups, Meany said.

The council statement strongly emphasized the interrelation of civil rights and jobs, declaring that for equal rights and equal opportunity to be meaningful there must be "full employment, full educational opportunities and all the rest." The fight to create jobs and to abolish poverty "are themselves civil rights campaigns indispensable to the success of the law."

To fully enforce and implement the law, the council said, it is necessary to "enlist new adherents" to the cause. There are many organizations which have been in opposition to certain aspects of civil rights legislation "or have stood aloof from the struggle" that must now participate in the orderly implementation of the law, it continued.

Labor has a special obligation, the council added, especially with respect to equal employment opportunities. The law as written, it noted, delays enforcement of the fair employment section of the act for a year. "The AFL-CIO cannot and will not wait on the letter of the law; the spirit of the law looks to voluntary compliance and so do we."

New Program Urged to Meet Housing Needs

Chicago—The groundwork for a comprehensive new housing and community development program to meet national housing needs should be laid now for enactment early in the next Congress, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

In a statement pointing out that one-fifth of the nation lives in substandard or deficient housing and that the population is rapidly growing, the council called for uninterrupted operation of current programs and development of new ones.

Enactment of new programs, it said, would be "a vital step toward the attainment of full employment and toward the reduction of poverty." They are necessary also in meeting the problems of crime, juvenile delinquency, family disruption, racial strife and "social disintegration and discontent," the council declared.

Council Declares:

Step-Up in Economy Vital to Jobless Cut

Chicago—A rising pace of production and employment is needed during "at least the next two years" before unemployment can be reduced to a minimum, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

This required improvement in economic activity, it said, will require continued government leadership to overcome the "many obstacles in the path toward full employment."

The council said the continuing advance in sales and production is welcome but that the drop in unemployment has been "all too small" and that although presently available jobs have "slightly exceeded" the growth of the labor force "this is not enough."

Such minor reduction of unemployment as has taken place, the council noted, has been among adults with established skills or work experience. "The others have been essentially bypassed."

Unfavorable Factors

It cited the unchanging number over the year of long-term unemployed, 15 weeks or more; the June jobless rate of nearly 16 percent among young people under 25; the June jobless rate among Negroes under 25 of a "shocking 25 percent."

The full impact of an increasing number of teenagers will hit the labor force within the next few years, with almost 4 million youngsters reaching the age of 17 in 1964, a million more than last year, the council warned. It added that automation is continuing to spread and that investment in new plant and equipment will have a "job-displacing impact."

The second step of the tax cut next January will have only minor effects, the statement said, and the beneficial effect of this year's tax cut is wearing off. Continued economic gains will depend increasingly on rising consumer buying power and government job-creating measures, it warned.

Much of the economic advance to date, the council pointed out, has been reaped by business, with after-tax profits for the first half of 1964 some 20 percent above the same period a year ago and 30 percent greater than in the first half of 1962.

The council called for "increased government investment" in human and natural resources and assistance for low-wage workers, the aged and the unemployed. Legislation is needed, it reaffirmed, to reduce the workweek and increase overtime premium to double-time pay.

July Jobless Rate Drops Below 5 Percent Mark

ernment measures and private policies will provide the basis for such continuing improvements. We intend to keep pushing for those measures which will achieve full employment for America."

The large drop in unemployment was traceable to a strong job gain of 486,000 in the non-farm sector and more than 400,000 persons dropping out of the labor force.

Whether the July report represents the long-sought crack in the unemployment problem remains to be seen. Since the key seasonally-adjusted jobless rate jumped from 4.6 to 5.1 percent in November 1957, it has moved up over 7 percent in two recessions and was pulled below 5 percent only once—when it fell to 4.9 percent in February 1960.

Thus the 5 percent barrier has been reached just twice in six and a half years—81 months in all.

Wirtz, whose personal goal is a jobless rate of 3 percent which would reflect mainly job-changing, focused attention on the formidable problems of youth employment and the long-term unemployed.

"There is very little satisfaction," he declared, "in a report which shows that 1,171,000 younger workers are unemployed. This means that one out of every eight young Americans looking for work can't find it. Among non-white groups, one out of every four younger workers is unemployed. And these figures don't include those who have 'given up,' so that they aren't even in the statistics any more."

Wirtz pointed out that, of the July unemployed, some 535,000 people have been jobless 27 weeks or longer "and again this figure includes only those who are still actively looking for work."

The total of very long-term unemployed is only 22,000 less than a year ago, Wirtz noted, calling this "another indication that the current job expansion has not been reaching those Americans isolated by poverty."

The July improvement confirms, said Wirtz, "that if we keep on trying as hard as we have been we can eventually reach our full employment goal."

Robert Stein, Labor Dept. manpower expert, said there is no assurance that the rate would not "snap back" over 5 percent in coming months.

The selected unemployment rates almost all improved markedly and returned close to their May levels. The jobless rates were 3.7 percent for adult men, 4.9 percent for adult women and fell from 15.0 in June to 13.1 percent for teenagers. The rate for married men—the breadwinner group—improved slightly, from 2.8 percent in June to 2.7 percent in July; a year ago it was 3.2.

Total employment rose by 452,000 to a record 72.4 million. The non-farm gain was 200,000 more than seasonal while agricultural jobs declined by 34,000.

The decline of 879,000 in the unemployed was about 300,000 more than the expected June-to-July drop, the report said.

The total labor force—at 79 million—fell as expected by 400,000 but remained some 1.4 million higher than last year on the average.

Panel to Investigate New Jersey Dispute

Chicago—Difficulties within the New Jersey AFL-CIO will be investigated by an Executive Council subcommittee composed of Vice Presidents Joseph A. Beirne, Herman D. Kenin and Peter T. Schoemann, AFL-CIO Pres. Meany announced.

Unions in the state, after several years under merger, are near the point of separating, Meany told a news conference. The council subcommittee will investigate the situation and seek to mediate differences if possible, he said.

Council Hits GOP on 'Extremism' Issue

Platform Draws Strong Attack As Offering 'Nothing' to Nation

Meeting during the council sessions, the operating and administrative committees of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education worked out plans to intensify the current register-and-vote drives and contributions to COPE.

The 1964 registration drive is being concentrated in 92 marginal congressional districts—districts decided by 5 percent or less of the vote cast—and is being carried out in close cooperation with Negro and other civil rights organizations.

The council acted on current economic and legislative problems, heard reports on membership and organization and reaffirmed labor's positions on Communist aggression and threats in Cuba and South Viet Nam.

The statement on the Republican platform pointed out that attention at the GOP convention centered on three issues—civil rights, extremism and civilian control of nuclear weapons. But the platform, said the council, makes other "departures . . . from the realities of American society." In advance of a detailed analysis that will be made of both the Republican and Democratic platforms, the council said, "we are compelled to express our deep shock at the total nature of the Republican platform."

Labor Snubbed

It cited AFL-CIO proposals on unemployment which were disregarded by the Republican platform and pointed out that in its "few specifics" the platform opposed higher premium pay for overtime and endorsed more teen-age employment at less than federal minimum wages. The council termed "startling" the platform's omissions on labor-management relations, noting that the only "substantive reference" was a "thinly-veiled threat to unions under the anti-trust laws."

The statement cited the platform's approach to old-age hospital insurance and to consumer protection as other examples of a failure to meet the nation's needs, and concluded:

"Even without the detailed analysis to which we referred earlier, it is obvious to this Executive Council that the Republican platform is an insult to the intelligence of the voters. It offers nothing to meet the problems of 20th Century America. Instead of progress, it proposes retrogression.

"For the American labor movement, the Republican platform merits not mere rejection but outright disdain."

Endorsements Later

Meany told reporters that the statements on the Republican platform were issued so that trade union members would have some idea of its nature. He pointed out in reply to a query that there will be no endorsement of presidential candidates until after the Democratic National Convention. Actual endorsement will take place at the AFL-CIO General Board meeting in Washington Sept. 1.

Meany stressed that the long-time policy of the trade union movement is to endorse candidates and programs, but not political parties, and that therefore endorsement in 1964 would await the completion of the naming of candidates and the adoption of platforms.

In the legislative and economic area the council took these actions:

- Called on Congress to "stand firm for the principle of one man, one vote" and repect congressional attempts to upset the recent legislative apportionment decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court. (Story on Page 4.)
- Reaffirmed its all-out support for Pres. Johnson's war on poverty and called on all House members to vote for the anti-poverty legislation. (Story on Page 12.)
- Filed a plea with Congress to extend and expand the job-creating accelerated public works program to prevent more than 100,000 jobs from vanishing. (Story on page 2.)
- Declared that a rising pace of production and employment is needed during at least the next two years to make a real impact on the chronically high levels of unemployment. (Story on Page 2.)
- Asserted it will continue to fight for a hospital care program for the aged through social security and noted the omission of the program in the House-passed bill to raise social security benefits which it welcomed as a needed although "modest" increase. (Story on Page 4.)
- Urged Congress to lay the groundwork for a comprehensive new housing and community development program to meet national housing needs. (Story on Page 2.)

In matters affecting the operations and programs of the labor movement the council:

- Heard a report that the AFL-CIO-created mortgage investment trust is ready to function and that there has been an excellent response from affiliated unions. (Story on Page 2.)
- Received a report that the federation has shown a gain of more than 360,000 in membership in the first six months of 1964 and that in the 12 months ending June 30, 1964, unions won 2,600 National Labor Relations Board elections involving 204,000 workers. (Story on Page 4.)
- Approved the creation of a special committee to work with the Peace Corps in helping recruit skilled and semi-skilled workers for the organization. (Story on this page.)
- Voted to set up a three-man council committee to investigate difficulties existing in the New Jersey AFL-CIO.
- Heard a report that the disputes mediation machinery of the AFL-CIO continued to function successfully with 60 percent of all complaints resolved by mutual agreement or mediation. (Story on Page 4.)

On international affairs the council:

- Called for a thorough investigation of the forced labor camps and inhuman conditions of the thousands of political prisoners in Communist Cuba. (Story on this page.)
- Reaffirmed its active cooperation with the Viet Namese Confederation of Labor (CVT) and urged free trade unions everywhere to unite in an international effort to help the working people of the southeast Asia country. (Stories on Pages 1 and 3.)
- Heard a report on the activities of the American Institute for Free Labor Development and its 11 branch institutes which have trained 5,000 persons for labor leadership in Latin American countries. Many of the graduates are active in the developing trade unions in the hemisphere countries.

In other actions the council:

- Approved jointly with the American Dental Association a basic guide to assist AFL-CIO unions in establishing prepayment dental health programs. The two organizations have adopted a 10-point statement of principles to govern establishment of such plans. (Story on Page 4.)
- Endorsed the work of the Crusade against Poverty which is seeking to coordinate the activities of religious, social and other organizations to arouse public attention to the scope of poverty in the United States and indicate the actions necessary to solve it.

Viet Nam Unions Given Firm AFL-CIO Backing

Chicago—The AFL-CIO has reaffirmed its "active cooperation" with the Viet Namese Confederation of Labor (CVT) and urged "free trade unions everywhere to unite in an international effort to help the working people" in the southeast Asia country.

The successful conclusion of the war of aggression waged against Viet Nam by Communist forces depends not only on military strength, the Executive Council declared, but on greater political democracy, land reforms and improvements in health and education. The CVT must be helped to carry out this program, it said.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a news conference the federation's position was simply that the Viet Namese government must be convinced not to hamper the activities of the labor movement in the country and that the trade unions be allowed "to play their part."

He strongly supported Pres. Johnson's immediate retaliation policy announced after Communist ships fired on a U.S. naval vessel, saying "I'm all for it," this is "a risk we have to take."

Background of War

The council statement reviewed the long history of the war in Viet Nam and declared that "the free world must strengthen the forces now engaged in the tragic war. . . ." The council reaffirmed its pledge earlier this year of "full support to all measures which our government may find necessary for safeguarding the independence and freedom of South Viet Nam and the other people of southeast Asia."

The council welcomed Johnson's "appropriate rebuff" of French Pres. De Gaulle's proposal for an international conference to neutralize the Indo-China Peninsula, affirming support for the President's statement that "we do not believe in a conference to ratify terror."

The Viet Namese trade union movement "is an essential element which can play a decisive role in defeating totalitarian aggression," the council declared in urging free world labor support for the CVT.

The Viet Namese people must be given "new confidence and self-reliance" through organization of the villages to help the people defend their rights and promote their well-being, the statement said. Such full mobilization "will demonstrate forcefully that the war against communism in Viet Nam is not a war for conquest or any privileged interests but only for safeguarding the conditions of democracy," the council said.

Peace Corps Drive Backed by Council

Chicago — The AFL-CIO has called on all affiliated unions to cooperate with the Peace Corps in its efforts to enlist the interest of skilled and semi-skilled workers in service overseas.

The Executive Council noted that the federation had given the Peace Corps "its hearty endorsement and support" in the past. The council statement pointed out that the demand on the Peace Corps for skilled workers has been growing and that the organization is "stepping up its efforts to recruit skilled and semi-skilled workers."

The council action supporting the recruiting drive came after a presentation by three officials of the Peace Corps who indicated a need for about 1,000 skilled craftsmen for the corp's overseas operations.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany also announced that a committee has been appointed to work with the Peace Corps in aiding the skill recruitment drive. It is headed by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne and includes Vice Presidents James A. Suffridge and Joseph D. Keenan, Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. and Pres. B. A. Gritta of the Metal Trades Dept.

Shop Votes Union In 10th Election

Sullivan, Ill.—Ten was the winning number for the United Shoe Workers at the Brown Shoe Co.

In a National Labor Relations Board election, the 10th since 1941, employes gave the Shoe Workers 175 votes to 152 for no union. Eight ballots were impounded on challenges. The plant employs 375.

Dir. Russell J. Taylor of the union expressed thanks for aid by AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Daniel J. Healy, Staff Rep. Henry Henry; and others who helped.

Ohio Mayor Killed, Was IUE Member

Mansfield, O. — Mayor Charles H. Scott of Mansfield, killed in an airplane crash near Harriman, N.Y., was a veteran member of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers Local 711 who helped organize the Westinghouse plant here in 1941. He retained IUE membership when he left the plant upon his election as mayor in 1961.

OAS Urged To Probe Cuban Forced Labor

Chicago—A thorough investigation of the forced labor camps and inhuman conditions of the thousands of political prisoners in Communist Cuba has been called for by the AFL-CIO.

The Executive Council recommended that the investigation be conducted by the Organization of American States (OAS) and the United Nations Commission on Human Rights to the end that "additional appropriate measures may be adopted to put an end to the intolerable acts of injustice committed by the Castro regime against the Cuban people."

The council welcomed the OAS foreign ministers' condemnation of Cuba for acts of aggression, terming it a "timely move in defense of freedom and democracy in the hemisphere."

The open terrorism, sabotage and guerrilla warfare conducted by the Castro regime against Venezuela and "clandestinely against other Latin American republics" deserves the sharpest condemnation, the council said, adding its regrets that Bolivia, Chile, Mexico and Uruguay "did not see the merits of making the sanctions vote unanimous."

Noting Castro's recent overtures for negotiating an understanding with the United States, the council said it was mindful of "his many flagrant violations of international agreements and complete disregard of human rights and dignity."

A prerequisite to such negotiations, the council asserted, must be fulfillment by Castro of his original promise to implement the 1940 constitution of Cuba; a specific date for free elections under the supervision of the OAS; restoration of complete freedom to the labor movement; the immediate release of all trade unionists and other political prisoners; and "immediate removal of all Soviet personnel, rockets and other war-making materials."

KIDS AND CARPENTERS ride the "giant coaster" at the first annual outing held by New Jersey State Council of Carpenters for 7,500 orphaned and underprivileged boys and girls at Palisades Amusement Park at Palisade, N.J. Outing officers are, from the front: Vice Pres. Eugene O'Horo of East Orange, N.J., Carpenters; Lou Petrie of Hackensack, outing co-chairman, and Chairman Fred Nusbaum, of North Plainfield.

Mediation Solves 60% Of Internal Disputes

Chicago—The disputes mediation machinery of the AFL-CIO constitution continues to function successfully, with 60 percent of all complaints resolved by mutual agreement without need for determination by an impartial umpire, the federation's Executive Council has reported.

The Internal Disputes Plan—known as Article XXI of the constitution—was adopted at the 1961 AFL-CIO convention and went into effect Jan. 1, 1962.

Since that time a total of 322 new complaints, or claims of "justification" for action that would otherwise violate Article XXI, were filed with the office of Pres. George Meany.

The council reported at its meeting here that the case load was as follows: 155 cases filed in 1962, another 96 in 1963 and, for the first seven months of this year, an additional 71.

Of these 322 cases, 190 were resolved by mediation, with another 14 cases still in the process of mediation.

In 101 cases impartial umpires made determinations. In addition, the umpires submitted seven fact-finding reports to the council on cases arising under Sections 4 and 17 of Article XXI. Two cases are pending before the umpires.

73 Violations Found

Of the 101 determinations by the umpires, violations of Article XXI were found in 73 cases. In 28 cases, the umpires found that the action involved in the complaint did not violate Article XXI.

An Executive Council subcommittee has received 32 appeals from umpires' determinations with these results:

Appeal denied, 28; withdrawn, 1; referred to Executive Council, 2; pending, 1.

Twenty complaints of noncompliance with umpires' determinations were received by the subcommittee, which reported it took these actions: compliance achieved, 10; noncompliance found, 6; pending, 4.

Guidelines Set On Pre-Paid Dental Plans

Chicago—A basic guide to assist AFL-CIO unions in establishing prepayment dental health programs has been worked out by the federation and the American Dental Association.

The 10-point statement of principles was announced by the Executive Council, which noted that more than 1 million Americans are currently covered by prepayment dental plans, many of them under union contracts. It termed the "basic understanding" with the dental association of "far-reaching importance."

The AFL-CIO and the ADA, the statement said, "jointly recognize that a systematic prepayment program is a feasible method of meeting the cost of high quality dental care and of making such care available to more people." Both organizations agreed that such plans must have "built-in safeguards" to insure good care.

The council commended the dental group for "its enlightened approach" to the problem.

The principles in the joint statement included provision for high-quality comprehensive care, programs organized to serve groups within the entire community, consumer and public concern with the services provided, free choice of plan or program as well as of dentist, remuneration on a fee-for-service, per capita, salary or other basis, machinery to insure that fee procedures are maintained, a minimization of deductible and co-insurance features, impartial review of grievances, jointly planned and conducted dental health education programs.

Willoughby Abner To Assist Simkin

Willoughby Abner, a staff member of the Auto Workers, has been appointed special assistant to Federal Mediator William E. Simkin.

Abner, 43, has been assistant director of the UAW Leadership Studies Center. He has long experience in the labor movement and in civic affairs, serving as president of UAW Local 734, as president and then board chairman of the Chicago chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and as Chicago officer for the Congress of Racial Equality.

New Drive Pledged for Aged Care

Chicago — The AFL-CIO will keep fighting for hospital care for the aged under social security because neither government assistance, "the incantations of the American Medical Association" nor the "inflated statistical claims" of the insurance industry have solved the problem.

The Executive Council said the "ever-present danger of a hospitalized illness remains the most serious threat to the economic security of the elderly. And the only way to provide protection against this threat is by an extension of the social security principle."

The statement noted the House passage of a measure to increase social security benefits and expand coverage, a bill it welcomed despite its "modest" increase.

The House bill, however, must be evaluated "not only for the needs it meets but for the needs it fails to meet," specifically hospital care for the aged, the council emphasized. The House Ways & Means Committee did not include health care for the elderly in its bill to increase social security benefits.

The Kerr-Mills act, after nearly four years of providing a form of public assistance health care for the aged, "is meeting but a fraction of the need and it is still not in operation in all states," the council said. Private insurance is providing protection of a minimum adequacy for only about a quarter of the elderly, the statement added, citing the report of the McNamara committee after intensive hearings.

21 Students Aided by Local's Grants

Buena Park, Calif. — One-year college scholarships worth a total of $7,500 have been awarded to 21 students by Retail Clerks Local 324.

The winners were selected from 253 applicants who took a comprehensive test in March, with eligibility restricted to members and the children or spouses of members.

Robert T. Northcote, Jr., of Lakewood, was awarded $750 for graduate study. Similar awards for undergraduate study went to Cecelia A. De Meneces, Garden Grove, and Richard F. DeSmet, Long Beach, while Nancy Jean Condon, Long Beach; Ronald F. See, Anaheim, and Robert A. Filbey, Jr., Orange, were awarded $500 each. The 15 remaining winners received $250 each for undergraduate study.

Council Hits Delaying Move:

'1 Man, 1 Vote' Stand Urged on Congress

Chicago—The AFL-CIO has called on Congress to "stand firm for the principle of one man, one vote" and reject current proposals to upset the recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions knocking out inequitable apportionment of state legislatures.

The Executive Council coupled its call to Congress with a directive to all state central bodies "to press for prompt reapportionment . . . so that the equality of every voter becomes a reality in all precincts of the nation."

In swift reaction to Senate Judiciary Committee approval of a bill to postpone the effect of court reapportionment decisions for as long as two years, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller in telegrams to Senate members from the council meeting called attention to the statement and urged that Congress stand firm against any delaying action.

The reapportionment delay bill, filed by Republican Senate Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.), was a last-gap substitute for a proposed constitutional amendment to curb the court's power in reapportionment cases.

Lacking time to obtain approval of the amendment proposal, Dirksen said, he was turning to the legislative approach—postponement of the effective date of any court decision until at least two regular sessions of the state legislature affected.

The GOP leader also served notice that he would file his bill as an amendment—in effect, a "rider"—to any pending measure which he thought Pres. Johnson would feel compelled to sign.

Hit as 'Unconscionable'

Biemiller's telegram to Senate members denounced as "unconscionable" such attempts to forestall the effect of federal court decisions by mere legislative act, hastily approved in committee and hastily called upon the floor.

"An issue of this importance should receive full consideration by appropriate committees, with ample opportunity for all interested persons to be heard," he declared.

He also transmitted by telegram to all House Judiciary Committee members the full text of the Executive Council statement on reapportionment.

Dirksen's original effort, backed by other Republicans and some southern Democrats, was to obtain approval of an amendment allowing at least one house in bicameral state legislatures on a basis other than population, such as a seat for each county or some other geographical area.

The Illinois senator was facing a likelihood however, that no such amendment would be cleared this session in the House Judiciary Committee. Court decisions therefore would remain in effect, legislatures would in fact be reapportioned on a "one man, one vote" basis, and equity in representation would be granted urban and suburban voters long subjected to rule by state assemblies controlled by rural minorities.

Office-Keeping Held Motive

Such a rurally-controlled legislature, under Dirksen's proposed amendment, might well vote ratification to preserve the offices of incumbents. A legislature already reapportioned on a population basis would have no such personal self-interest in overriding the court decisions.

The effect of the Dirksen "rider," if passed, would be to preserve the status of rurally-controlled legislatures by simple act of Congress and gain time for maneuver. A constitutional amendment such as Dirksen proposed—and then dropped for this session—was urged in the recent Republican national convention platform.

The council reapportionment statement pointed out that in 15 states one house of the legislature can be controlled by less than 20 percent of the voters. It said that the failure of state legislatures to reapportion on an equitable basis "has forced the federal government to fill the gap left by the paralysis."

Congress must, said the council, "reject all efforts to diminish or dilute the true processes of democracy in this country and . . . stand firm for the principle of one man, one vote."

Membership Gain Seen As Reversal of Trend

Chicago—The AFL-CIO has shown a gain of more than 360,000 members in the first six months of 1964, federation Pres. George Meany reported, commenting that the figures indicate "a reversal of the trend that has existed for the past few years."

Meany told reporters at a news conference here during the Executive Council meeting that the average per capita membership reported at the 1963 convention of the AFL-CIO was 12,469,000. From the convention through June 30 of this year the average per capita figure has risen to 12,830,000.

Along with the report on the membership gain, Meany said the council had received a report from the director of organization, John W. Livingston, that in the 12 months ending June 30, 1964, AFL-CIO unions had participated in 4,900 National Labor Relations Board elections and had won 2,600 for a 53 percent average. About 204,000 workers were involved in the union victories.

He said also that the coordinated organizing drive in Los Angeles, which was set up two years ago, has done "reasonably well" and that the national participation in the program will now be phased out and local groups will carry on the campaign. The AFL-CIO will continue the current Washington, D. C.-Baltimore area campaign and is planning to mount another campaign in the Atlanta, Ga., region, he added.

Meany said that the figures on the Los Angeles drive showed a gain of 46,000 members which was not as great as had been hoped for. The important thing, he stressed, was that the technique for joint cooperative organizing was perfected and the proper atmosphere was created favorable to future organizing drives.

Community Service in Action:

Labor's Helping Hands Depicted in New Film

The story of organized labor's dedication to community service is told in a half-hour documentary, "When the Day's Work Is Done," to be premiered on television stations over the country on Labor Day weekend.

The film depicts the dedication of union members to their communities in scenes ranging from the donation of blood to the helping of refugees to start life anew in this country.

It also shows the end results of a complex of medical research and rehabilitation centers built on Long Island, N. Y., with the voluntary labor of trade unionists. Members of the Nassau-Suffolk Building & Construction Trades Council gave more than a half-million hours of labor to build the facilities, scenes from which are shown on this page.

AT SUFFOLK Rehabilitation Center, Commack, L. I., which volunteer union labor helped build, a handicapped child is guided during physical therapy.

CAMERAMAN films a phase of cancer research at the cancer research and prevention center, Woodbury, L. I., built with the help of labor donated by members of building trades unions.

UNION LABOR also helped build the Nassau County United Cerebral Palsy Center, one result of 17 years of volunteer efforts by building tradesmen.

PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED children are shown swimming at the Nassau County CP Center pool, under a program balancing rehabilitation with recreation.

THE PROBLEMS of the handicapped are many. Here a child receives special speech and hearing therapy at the Suffolk Center from Mrs. Suzanne Gelber.

NEW BRACES for a handicapped youngster get final adjustments from Dr. Albert Anderson, who donates his time at the Suffolk Center.

JOHN E. "BUDDY" LONG, president of the Nassau-Suffolk Building & Construction Trades Council, is president of the Suffolk Center and coordinated the building projects. Here he looks on as a youngster receives therapy.

No Place for Extremism

THERE HAS been one recent development in the political arena which the AFL-CIO Executive Council cannot allow to pass without comment—the injection of the issue of "extremism" into America's political life.

During and since the Republican convention the impression has been fostered by some that the merits of "extremism" are somehow debatable; that the word itself may even be a synonym for patriotism, or for valor on the field of battle.

This is the most obvious nonsense. In the language of American politics, "extremism," can only mean the radical elements of both the far left and the far right—the Communist Party on the one hand, and such groups as the Ku Klux Klan and the John Birch Society on the other. We reject them all.

Extremism means the destruction of the democratic process, of the orderly course of law, even of the hallowed right of discussion and dissent.

Extremism means the night-rider who shoots down the man whose ideas he fears. Extremism is typified by the howling mob which denies to a speaker his right to be heard. Extremism means the self-righteous citizens who censor textbooks or demand the dismissal of teachers because they disagree with them.

Extremism, in short, is that force which seeks to inhibit or deny the free interchange of ideas, or which seeks to substitute violence for the judicial and legislative process.

Extremism is not Americanism; it is totalitarianism. Extremism is not valor; it is cowardice. Extremism does not serve justices; it promotes anarchy.

As history has made clear in nation after nation, extremism means the death of the labor movement and the death of liberty itself. Extremism has no place in America. Hate groups have no proper role in our political life.

—Statement on "Extremism" adopted by AFL-CIO Executive Council, Aug. 3, 1964.

Civil Rights

THE PRACTICAL realization of the goals set forth in the Civil Rights Act requires more than vigorous enforcement, more than full compliance with the law itself.

It cannot be said too often that for equal rights and equal opportunity to be meaningful, there must be full opportunity as well; full employment, full educational opportunities and all the rest. The right to be hired is empty indeed when there are no jobs to be had; the right to be served in a restaurant or hotel has no meaning for those with no money to spend.

In that sense the fights to create jobs for all, and to abolish poverty in America, are themselves civil rights campaigns, indispensable to the success of the law which bears that title. The AFL-CIO will press for these goals as vigorously as we campaigned for the Civil Rights Act itself.

The AFL-CIO is uncompromisingly opposed to racial discrimination of every sort, in every place and at every time. And we are determined to stamp it out, not only through the full implementation of the law enacted a month ago, but also through the elimination of the economic and social weaknesses which are so largely responsible for it.

—Excerpted from Civil Rights statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council Aug. 4, 1964.

'Step This Way'

FCC Chairman Speaks:

Is Journalistic Broadcasting Tail on TV Entertainment Dog?

The following excerpts are from a speech by Chairman E. William Henry of the Federal Communications Commission in defense of the commission's fairness doctrine for broadcasters. The occasion was the annual National Broadcast Editorial Conference at Columbia University.

THE FAIRNESS doctrine holds that if a broadcast licensee undertakes to present programming dealing with controversial issues of public importance, he must make reasonable efforts to present conflicting points of view on such issues.

A broadcaster who accepts a sponsored program on a controversial issue makes a judgment that his community wants or needs exposure to points of view on that issue. If he can obtain sponsorship for the presentation of opposing views, well and good.

If, for instance, there are two equally appropriate representatives of the opposing side and one of them offers to pay, the broadcaster may select the one with money. But to hold that he can make ability to pay the sole factor governing the public's right to hear opposing views would be to relinquish the fairness principle entirely. It is this reason, I believe, that made the commission's ruling on this question a unanimous one.

In the most basic terms of all, the fairness doctrine holds that a broadcaster who enters the field of controversy isn't perfectly free to propagandize as he sees fit.

Despite the growing number of radio and television stations, the frequency spectrum is a limited natural resource. Despite the growing sophistication of electronic technology, which permits the utilization of higher and higher frequencies, the demand increasingly exceeds the supply.

The FCC is charged by law with the allocation of this resource [radio and TV frequencies] to those who clamor for it with shining eyes and outstretched hands. It is thus the commission, and not the marketplace, which determines how frequencies shall be apportioned between broadcasting, long-distance microwave, communications satellites, police cars, fire trucks, aircraft, ships, industry, amateurs and a host of other useful services. It is the commission, not the marketplace, which determines the maximum number of broadcast outlets any community may have, and the facilities that each may use. The FCC was created for precisely this purpose, and the Communications Act is based on the assumption that government must perform this function.

When government undertakes this kind of responsibility for a mass medium, it cannot avoid responsibility for the manner in which its licensed outlets are used. At a minimum it has an obligation to see to it that those licensees do not themselves suppress free speech. This is the basic reason why Congress has written the fairness doctrine into Sec. 315 of the Communications Act.

In the large view, the burdens imposed by the fairness doctrine are strictly secondary, and can neither deter nor prevent the success of a creative broadcaster who is seriously committed to provocative programming.

THE REAL DIFFICULTY lies with broadcasters who aren't seriously committed to the journalistic function or to the exposure of controversy.

Programming that represents a slight profit or even a loss does not interest them greatly. They carry it as part of a minimal public service effort, but they limit their commitment to the least that will pass muster with their community, with FCC and with their own conscience. They can be tempted into a venture beyond the minimum, but the least additional burden is enough to discourage them. For their primary interest lies elsewhere.

Their polestar is not the Peabody Award, but that idol of the airlanes, the latest Neilsen. If their program director's flirtation with his journalistic flame becomes too serious, the station manager quickly cuts his allowance. If the station manager gets similarly soft, or unduly enamoured of his own creativity, the appropriate corporate officer soon sets him straight. If this officer should by some oversight fail to react to this danger, the directors explain to him the facts of life.

The obvious aim of this process is to keep foremost in everyone's mind one thought: Controversy may sell newspapers, but in this business it's the funny page that counts. Mr. Average Viewer will not consider buying your bread or brand X when an editorial has just made him apoplectic.

Is journalistic broadcasting in America nothing but the tail on an entertainment dog? Is American broadcasting "ultimately bound to the highest-bidder morality of the market place?" And does it show any signs of developing "a sustaining tradition of public service of the kind the best newspaper proprietors still recognize and act upon?"

Morgan Says:

America's Immigration Policy 'A Kind of Snobbish Hypocrisy'

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is exerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

WHAT IS AN AMERICAN? According to one narrow concept the only American who counts is a "Wasp"—a white, Anglo-Saxon Protestant. The fact is, happily, that no definition precisely fits because an American is a blend of so many different breeds and backgrounds.

Morgan

This may be a good time to remind ourselves of our heterogeneous heritage. In an election year especially, politicians find it irresistible to rise above principle and appeal to special groups and factions, to sharpen rather than blunt the divisions in our society when the only thing that can effectively sustain our power, prestige and purpose as a nation is unity—not the monotony of conformity but a respect for differences and recognition that in the honest clash of creeds and cultures lies our pluralistic strength.

It is easier to say these things, however, and pay lip service to them than it is to act upon them. For more than 40 years, for example, the United States' immigration policy has been a kind of snobbish hypocrisy—a compounded hypocrisy with a two-way stretch in fact.

Not only does it imply by its arbitrary quota system that people from one country are automatically more desirable than those from another but Congress has over the years, while refusing to liberalize it, violated the spirit and the letter of the law by passing a host of private immigration bills dealing with special cases.

Just a year ago Pres. Kennedy submitted legislation to correct the faults of the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act. The bill foundered despite Pres. Johnson's endorsement of its reforms in his State of the Union message. The successor to Pennsylvania's late Rep. Walter as chairman of the House Judiciary subcommittee dealing with such matters, Ohio's Michael A. Feighan, showed an almost contemptuous lack of interest in the bill.

Then suddenly in June it appeared on Johnson's list of must legislation. Conceivably, some pragmatic political considerations may have been involved in the upgrading of its importance.

The Administration privately has been worried about reports that citizens of Polish, Hungarian, Italian and other foreign extraction, the so-called "hyphenated Americans," may desert their traditional Democratic Party affiliation and vote for States Rightser Barry Goldwater because of fears the Negro is moving "too far too fast" in his quest for civil rights.

This white backlash might be countered, one theory goes, by catering to these foreign-origin groups with a more liberal immigration policy.

Be that as it may, the recommended reforms can stand on their own merits as Atty. Gen. Robert Kennedy's testimony before Feighan's subcommittee showed.

The current level of immigration allowed is less than 157,000 annually. These immigrants are selected on a quota system based on percentages of national origin reflected by the U.S. population according to the 1920 census.

THE PROPOSED changes would raise the total modestly to 164,500 a year, gradually eliminate the quota system by 1970 and, as the attorney general testified, facilitate the immigration of persons with needed special skills and attainments, reunite thousands of families now needlessly separated, provide for refugees in emergency and end a shamefully discriminatory system without damaging the interests of any person or group.

Robert Kennedy cited a number of examples of the damage and injustices done under the present law:

An American medical school is anxious to get an eminent Turkish physician and scientist to pursue important research on treatment of heart attacks. But the doctor has already waited a year and a half for a visa, must wait months more because the Turkish quota is over-subscribed.

A South African physicist can't accept an offer from an American firm to continue research in the structure of metals for the same reason.

"A Japanese microbiologist, a Greek chemist, an Egyptian urologist, and many others like them," Kennedy emphasized, "all are barred, harassed and discouraged by our immigration law."

Such immigrants are no threat to citizens in the job market either, he argued, because they have skills in which there is now a shortage and furthermore only one immigrant in three, under the new provisions, would enter the labor market, meaning our economy would get three consumers for every worker admitted.

But beyond all these considerations, he concluded, lies "a fundamental question which asks whether we believe, as we say we believe, in the dignity and worth of each individual." A noble argument for a needed bill.

Washington Reports:

Abnormally High Joblessness Seen Source of Racial Unrest

ABNORMALLY HIGH unemployment, idleness, restlessness, bad housing conditions—all these combined "in the long hot summer" to kindle the recent riots in New York City and Rochester, N. Y., Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) spoke of "lack of job opportunity, the lack of adequate shelter, and the lack of adequate education" as the background reasons as he was interviewed on the same program.

Aim of the proposed National Commission on Technology, Automation & Economic Progress is to find the means to eliminate such threatening situations, the senators said, since automation is one of the major causes of unemployment. Joblessness is especially serious among youth—twice the national average—they noted, and is four times the national average among Negro youth.

Clark said that testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Employment put the number of jobless caused by automation at 2 million a year. Javits said the proportion of unskilled in the labor force today, because of automation, is about 20 percent, and the number who will need skills in the next decade may double.

THE PROPOSED commission, approved by the House 259 to 75 and passed by the Senate by voice vote, would determine the effects of automation and recommend what should be done by business, labor and the government on local, state and national levels. It would have 14 members chosen from the business and labor community who would be advised by the heads of government departments most concerned—Commerce, Labor, Atomic Energy, Defense, the Space Agency and others. The commission would report by Jan. 1, 1966, but would be expected to make reports and recommendations at various times before then.

Clark said the nation needs national planning to provide a means of acting before massive unemployment occurs, with special reference to defense industries; a massive program of accelerated public works, additional aid to education, slum clearance and housing.

The commission would be provided with a budget of $1 million to make its investigations and recommendations for action.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

FOR SEVERAL MONTHS an almost impenetrable shield has been held before the Republican presidential nominee, Sen. Goldwater, apparently to protect him from "hip-shooting" and contradictory comments on issues such as marked his campaign in New Hampshire last February and March. Almost no press conferences, a series of "position papers" to which he was to stick on issues, and finally the recent seclusion of the holidaying candidate from all newspapermen's questions that were not written out, submitted, and answered in writing..

A blunder even in the written replies may suggest why Goldwater is anxious for privacy. The senator was asked just before returning to Washington for comment on the Administration's bracero (Mexican farm labor import) program operating under Public Law 78, which expires at the end of this year.

Said the GOP nominee: "Citizens of this state [California] are facing disaster because of government meddling with a program that has worked well for years. Farmers can't get domestic labor to do the work.

"The only answer is to return to the bracero program and for the government to keep its hands off a relationship between employer and employe that has been successful thus far."

This is surely an extraordinary way to talk about a program which is based on specific agreement between the governments of the U.S. and Mexico, which provides specific protections of the Mexican farm workers against exploitation in wages, housing, food, transportation and sanitary conditions by the corporate-farm employers who engage them under contract.

Our government is "meddling"? Before the Korean War program was set up, California and other southwestern corporate-farm employers hired "wetbacks" illegally pouring across our borders and worked them under conditions that undercut the economic position of American farm workers and scandalized investigators of both Mexican and U.S. governments.

There was a temporary wartime shortage of American farm workers, and the bracero agreement was reached by the U.S. and Mexican governments for the precise purpose of making Mexican workers available and still protecting them from exploitation. The corporate-farm employers kicked and screamed but were compelled to accept the terms.

The employer-employe relations of the "wetbacks" were not "successful," and the U.S. and Mexican governments did not improperly "meddle" when they moved to ameliorate abuses. They acted as modern democratic governments are expected to act—to protect the disorganized weak against highly-organized and powerful employers.

If the government cannot cease and desist from a program it originally helped establish, if it cannot now move to protect its own nationals, without being accused of "meddling," the outermost limits of federal action considered appropriate by Sen. Goldwater must be narrow indeed.

IN THE RECENT Republican convention an almost refreshing note of candor was sounded before the Platform Committee by one William O. Cowger, Republican mayor of Louisville, who urged the GOP to go after the big-city vote.

"Within a few weeks after taking office," Cowger said temptingly to the platform-writers, "we had moved into City Hall approximately 2,000 Republican employes to fill all those jobs that were not covered by civil service." He contrasted this glad result with the trivial patronage available from congressional elections—maybe "15" jobs for a senator, about "8" for a House member.

Win the cities, he said, and "almost immediately your financial problems are over." In Louisville, he said, "our finance office is receiving approximately $8,000 each month from voluntary contributions." "Voluntary," the man said.

WITH AUTOMATION causing an annual 2 million job loss, the nation urgently needs the proposed National Commission on Technology, Automation & Economic Progress just approved by Congress, Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), left, and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) both declared on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

Group Health Insurance Plans Cost Less, Offer Best Coverage

By Sidney Margolius

IF YOU BUY health insurance on a group basis with other members of your union, co-op or other organization, you not only usually pay less but are likely to get more complete coverage than in buying by yourself.

Nonprofit organizations almost invariably give more complete coverage than commercial policies sold on an individual contract basis.

These are among the most significant lessons to be gleaned from a rating of 100 policies recently completed by the New York State Joint Legislative Committee on Health Insurance Plans.

This is the first attempt by a state or national agency to cut through some of the confusion involved in buying health insurance. Dr. Leroy K. Young of the Cornell University Institute of Hospital Administration, who made the analysis, reports that nearly 200 organizations—both nonprofit and commercial—sell such policies. Many offer several versions. Thus, a family buying health insurance by itself must try to find its way through a forest of perhaps a thousand different policies.

This variation is regarded as "healthy and resulting from free experimentation," Young said. But for the public the effect is "a state of confusion" that makes it almost impossible for the average family to figure out which of all these policies with their many variations in benefits and cost would be most suitable.

As a general rule, Young commented, "participants in group insurance are offered contracts superior in many respects to those they could obtain on a non-group basis" because group contracts are negotiated by "knowledgeable persons."

For families which do buy health insurance on their own, the study offers yardsticks in what to look for in comparing policies, and tips on what types of insurers might offer best value. While the study was done in New York, most of the conclusions are applicable in other parts of the country,

In hospital insurance, the various Blue Cross plans included in the ratings proved to provide the most complete coverage. For purposes of convenient if crude comparison, we have taken the liberty of converting Young's ratings into a point system. The Blue Cross plans usually scored 5 to 7 points in completeness of coverage; typically, 6. In comparison, the individual hospital-expense policies sold by commercial companies usually scored 3 to 6 points.

HOWEVER, certain cautions must be observed. Not all policies were surveyed and other companies may have even more complete policies. Too, because a company has a relatively complete policy does not mean that its others are as complete.

In doctor-bill insurance, the two highest rated plans, with 7 to 8 points, proved to be two nonprofit organizations widely used by trade unions in the New York area—Group Health Insurance, Inc., and Health Insurance Plan.

In the Group Health system, subscribers select their own doctor from among those participating, and the doctors follow an agreed upon schedule of fees. HIP has its own panels of doctors and medical centers which provide all needed medical care. A number of other communities in other parts of the country and individual labor unions have similar group-care plans of their own.

Next in completeness were the Blue Shield plans surveyed, with most scoring 5 points and several 6.

The commercial companies usually scored 4 and 5 points in this category, with one plan scoring 6—the Insurance Co. of North America guaranteed renewable accident and sickness policy with lifetime renewable surgical expense.

In combined hospital and doctor-bill coverage, a combination of Blue Cross and Blue Shield usually scored highest, with 7 to 9 points for various plans. The commercial company plans usually scored from 5 to 8 points, and one, 9.

The four broad categories on which Young rated the policies can provide a useful guide if you are unable to buy on a group basis: He examined the policies on the basis of:

- Hospital expense benefits.
- Professional expense benefits.
- Exclusions and restrictions.
- Miscellaneous benefits and provisions.

From Soup to Nonsense:

If She Looks Like Someone Else Don't Bother to Tell Her About It

By Jane Goodsell

DO I REMIND YOU of somebody you used to know back in Sioux City? Am I the spitting image of your child's piano teacher? Do I resemble your brother-in-law's second cousin?

If so, please don't tell me about it. Just keep this information to yourself. I don't know what to do with it.

How am I supposed to react to the news that I'm the spitting image of somebody whom I've never laid eyes on? It beats me. Now, if people would tell me that I look like Audrey Hepburn or Suzy Parker . . . but they don't.

A few weeks ago I was introduced to a lady who drowned out my how-do-you-do by gasping: "Why, for heaven's sake! You look exactly like a friend of mine in Winnetka, Kan.!"

"Oh?" I said. "Really?"

"Yes," said the lady. "Her name is Elvira Thompson."

"Ummmmm," I said. "Well, uh. . . ."

"Thompson is her married name," the lady continued. "Her maiden name was Wintermute. You don't happen to know her, do you? She's just about your age, I'd say."

"No," I said testily, wondering just what age she thought "my" age was. I had the depressing feeling that Elvira was drawing Social Security.

"She's a lovely person," said the lady. "Very artistic."

"That's nice," I said. I was beginning to hate Elvira.

"She paints china," said the lady, "and she writes poetry. You don't happen to. . . ."

"No," I said. "I don't."

THE LADY LOOKED disappointed. "Well, I'm sure you must have other talents," she said encouragingly. "Oh, there's my husband. I want him to meet you!"

She beckoned to a small, sandy-haired man. "Look, Leonard," she said, pointing to me. "Doesn't she look exactly like Elvira Thompson?"

Leonard examined me gravely. "Yes," he nodded. "I see what you mean. She certainly does."

They both stood there, looking at me and nodding.

"Elvira's one of our favorite people," said the lady. "Isn't she, Leonard?"

"She certainly is!" Leonard beamed. "She's the salt of the earth. And next time we see her, we'll be sure to tell her about you."

"Don't forget," I said, thinking to myself that it would serve Elvira right.

The last person in the world I want to look like is somebody who looks like me. And I'll bet Elvira feels exactly the same way.

FRB Report Shows:

Stable Labor Costs Highlight Economy

ONE OF THE STRIKING features of the present economic expansion in the United States has been the stability of labor costs, due to a combination of high productivity and "the moderate nature of wage increases."

This conclusion was reached by the Federal Reserve Bank in a report on employment and the state of the economy.

"An important aspect of the current economic expansion," the report said, "has been the stability of labor costs per unit of output in manufacturing. Contributing to this stability has been the moderate nature of wage increases attributable in part to ample supplies of manpower, and the sustained high rate of advance in output per man-hour as producers have installed more efficient equipment and have improved methods of production to meet competition and minimize costs. For the total private economy, too, gains in output per manhour have been relatively large in recent years."

The report said that preliminary information "suggests that in the first five months of this year output per manhour for all employes in manufacturing was about 4 percent more than a year earlier.

"This was about the same as the increase for the year 1963," it said. "Since the cyclical high in early 1960, the rise in output per manhour in manufacturing has been above the postwar average."

THE MAINTENANCE of a high rate of productivity gain for more than three years after a lower cyclical turning point "is unusual," the report continued.

"In previous expansions output per man-hour increased sharply in the early period of recovery, as output rose rapidly," it went on. "But as the expansion progressed, productivity gains tended to slacken for a variety of reasons, including slowdown in growth of demands and output and, at times, capacity limitations. As yet, in this expansion, there has been no evidence of a slowing down in productivity growth in manufacturing."

The report noted that during the past year, hourly earnings in manufacturing rose a little more than 3 percent and was close to the annual increase since 1960.

"Since December 1963, the increase in hourly earnings has amounted to only 2 cents, about the same as during the corresponding months of last year," the report stated.

World Cooperation Urged:

Stage Union Warned Of Telstar's Impact

Louisville, Ky.—Development of the Telstar satellite has underscored a growing need for international cooperation between entertainment workers, Pres. Richard F. Walsh of the Theatrical Stage Employes told the union's biennial convention here.

"Already on a few occasions," he declared in his report to the 1,100 delegates, "Americans have been first nighters, without leaving home, at shows in remote parts of the world. The Telstar development comes at a time when big new strides are being made in closed-circuit television for theatres. Tying in with this advance is the introduction of new processes for recording and transmitting entire stage productions."

Walsh, a member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, is president of the Inter-American Federation of Entertainment Workers.

The convention came out strongly in favor of repeal of the federal excise tax on motion picture theatre admissions above $1. It also urged labeling of imported films with the countries of their origin and relief from an anti-trust consent decree which prohibits the major theatre circuits from acquiring new houses without special court permission.

A resolution unalterably opposing the election of Sen. Barry Goldwater as President was referred to the IATSE general office for implementation in conjunction with the AFL-CIO.

Speakers at the convention included AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler; Alexander Barkan, national director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education; Under Sec. of Labor John Henning; Pres. Herman Kenin, of the Musicians, and Exec. Sec. Donald Conway of the Television & Radio Artists.

Walsh Reelected

The delegates unanimously reelected Walsh, Sec.-Treas. Harland Holmden and eight of nine vice presidents. Intl. Rep. Hugh J. Sedgwick of Hamilton, Ont., was elected Canadian vice president following his nomination by a caucus of the delegates from that country. He succeeds A. L. Pat Travers of Toronto. The convention defeated a move to place all vice presidencies on a regional basis.

Also defeated, after prolonged debate, was an effort by a number of Hollywood locals to invalidate a new agreement, signed by the international, covering the handling of video tape production.

Prior to the vote, Walsh explained that some of the terms of the present Hollywood Studio Basic Agreement, to which the international is a party, have made it impractical for members of the Association of Motion Picture Producers to enter the magnetic tape field. He predicted that the new agreement would lead to expanded employment in West Coast studios.

Keenan Hails Ties Between Irish and U.S.

Belfast, Northern Ireland—The ties between Ireland and the United States, particularly the American labor movement, were hailed by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan at a convention of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions.

Keenan, secretary of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, was the first AFL-CIO fraternal delegate to a convention of the Irish labor group.

"The history of the American labor movement," he said, "is linked strongly and unmistakeably with the Irish, who came to our shores a century ago."

He gave credit for much of labor's progress in the U.S. to pioneers who were Irish, and pointed out that despite great advances important problems remain, such as unemployment, the adverse effects of automation, and substandard wages for millions of workers.

"Unions are fighting the bad results of automation and the rising tide of unemployment with all their strength," he said. "They are pushing for job security clauses in their union contracts and for a shorter workweek.

"Unions are fighting the problem of too-low wages, poor housing, slum conditions, inadequate medical care, insufficient schools and teachers . . . I can tell you it is tough going all the way."

CLC Editor Gets New Assignments

Ottawa, Ont.—Clifford A. Scotton, editor of Canadian Labor, official publication of the Canadian Labor Congress, has been given liaison duties between the CLC and its provincial and local central bodies, and named secretary-treasurer of the Union Label Dept.

In making the appointments CLC Pres. Claude Jodoin said Scotton will assume most of the duties of Thomas B. Ward, who has been named a member of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Scotton, a member of the CLC staff since 1959, has been editor of Canadian Labor since 1961.

Glass Workers Shape Broad New Program

Miami Beach—New goals in organizing, collective bargaining and political education were set here at the 16th convention of the Glass & Ceramic Workers.

Reporting success since the 1962 convention in contract provisions to strengthen job security in the face of increasing automation, delegates from the UGCW's 160 local unions adopted an action program for the two years just ahead.

Major points of the program call for:

- Local participation "with renewed faith and enthusiasm" in COPE efforts to keep members registered, improve registration facilities and get every worker and his family to vote on election day.
- The use of all available funds and manpower to bring unionism to unorganized workers in the glass and ceramics industry.
- Linking the drive for new members and strengthened contracts to the campaign to elect candidates devoted to the welfare of the entire community.
- Setting the 30-hour week, at no reduction in pay, as a key bargaining goal as well as a legislative goal in Congress.

The Congress also voted to intensify existing programs of education in unionism; urged the AFL-CIO and the Canadian Labor Congress to establish training programs for organizers; and directed the union and its locals to contribute to the John F. Kennedy Memorial Library in appreciation of the work of the late President.

In another action, the convention called on officers to continue exploring merger possibilities with other unions. It also directed locals to set up safety committees in every plant and to negotiate contract language formalizing their functions.

United Front Formed

Pres. Ralph Reiser and Sec.-Treas. Lewis McCracken reported that the union and six others had formed the Stone, Glass & Clay Coordinating Committee to "help arrive at common solutions to mutual problems." The committee has retained a consultant and presented recommendations on tariffs and trade to the President's Trade Information Committee, the U.S. Tariff Commission and Congress, the officers reported.

Other unions involved are the Flint Glass Workers, Glass Bottle Blowers, Window Glass Cutters, Operative Potters, Cement Workers and Stone Workers.

The convention marked the tenth anniversary of the affiliation of Canadian Dist. 6, saluted as the union's fastest growing district. In both countries, the officers reported, the union is being "squeezed between an increase" in jobseekers and a decrease in the number of jobs.

3 Unions Ask Congress To Kill Nuisance Taxes

Unions have asked the House Ways & Means Committee to recommend the repeal of three so-called "nuisance" taxes on the ground that they yield but little revenue which would probably be exceeded by increased income tax returns if they were rescinded.

In addition, employment would be safeguarded and most likely increased, the committee was told by spokesmen for the Furniture Workers, Stage Employes and Musicians.

Sec.-Treas. Fred Fulford of the UFWA declared repeal of the 10 percent excise tax on musical instruments would mean "enlarged job security" by increasing sales. The impost, he said, "frequently is the straw that breaks the consumer's back and turns a family-inspired purchaser into a customer who says 'no'."

The tax accounted for only $20 million in 1963, he said, "a small fraction of 1 percent of the total excise tax yield" which "argues for its repeal." A byproduct of recission, Fulford added, would be a spur to "cultural achievement and enjoyment of the musical arts."

Intl. Rep. Lester B. Isaac of IATSE asked repeal of the 10 percent tax on movie theater admissions above $1, declaring that it hurts business and "in so doing it hurts our people—the people who depend on the theater for their livelihood."

There are no official statistics on federal revenue from the tax, Isaac noted, but he cited a study by an accounting firm a year ago which indicated it was not more than $5 million, and perhaps as low as $3 million. Employment in the industry has dropped over the past few years, he said, adding that the tax yield "is an insignificant sum when balanced against not only the projected loss in income taxes by unemployed workers but also against the misery and economic loss that comes in the wake of unemployment."

It wouldn't cost the nation a penny if the 10 percent "cabaret" tax left over from World War I were repealed, Pres. A. W. Zelomek of the Intl. Statistical Bureau of New York testified on behalf of the Musicians.

When the tax on food and beverages in places offering "live" entertainment was halved in 1960, he said on the basis of two nationwide surveys, manhour employment of musicians jumped 34.2 percent. Gains in business revenues and musicians' income taxes alone, he said, yielded more than enough other revenue to offset the 22 percent decline in "cabaret" tax collections. Total elimination of the tax, he maintained, would result in no net revenue loss to the Treasury.

Average Pay Up In Building Trades

Wage scales of union building trades workers rose an average of 11 cents an hour, or 2.7 percent in 1964's second quarter, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics has reported. The rise was 9.1 cents or 2.3 percent in the corresponding quarter of 1963, the bureau said.

The survey is made quarterly for seven major trades in 100 U.S. cities. The increases raised the estimated average scale for all tradesmen to $4.25 an hour as of July 1. Plumbers recorded the greatest gain, an average of 14 cents; next were bricklayers, 12.3 cents, and carpenters, 12 cents.

BLS said the figures reflect the results of spring bargaining, as well as deferred increases under continuing contracts.

AFTE Votes Organizing Assessment

Seattle—The Technical Engineers approved an assessment of $1 a member to help finance an organizing campaign as the union concluded its convention here.

The 100 delegates, representing 15,000 members in Canada and the United States, re-elected veteran Pres. Russell M. Stephens who earlier had reported on plans he said could quadruple membership.

Albert G. Ross, secretary-treasurer; Henry Nelson, western-area vice president, and Ben Smook, Canadian vice president, also were re-elected.

Four new vice presidents were chosen: Ralph Anderson, Chicago; Albert Resolute, Portsmouth, Va.; Rodney Bower, Philadelphia, and William Evans, New York.

Stephens reported the federation had received merger suggestions from other groups. The convention registered strong opposition to any such proposal.

Delegates adopted about 70 resolutions, most of which dealt with legislation to benefit workers. The next convention was scheduled for Chicago in 1966.

Celler Reports Assurance on Shipyard Jobs

Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) has reported receiving "categorical assurance from the White House" that there will be no further personnel layoffs at U.S. naval shipyards pending a study of shipyard operations by the Defense Dept.

Hailed by Gritta

The announcement by Celler, head of a congressional working committee on naval shipyards, was hailed by Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. as a direct result of organized efforts by the congressional group, the department and shipyard metal trades councils.

The committee went into action at a meeting last month with metal trades representatives who discussed the threatened closing of several yards and the harmful impact this would have on the Navy's $4 billion shipyard complex employing 88,000 skilled civilian craftsmen and engineers.

The committee, with Celler as chairman, will continue to serve as a watchdog group, he said.

Mediation Urged In Rockford Strike

Chicago—Strong support for the Sheet Metal Workers' strike at the Barber-Colman Co., Rockford, Ill., was expressed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, which called on the company "to accept the good faith offer of the union for a committee to mediate the issues."

The union won bargaining rights in February 1963 and after months of fruitless negotiations signed an eight-month interim agreement. During that time the firm tried to destroy the union and succeeded in forcing a decertification election which the Sheet Metal Workers won. The best management has since offered at the bargaining table was described by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as "an insult."

The walkout started June 5. In urging united labor support for the 2,500 strikers, Meany earlier called on Rockford civic leaders to speak out against the company's tactics lest the city's prestige be "irrevocably damaged."

Further Boost Seen:

CPI Hits New Peak As Food Prices Rise

The Consumer Price Index rose by two-tenths of 1 percent to a new high in June, the Labor Dept. has reported.

Seasonally higher prices for food, especially for fresh fruits and vegetables, were mainly responsible for the increase, the department said. The same factor probably will show up in a further boost for July, it added.

The June CPI stood at 108, up by 1.3 percent from June a year ago. This means the market basket of goods and services which cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period now costs $10.80.

In a companion report, the Labor Dept. said both the take-home pay and the purchasing power of factory production workers rose to new records in June due to an increased workweek.

The take-home pay—gross pay reduced by social security and federal income tax deductions—stood at $92.60 for the factory worker with three dependents and $84.80 for the worker without dependents, the report said.

Both totals were about 40 cents higher than the May record. The increases were traced to a rise of 12 minutes in the workweek to a postwar June record of 40.9 hours. Average hourly earnings were unchanged at $2.53 per hour.

'Real' Earnings Up

Purchasing power or "real" spendable earnings, the take-home pay deflated by the increase in the CPI, stood at $85.74 for the worker with three dependents, 23 cents higher than in May. It was $78.52 for the worker without dependents.

The jump in the CPI between May and June, the largest since a similar rise last December, was expected because prices of fruits and vegetables usually go up this time of year and push up the index in turn.

The food group advanced by 0.7 percent, the report noted. The prices of fresh fruits and vegetables rose by 7.1 percent, it added mainly due to a 21 percent rise in potato prices because of short supplies of old-crop potatoes and bad weather delaying spring and summer crops. Cool weather in the West and drought in the East were blamed for retarding the development of a wide variety of vegetables and so causing higher prices for available supplies.

In other items, housing costs rose by two-tenths of 1 percent, mainly due to higher home ownership costs and slightly higher rents, while fuel prices dropped seasonally. Transportation costs rose one-tenth of 1 percent, with used car prices going up seasonally and new car prices declining slightly. Prices of apparel and health care and recreation were unchanged.

As far as trends go, about 60 percent of the rise in the CPI over the past half-dozen years was accounted for by higher prices for services, according to Arnold Chase, Labor Dept. price expert. And aside from seasonal factors, he observed, food prices are in a "basic" upward movement due to higher labor and other costs of processors and distributors. He said low meat prices are offsetting much higher prices for some food items.

The June CPI will bring a 1-cent an hour pay hike to 55,000 workers, mostly in aircraft manufacturing and interstate bus service, on a quarterly adjustment of their escalation contract clause. Another 1,800 transit workers in Baltimore will get 1 cent.

3-Man Panel Named In Longshore Dispute

Pres. Johnson has assigned the same three-man board of arbitration which helped settle an East-Gulf Coast strike of dockworkers in 1962-63 to mediate a dispute between the Longshoremen and employer members of the New York Shipping Association over new contract terms.

When contract negotiations remained deadlocked after nearly a month of meetings, the union and employers requested that the panel named by former Pres. Kennedy be reconvened, and Johnson concurred.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz called the request "in the public interest" and said it betokens an earnest effort by the parties to settle their differences amicably before the contract expiration date, Sept. 30.

The board, which prepared to schedule new negotiating meetings, is headed by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) and includes Theodore W. Kheel, New York City arbiter, and Prof. James J. Healy of the Harvard Graduate School of Business.

Wirtz also, at the suggestion of the parties, assigned David Stowe, director of the Labor Dept.'s longshore study project, to assist the board. He named Herbert Schmertz, former assistant to Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, to serve as board executive secretary.

The final agreement in the longshore strike two years ago contained a proviso that if the parties were unable to agree on carrying out recommendations of the Labor Dept. after a manpower study in all ports, the points at issue would be referred to a neutral board for settlement recommendations.

Wirtz said the board will "study the disagreement over the manpower and job security issues" and make recommendations which will "in accordance with the present contract, be consistent with the interests of the parties and the findings" of the study group.

Reports have been issued to date on the ports of New York, New Orleans and Baltimore, and others are in process. With some variations, the study group recommended that the parties meet at the bargaining table to plan solutions for problems of manpower utilization and job security.

Each side must understand the other's problems and work out fair solutions, the group declared. In each case it saw stabilization of the work force as a compelling need and said the union alone could not be expected to bear the entire burden of protecting workers from layoffs.

The negotiations bogged down over ways of achieving stabilization.

4.5% Package Pattern Set In Oil Industry

Denver—The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers have reached contract agreements with nearly all major oil firms on the basis of a benefit package of about 4.5 percent, the union has reported.

Vice Pres. E. D. Swisher said most settlements provide a 2 percent general wage increase, an additional week's annual vacation for nearly all workers, and fringe benefit improvements.

Early this year the OCAW launched an industrywide drive aimed at winning the equivalent of a 5 percent increase in benefits. The first settlement, at Sinclair Oil on July 11, concentrated on earlier retirement but others since then have included some wage hikes.

Swisher said the union's national bargaining policy committee has approved an agreement with Texaco, Inc., at Port Arthur, Tex. Similar settlements then were reached with Gulf, Continental, Atlantic, Skelly, Union Oil, Pure Oil, Mobil, Standard Oil of Ohio, Shell, Marathon, American, Richfield, Pennzoil, Quaker State and other firms at key locations.

Under the new vacation formula in these pacts, workers with one to five years of company service will continue to get two weeks, with three weeks agreed to after five years of service, four weeks after 10 and five weeks for those with 20 years' service or more.

Installers Win 11.5c Average In CWA Pact

The Communications Workers have announced an agreement with the Western Electric Co. under which wage increases averaging 11.5 cents an hour will go to 15,000 workers employed in 46 states by the firm, a manufacturing subsidiary of the Bell Telephone System.

The settlement was reached in a wage reopener provided for in a contract expiring in July 1966. Patrick J. Morgan, CWA Western Electric installation director, said the agreement, subject to approval by a mail referendum of the members, has these highlights:

- A general increase in the base rate of 6 to 14 cents an hour for installers, $2.25 a week to $3.50 for clerks. The overall average is 10 cents an hour, but hikes in base reclassifications and wage structure changes will raise the average to 11.5 cents an hour with the equivalent of another 3 cents going for such fringe items as pensions and workmen's compensation, according to CWA.
- A raise of 50 cents in the per diem expense allowance, bringing the total to $9 on intermediate and $11 on longhaul transfers.
- Job clerks were reclassified in Minneapolis, St. Paul, St. Louis, Omaha, Cleveland and Washington. Bases were reclassified for installers in New York, Atlantic City, Baltimore, Camden, Trenton, Albany, Buffalo, Poughkeepsie, Rochester, Syracuse, Utica, Binghamton, Asbury Park, Houston, Kansas City, Mo., Cincinnati, Gary, Ind., St. Louis, and Beaumont, Tex.

Extra holidays—including Lincoln's Birthday in Illinois, Veterans' Day in Denver and Columbus Day in Connecticut—were won along with new bases at Lansing, Mich., and Bismarck, N. D.

UAW Urges 'Progress' In Big 3 Negotiations

Detroit—Negotiations on new contracts covering 575,000 automobile workers entered a critical stage as the UAW served contract cancellation notices on General Motors, Ford and Chrysler managements and called on its locals to conduct strike authorization votes.

Union sources said both moves are precautionary and not indicative of a stalemate in negotiations which got under way June 30. But the union has warned the three managements that more progress must be made if settlements are to be reached by the Aug. 30 expiration date.

Most UAW local will start taking strike authorization votes Aug. 17. Such votes generally permit top officers to call a strike against one or more firms if an agreement is not reached.

In a 30-day cancellation notice to GM, UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock said he hopes the parties can "achieve a mutually satisfactory agreement" by Aug. 30 and said the UAW will "exert every effort to attain this desirable goal" in the time remaining.

Contract objectives set by the UAW convention last March include higher wages; a shorter workweek; additional paid holidays and longer vacations; full-paid life, sickness and accident insurance; better pensions with earlier retirement; improved benefits for retired workers; guaranteed rest periods for assembly-line workers; more equitable production standards; and observance of contract commitments by local managements.

Recently the auto industry's Big 3 reported record-breaking profits for the first half of 1964—$1.1 billion for GM, $324 million for Ford, $114 million for Chrysler. Last to report was American Motors, which said it earned nearly $26 million in nine months, down $8 million from the year-ago figure. Contract negotiations at AMC have been deferred until late August.

Meanwhile the union began contract talks with three farm implement firms whose contracts run out Oct. 1.

Labor Reporter Woods Dies at 53

Edward F. Woods of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch Washington Bureau, a widely respected reporter of labor issues and union affairs, died July 31 after a brief illness. He was 53.

Woods, a close friend of former Pres. Truman, wrote extensively on automation, chronic unemployment and national policies and covered many national union and AFL-CIO conventions. He also was considered a ranking reporter of Supreme Court decisions.

Born in Kansas City, he worked on newspapers there until World War II, when he joined the Navy and saw service in both the Atlantic and Pacific. He went to the Post-Dispatch in 1948.

He is survived by his wife, Caroline D. Woods, and a son, Edward L. Burial was in Arlington National Cemetery.

Brown, Connally:

2 Governors Will Nominate Johnson

By Willard Shelton

Gov. Edmund G. Brown of California and Gov. John B. Connally of Texas will make twin speeches placing Pres. Johnson's name in nomination at the Democratic National Convention beginning Aug. 24 in Atlantic City, National Committee Chairman John Bailey announced.

As Platform Committee hearings scheduled to open in Washington Aug. 17 neared, Democratic sources also let it be known that the President favored a specific platform plank condemning political extremists of both the left and right.

Efforts of Republican moderates to obtain such a plank were rebuffed by Goldwater forces at the recent GOP National Convention—although Vice Presidential Nominee William E. Miller three weeks later individually denounced Ku Klux Klan principles. KKK leaders in Alabama and Georgia had already announced support of the Goldwater-Miller ticket.

Pres. Johnson has as yet made no disclosure of his recommendation to the Democratic convention on a vice presidential running-mate. In a formal White House statement, however, he stated that the convention choice should be capable of succeeding to the White House and should be a progressive acceptable in all sections and compassionate toward human problems.

In addition, the President ruled out four cabinet members and two others who meet regularly with the cabinet. Those eliminated include Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy and Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara, who have been frequently mentioned as potential choices, as well as Sec. of State Dean Rusk, Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman, United Nations Ambassador Adlai E. Stevenson and Peace Corps Dir. Sargent Shriver.

As the Democrats moved toward their convention period, Republican Presidential Nominee Goldwater broadened the scope of the GOP "summit" conference set for Hershey, Pa., Aug. 12 to improve party unity.

Having already invited all 16 GOP incumbent governors, Goldwater also sent invitations to 14 Republican candidates who are seeking to oust Democrats from control of statehouses ranging from the Southwest to the Deep South, the Midwest and New England.

Goldwater's personal choice as new Republican National Committee Chairman, Dean Burch of Arizona, said in a television interview that talk of party splits is over-stressed and added that some previously anti-Goldwater Republicans are "taking a second look" at the candidate.

Some evidence emerged to support this viewpoint, including announcement from GOP Sen. Glenn Beall (Md.), up for re-election this year, that he would support the nominee, and from Rep. Charles McC. Mathias (Md.) that he would back the ticket at "all levels."

Lindsay Differs

On the other hand, GOP Rep. John V. Lindsay (N. Y.) announced he would run on his record independently of Goldwater's candidacy, pointing out that New York's Conservative Party made up of many Goldwater supporters was already actively seeking to defeat him

Mathias, although issuing his "all levels" statement, refused to endorse Goldwater by name, and New York's two Republican U.S. senators, Jacob K. Javits and Kenneth Keating, have declined to modify publicly their intention of campaigning on their own principles.

Keating, up for re-election this year, has not yet announced whether he will run. A prospect of Conservative Party opposition arose when Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce, a Goldwater advocate at the recent convention, announced she was considering making a race against Keating.

Rockefeller Position

New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller has said he will attend the Hershey "summit" meeting, but has not modified his assault on Goldwater's "extremism" statement in his speech accepting the presidential nomination.

California's Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel in a letter to a California newspaper said he was "simply appalled" by events at the Republican convention, which he termed a "tragedy" arising from Goldwater's narrow victory over Rockefeller in the state's June 2 presidential preference primary.

Charging that some other GOP national leaders had attempted to "finesse" the California primary for "selfish reasons" — presumably a hope to advance their own nomination chances—Kuchel said the convention had "turned its back on many of the fine, decent things" the Republican Party "has stood for since the days of Lincoln."

In a California Central Committee meeting, Goldwater partisans were beaten back in an effort to take over the party machinery. A Goldwater supporter, Vernon J. Christina, was beaten for the key post of vice chairman by James W. Halley, who had the backing of most GOP members of Congress and the state legislature.

IBEW Presses Wyoming Test Of 'Work' Law

Wyoming's "right to work" law will get a "clean cut test" as a result of a state court ruling, Pres. Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has declared.

Judge Franklin D. Sheldon of the 1st Judicial Circuit, Cheyenne, refused to find the law constitutional after a year of litigation and certified the case to the Wyoming Supreme Court for rulings on three constitutional points.

The IBEW filed a test suit on behalf of its local unions in Cheyenne, Casper and Laramie, and was joined in the action by three chapters of the National Electrical Contractors Association.

The suit says the R-T-W law is in conflict with the U.S. constitution, the Taft-Hartley Act and the Wyoming constitution and declares that Wyoming unions and employers will be liable to criminal prosecution for observing contract terms unless R-T-W is outlawed.

The IBEW contended in its suit that the state law, by prohibiting a union from representing employes who have not authorized it to act as collective bargaining agent, conflicts directly with the National Labor Relations Act giving exclusive bargaining rights to the majority representative.

The union also told the court that the prohibition in the Wyoming R-T-W Act against exclusive referral systems is in direct conflict with the law and court decisions upholding referral systems like the one used in the electrical industry.

REGISTER AND VOTE DRIVES of the AFL-CIO and other organizations are being aided by the Post Office Dept. through new 5-cent stamp urging citizens to vote. Present for stamp's unveiling were (from left) Pres. E. C. Hallbeck of the Postal Clerks; Dir. Al Barkan of COPE; Postmaster Gen. John A. Gronouski; Roy Reuther, director of the AFL-CIO register and vote drive, and Pres. Jerome J. Keating of the Letter Carriers.

Labor Backs Administration Move To End Immigration Quota System

Strong labor support for the Administration's immigration bill, which would abolish the national origins quota system in force since 1924, was voiced with two reservations by AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Kenneth A. Meiklejohn in testimony before the Senate Immigration & Nationality subcommittee.

"Racial and ethnic bigotry can no more be justified from the standpoint of justice and morality in our treatment of those who seek to come to our shores than it can in the treatment of our own citizens," he said.

"We urge you to act speedily and favorably on this long-overdue and necessary legislation."

Overseas, Meiklejohn said, Americans are not thought of as the "warm-hearted, hospitable people" we know we are—largely because the quota system "conveys abroad an impression of ethnic meanness and racial bigotry."

"We are a people, too, who place a high value on principle and integrity of purpose," he added, "but there can be no integrity in the advocacy of high principle and the practice of low prejudice."

Labor maintains the quota system is "malign," he said, because it is " 'based on the unfounded myth that people from northern Europe are desirable citizens for America and that all other people are undesirable," as the resolution adopted at the last AFL-CIO convention asserted.

"We support the abolition of this system," Meiklejohn declared. "We have been enriched by the mixture of diverse peoples who have come to our shores since 1492. The effect is visible in the technological, social and cultural developments which have been the hallmarks of our rich heritage.

One Valid Question

"If we desire continued growth and progress we cannot ask those who wish to forge new and useful lives on our shores 'whence do you come?'; but the only valid question to be asked them is: 'Can you and will you freely accept the responsibilities that go with the rights and privileges which will be yours as citizens?'

"We must give up the fears and prejudices embodied in our quota system. We must be confident in our strengths, and proud to be chosen as a land in which new and better lives can be earned."

Meiklejohn asked the subcommittee to increase to 250,000 the total number of immigrants to be admitted each year from the 165,000 proposed in the bill—only 7,000 more than under present law.

He also urged that the proviso for preferential treatment to qualified immigrants capable of filling labor shortages be tightened by requiring that the jobs to be filled must be permanent, and that the determination of the existence of a skill shortage be made by the Secretary of Labor.

In supporting his requests for the limited revisions, Meiklejohn recalled that AFL-CIO convention and Executive Council resolutions and policy statements for the past seven years have proposed the admission of 250,000 immigrants.

306,000 Admitted

Last year, he recalled, 306,000 immigrants were admitted, nearly two-thirds as non-quota immigrants or under private legislation. This total, he maintained, "is evidence that we can absorb many more than the present 158,000 quota immigrants."

On filling skill shortages, Meiklejohn asserted that the manpower needs to be filled under such a preference "must be definite and not capable of being filled by unemployed members of our own work force." To admit workers to meet seasonal needs under the labor shortage clause, he said, "would magnify injustice and would create other social and economic problems."

The Secretary of Labor should decide upon the existence of a skill shortage, the AFL-CIO spokesman said, because he "has the data and the expertise on which to base sound decisions."

He recalled strong support for lowering immigration hurdles by Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson, and by both major political parties in their platforms. Though action has been "clearly called for," he added, it "has not been forthcoming."

"We are very glad," he said, "to see that the President's proposals are receiving active consideration by Congress. We are encouraged to hope that action, too, may be taken on these proposals at this session of Congress."

Maritime Dept. Assails GOP Labor Platform

Chicago—The Republican National Convention in San Francisco adopted a platform "which goes out of its way to be obnoxious to the trade union movement," the executive board of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. declared here.

Without using the name of Sen. Barry Goldwater, the MTD board also charged that the convention had "nominated a presidential candidate whose record has been 100 percent hostile to the policies and programs" of the labor movement.

Noting that the Democratic platform will not be adopted until later this month and saying that labor "has not always been in accord" with Pres. Johnson's position, the maritime trades board said it felt "there is no point in waiting to announce its choice."

The board expressed a belief that progressive elements of the Republican Party, and "even the moderate" elements, would not support the Republican nominee, and declared, "Neither can we."

"We repudiate his extremism, his jingoism, his coldness and his whole antediluvian attitude," it added.

In addition to stating its position on the coming presidential election, the MTD board warned that the "significant decline" of U.S. flag vessels had raised questions as to the "adequacy and defense capability" of the country's merchant fleet and urged a five-point program for restoring the country's maritime strength. These included:

- Construction-differential subsidies for operators of coastwise, inter-coastal and Great Lakes vessels as well as deep-sea ships.
- The construction of bulk carriers to provide the type of vessels "best suited to carry out our projected foreign trade."
- Full compliance by government agencies with existing cargo preference laws to insure "maximum participation" by American-flag ships in carrying "government-sponsored cargoes."
- Enactment of legislation to remove "tax havens" for U.S. ship operators who register their vessels under foreign flags "so as to avoid the payment" of U.S. taxes.
- Executive action by the government to require use of U.S.-flag tankers to carry "at least 25 percent" of oil brought into the country under import quotas.

House Heads for Showdown On Anti-Poverty Program

The House headed toward a showdown on Pres. Johnson's anti-poverty program with Democratic leaders fighting for every potential vote.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, meeting in Chicago, sent telegrams to all House members of both parties urging support of the bill, cleared July 28 by the Rules Committee by the thinnest possible 8-7 margin.

The measure is "of crucial importance," the council told House members, to "the 20 percent of the American people" living in poverty.

Decisive votes were expected on the floor Aug. 7, just after this issue of the AFL-CIO News went to press. The Senate passed a parallel bill July 23.

In a strong show of bipartisan unity, congressional leaders pledged swift action on a resolution approving Pres. Johnson's actions in building up U.S. strength in the southeast Asia area and in ordering a counter-attack on North Vietnamese warships, and their bases, involved in torpedo attacks on U.S. Navy ships in the Gulf of Tonkin.

Congress at the same time stepped up a pre-adjournment rush of activity on a wide range of measures and the Administration drove for major victories on other bills slated for election year decision.

Key Actions Taken

In rapid succession these key actions were taken:

- Both houses approved, and sent to the White House for Pres. Johnson's signature, a pay raise bill for 1.8 million federal employes, including classified (civil service) and postal employes.

Increases will average 3 percent for civil service employes in the middle grades and annual step-ups are provided for postal workers. In a direct bid to attract and hold executives of proved ability, salary increases to $35,000 are given cabinet officers and increases to a range of $26,000-$30,000 to four other grades of ranking executives.

Supreme Court justices and other federal judges are provided increases to a range of $30,000-$40,000, and congressional salaries are raised to $30,000. All increases are retroactive to July 1 except for members of Congress, who will begin to draw theirs Jan. 1.

- Both houses cleared a military pay hike bill providing benefits principally for officers and enlisted men with more than two years of service. Ranking Armed Service Committee members pledged to push through next year pay increases for draftees and enlisted men with less than two years of service.

- The House passed, and sent to the White House, a Senate-approved bill creating a 14-member Commission on Automation to study worker displacement by technological and economic changes and recommend "specific administrative and legislative steps" to achieve growth, promote adjustments and labor mobility, and alleviate the impact of change on displaced workers.

All 14 members will be drawn from outside the government and at least four must be named equally from management and labor. An inter-agency committee is also created to serve the commission in an advisory capacity.

- The House in a "landmark" action approved a "wilderness" bill setting aside 9 million acres of public lands for preservation of primitive and rugged areas for future generations. The vote was 373 to 1, Rep. Joe Pool (D-Tex.) being the sole dissenter.

It was the first time the House has approved the long-stalled wilderness program, although the Senate has twice passed a similar bill previously. Swift reconciliation of differences in Senate and House measures is expected.

Said Sen. Clinton Anderson (D-N. M.): "The House action brings virtually to reality the establishment of the system of preserving a part of America's natural heritage for millions of living Americans and generations yet unborn." The AFL-CIO strongly backed the bill.

- The Senate passed a $1.2 billion omnibus housing bill extending all major existing programs after beating down an amendment by Sen. John Tower (R-Tex.) to impose drastic cuts.

The Senate bill increases funds for urban renewal, authorizes 45,000 new public housing units and liberalizes existing programs in other ways. The House had previously passed a similar bill.

- The Senate Finance Committee began hearings on proposals to add a hospital social security program to the House-passed bill increasing old age, disability and survivors benefits by 5 percent and blanketing in an additional 600,000 persons under social security.

It was uncertain whether somewhat differing hospital care programs sponsored by Democrats and Republicans would be offered in committee or only on the Senate floor after the House bill is cleared for action.

- The Senate passed a bill imposing special taxes on investments in foreign securities by U.S. citizens. Objective of the measure, previously approved by the House with minor differences, is to cut down the export of American capital and slash the nation's balance-of-payments deficit.

- The Senate took up the foreign aid authorization bill, previously passed by the House, with Administration forces prepared for a major battle to prevent reductions in the $3.47 billion ceiling approved by committee.

As the House moved into debate on the anti-poverty program, two other related bills were revived and sent on their way toward passage.

The House Rules Committee cleared a slightly-reduced measure to extend the area redevelopment program as a substitute for a bill beaten by five votes on the House floor last year. The Senate has already passed an extension bill and would be expected to approve the revised House measure.

The Administration's Appalachia renewal bill was revived and approved in the House Public Works Committee. The measure, revamped from the original program, would authorize $237 million to develop natural and human resources of the 11-state Appalachia region and $845 million to build and develop regional access highways. Early clearance was expected from the Rules Committee and the substitute program was expected to receive Senate acceptance.

As the House took up the anti-poverty bill, threatened with intense partisan opposition from Republicans, House leaders said they would move to substitute a Senate-passed measure before the showdown rollcalls were reached.

Job Training Corps

The Senate bill authorizes $947.5 million for the current fiscal year to create a Job Corps giving training and remedial education to 40,000 youths between 16 and 21 years of age and to provide a domestic Peace Corps, a work-study program for needy college students, work training for potential school "drop-outs," federal funds for community self-help programs and aid to rural families and small businesses.

The recent Republican National Convention ridiculed the anti-poverty program, but some GOP help was expected on the House floor by Democratic leaders, who also hoped to pick up enough southern Democratic support to secure passage.

Salinger Named Senator To Fill Engle Vacancy

Pierre Salinger, former White House press secretary, was sworn in as a member of the Senate from California following his appointment by Gov. Edmund G. Brown to fill the vacancy created by the death of the late Sen. Clair Engle.

Salinger won the Democratic senatorial nomination in the California June 2 primary after the then-ailing Engle announced his withdrawal. He will run for a full six-year term in November against Republican George Murphy, former Hollywood actor and long-active GOP politician.

Murphy indicated he would make the Salinger appointment a campaign issue, charging that Salinger was technically not eligible for the interim post. The California Supreme Court unanimously ruled last March that Salinger was qualified to run, overruling a challenge to his eligibility by California Sec. of State Frank M. Jordan, a Republican.

Senate GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) raised the eligibility issue and sought to delay Salinger's oath until a new suit by Murphy moved through California courts. Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) retorted that under the Constitution the Senate itself is the sole judge of the qualification of its members.

A Mansfield substitute resolution referred Dirksen's protest to the Rules Committee and Salinger took his oath as a senator "without prejudice" pending a report from the committee. Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.), the GOP assistant Senate leader, broke with Dirksen to support Salinger's claim to a legal appointment, and the Mansfield substitute was approved on a 59-29 rollcall vote.

The Salinger appointment was announced by Gov. Brown on Aug. 4, the day after Engle's funeral in Red Bluff, Calif. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a telegram to Mrs. Engle had previously praised the "gallantry" with which Engle had fought against his illness, comparing it to the late senator's battles "for many good causes for many years." Expressing condolences on her "great personal bereavement," Meany told Mrs. Engle that "union members, and working people everywhere, have lost a friend and champion."

"OUTSTANDING EXPERT on freedom's enemies," Dir. Jay Lovestone (center) of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs, was given a citation by the Assembly of Captive European Nations "in sincere gratitude for his service in word, in print, and in tireless action to the cause of liberty in captive Europe." The presentation was made at the assembly's awards dinner in Washington by Chairman Aleksander Kutt (left) and Constantin Visoianu.

Bolling Renominated By 2-1 Primary Vote

Rep. Richard Bolling of Kansas City won a smashing Democratic primary victory for renomination for his ninth term in the House despite solid opposition of old-line factional ward leaders in the Missouri 5th District.

The ward leaders carried their tickets narrowly in other races, but Bolling, a key liberal figure in the House Rules Committee, defeated Jackson County Judge (Commissioner) Hunter Phillips by a 52,849-to-26,167 margin on the basis of nearly complete unofficial returns. Bolling had strong backing from labor and civil rights groups in the city-suburban district.

In other primary contests in Missouri and Kansas on Aug. 4, liberal Democratic Sen. Stuart Symington was renominated for a third consecutive term against token opposition, but Kansas Republicans nominated Rep. William H. Avery, a conservative GOP Rules Committee member, for governor over McDill Boyd and moderate State Sen. Paul R. Wunsch. In nearly complete returns, Avery had 73,000 votes against approximately 66,000 for Boyd and about 60,000 for Wunsch.

In the Kansas 2nd Congressional District, GOP voters chose the highly conservative Chester L. Mize as nominee to succeed Avery in the House. He will face Democrat John Montgomery in the November election.

Missouri Winner

In another gubernatorial race, Missouri Democrats narrowly nominated Sec. of State Warren E. Hearnes over Lieut. Gov. Hilary A. Bush. Bush had the backing of most liberals.

Symington is heavily favored to win Senate re-election in November against Republican nominee Jean Paul Bradshaw, and Avery is rated a favorite in normally Republican Kansas over Democrat Harry G. Wiles, now a state corporation commissioner.

Hearnes, the Democratic nominee for governor in Missouri, apparently will face a sharp challenge from Republican Ethan A. H. Shepley, former chancellor of Washington University in St. Louis, and a respected civic leader.

All House members seeking new terms were renominated in Missouri, Kansas and Idaho—two Democrats in Idaho, four Republicans in Kansas, seven Democrats and two Republicans in Missouri.

In a multiple-candidate race, Democrats nominated William L. Hungate, a Troy, Mo., lawyer, for the 9th Congressional District's seat occupied for three decades by the late Rep. Clarence Cannon, long-time conservative Democratic chairman of the House Appropriations Committee.

New Directory Lists Union Scholarships

American labor is distributing more than $1 million in college scholarship funds each year, according to a newly published AFL-CIO Directory of Union-Sponsored Scholarships.

The funds are shared by about 900 students but are only "a token of the sum" needed to give capable youths the education they should have, AFL-CIO Education Dir. Lawrence Rogin notes in an introduction.

Annually, he points out, nearly 200,000 high school seniors who could benefit from college training are unable to get it because of financial problems. The program of the AFL-CIO seeks to help the children of low-income families and stress the need for greater aid to higher education, he adds.

The directory lists scholarships available through international and local unions and state central bodies. Academic qualifications are spelled out.

Copies of the directory have been distributed to union education directors and are available to AFL-CIO affiliates upon request to the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington 6, D. C.

Congress Votes Johnson War on Poverty Weapons

Court Curb Rider Hit By Labor

The AFL-CIO called on the Senate to reject a new "compromise" proposal which would block court enforcement of the Supreme Court's "one man, one vote" doctrine for redistricting of state legislatures.

The original proposal was advanced by Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) as a "rider" on the foreign aid bill. In exchange for modifications made to meet Justice Dept. objections, it won admittedly reluctant co-sponorship from Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.).

In a telegram to all senators, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller charged that the new proposal, like its predecessor, is a "revolutionary" measure which is clearly "derogatory" to the constitutional separation of powers.

It would bar court-ordered reapportionment of state legislatures before 1966 except in "highly unusual circumstances." Courts also would be instructed to allow legislatures an undefined "reasonable opportunity" to redistrict following a court judgment that legislative districts violated the principles of the Supreme Court decision.

Previous Proposal

Dirksen had orginally proposed a flat bar on court reapportionment orders for two sessions of a state legislature—a four-year delay in most states. This, he contended, would allow Congress and the states to consider his proposed constitutional amendment allowing one house of a legislature to be based "on factors other than population."

Fifteen prominent law school deans and professors had warned that the Dirksen proposal "dangerously threatens the integrity of our judicial process." They said it would result in "drastic interference" with the "power and duty" of courts to enforce the constitution.

Biemiller wired senators that

Civil Rights Democrats Win In Tennessee

Tennessee Democrats gave a resounding victory to Rep. Ross Bass, a five-term member of the House credited by labor with an excellent voting record, in a primary contest with Gov. Frank Clement for nomination for the two-year unexpired term of the late Sen. Estes Kefauver.

Bass, who represents the 6th Congressional District, won with more than 300,000 votes against 210,000 for Clement and 77,000 for a third candidate, M. M. Bullard, on the basis of nearly complete returns. Bass voted for the civil rights bill this year. Clement announced during the campaign that if he had been a House member he would have voted against it.

In another key contest, Rep. Clifford Davis of Memphis, a 13-term veteran, was beaten for Democratic renomination by George W. Grider, a World War II submarine commander and an opponent of Clement in Tennessee politics. Davis, who voted against the civil rights bill, barely won re-election in 1962 against a Republican challenger but he had won Democratic renomination overwhelmingly.

Another former submarine commander, Capt. William R. Anderson, won Democratic nomination for the House in the district Bass

$947 Million Plan, Food Stamps Win

By David L. Perlman

Congress delivered to Pres. Johnson a big first installment on legislation he requested to wage war on poverty. The package sent to the White House included the broad-ranging anti-poverty bill which had been sharply denounced by Sen. Barry Goldwater, GOP presidential nominee. With it went a food-stamp plan which will enable needy families to buy more with their food dollars.

The key anti-poverty bill, when backed with appropriations still to be voted, will provide $947.5 million in federal funds for major new programs including:

- Work training in conservation camps and home-town projects for youngsters 16 through 21.
- Federal grants to help local communities mount their own programs to eradicate poverty.
- Basic education in reading, writing and arithmetic for adults whose illiteracy has barred them from both jobs and vocational training.
- Subsidized part-time jobs to help needy students finance their college education.
- Expanded vocational training for unemployed fathers on welfare rolls.
- Loans to individuals and cooperatives to help poor rural families purchase farmland and equipment, and federal help in providing health, housing and welfare programs for migrant farm families.
- Loans to establish small businesses or enable small businessmen to provide work opportunities for long-term unemployed.
- Creation of the Volunteers in Service to America, often described as a domestic peace corps, to work in areas of social service need such as mental hospitals, among migrant families and in Indian reservations.

Pres. Johnson has already announced that he will name Peace Corps Dir. Sargent Shriver to head the new Office of Economic Opportunity which will direct the anti-poverty program.

McDonald Lashes at Goldwater

Pittsburgh — The presidential candidacy of Sen. Barry Goldwater poses a "menace" to the future of "free American trade unionism" and to the social and economic advances made "and yet to be made in behalf of our nation's working people," Steelworkers Pres. David J. McDonald declared.

His sharp attack on Goldwater and a strong plea for support of Pres. Johnson came in a letter to all USWA district directors, accompanying a 10-minute political action film to be shown at local union meetings and "wherever else possible."

McDonald wrote: "I cannot emphasize strongly enough my belief that the Goldwater philosophy represents the greatest challenge we have faced in our nation, not only in the ranks of organized labor but in every part of the American way of life."

He called on the directors to "use every effort and every talent at our command to help turn back this threat and to insure for our nation good and liberal government on the national scale."

Goldwater Asks GOP 'Unity':

Platform Hearings Set By Democrats

By Willard Shelton

The Democratic Party gets its election-year machinery rolling with the opening of platform hearings in Washington on Aug. 17, a week before the national convention is scheduled to meet in Atlantic City to nominate Pres. Johnson for a full term in the White House.

As the Democrats began moving, Sen. Barry Goldwater, the GOP candidate, stepped up efforts to unify Republicans behind him in a so-called "summit" meeting of party leaders in Hershey, Pa., and at the same time continued to tighten his grip on the permanent party machinery.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is scheduled to present labor's views to the Democrats on Aug. 18. Platform hearings will be held in Washington for three days and will be resumed Aug. 20 in Atlantic City for at least two days. Chairman of the Platform Committee is Rep. Carl Albert (Okla.), House Democratic floor leader.

The Democratic National Committee and the convention Credentials Committee meet just before the convention convenes Aug. 24 for the keynote speech by Sen. John O. Pastore (R.I.).

Goldwater set his "summit" meeting conveniently close to former Pres. Eisenhower's Gettysburg farm and he and his running-mate, Rep. William E. Miller, emerged from the sessions with the benefit of a press conference announcement by

Hospital Care Labeled No. 1 Problem of Aged

Terming health care the "Number One problem of the aged," the AFL-CIO urged the Senate to add hospitalization insurance to the package of social security benefits passed by the House.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank and Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told the Senate Finance Committee that neither charity nor private insurance is a substitute for a social security program which would provide hospital benefits without a means test.

Labor is "deeply committed" to the social security hospital care approach, Cruikshank said. He stressed that the AFL-CIO is open-minded on the exact formula for incorporating the program into the pending social security bill.

Proposals to offer hospital insurance as an option to retirees in place of a cash increase in benefits might prove feasible with proper safeguards, the AFL-CIO spokesman said. Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.), a former Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare, has indicated that he will offer such an option plan—in the Finance Committee and, if it is rejected there, on the floor of the Senate.

Earlier, HEW Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze told the committee

McDonald Hits Goldwater as Foe of Labor

of which came from voluntary contributions, McDonald makes the following points:

- A vote for Goldwater would mean destruction of the USWA. "If you want to save your union, if you want to continue to have a strong United Steelworkers of America, then I urge you by all the powers of good to go out and support Lyndon B. Johnson for President of the United States."
- Goldwater has cast "53 votes . . . against you since 1953."

"He wants to bar you from any sort of political activities. But he has no desire to bar corporation political activities."

- The GOP candidate "wants a right-to-work law" which means the end of the union shop Steelworkers struck for in 1952 and saved in a 116-day strike in 1959.
- Goldwater wants to eliminate strong international unions.

"That means canceling out and making it impossible to attain such things as pensions and insurance, supplemental unemployment benefit plans, extended vacation plans—all those things which we worked and fought for down through the years."

Goldwater's ideas would turn the USWA into "nothing else than a company-dominated union."

- He is against social security for the aged and infirm. He is against health care. He is against "any welfare which will help the poor and unemployed in our country."
- A rising number of hate organizations is trying to "set brother against brother" in labor unions.

"Don't fall for this game."

- The important thing is to build political organization, register the unregistered and get out the vote on election day.

"In short, be a good union man. Be a good Steelworker. And on Election Day be a tiger! Go out and work."

Minton Calls For Defeat Of Goldwater

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Lee W. Minton, who headed a Labor Committee for Rockefeller during the Republican primary campaigns, has called for the defeat of Sen. Barry Goldwater in November.

Minton declared that the control of the GOP "has gone into the hands of extreme reactionaries" and the platform adopted in San Francisco is "tragic" for America in the space age.

"I assume," said Minton, that "in the absence of any meaningful reference to policies as they affect labor unions" in the platform "that the extremist position of the standard bearer, who has advocated and introduced in Congress a national 'open-shop' law, prevails."

In the national interest, he added, it is the duty of all trade union members "to start right now working for the defeat of the Republican candidate for President and the platform framed by his supporters."

Minton, a member of the Republican Party, commended Republican leaders at the convention who "fought courageously but without success" against the Goldwater platform.

$38,000 in Back Pay Won for 11 by IAM

Goldwater Asks Unity After 'Clarifying' Views

the general pledging "full support" of the ticket.

The Arizona senator went into the meeting with a speech on foreign policy, "hip-shooting," civil rights, political "extremism" and social security that was generally considered by political reporters as conciliatory. In a later press conference, Goldwater rejected this description, saying that he had "merely reaffirmed" what he had been saying all along, which he said somehow didn't "always get through."

Eisenhower, however, said he had asked the senator for a "clarification of views" and "I got them." New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller in a separate press conference said that Goldwater's statement, "more clearly setting forth" his positions on key issues "should be helpful to the ticket."

Letter to Nixon

The Hershey meeting followed a formal exchange of letters between Goldwater and former Vice Pres. Nixon sharply modifiying two sentences in his convention acceptance speech that enraged major party leaders who had opposed him.

By saying that "extremism in the defense of liberty is no vice," Goldwater told Nixon, what he had meant in paraphrase was that "wholehearted devotion to liberty is unassailable." By saying that "moderation in the pursuit of justice is no virtue," he continued, he meant that "half-hearted devotion to justice is indefensible."

Rockefeller told his news conference that he had asked Goldwater's assistance in persuading the New York Conservative Party, a right-wing GOP splinter group, to abandon any plan to enter a candidate—Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce has said she is considering running—against GOP Sen. Kenneth B. Keating.

The extent of active support Goldwater might expect from party stalwarts in the industrial states remained uncertain despite harmony expressions after the Hershey meeting. Rockefeller, who has always pledged to support the ticket, says he does not expect to campaign outside New York, while New York's liberal Sen. Jacob K. Javits has declined to promise his backing.

Sen. Clifford P. Case of New Jersey has not yet pledged support and California's Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel, who said he was "appalled" by events at the GOP convention, is expected to be out of the country for at least part of the pre-election period.

Goldwater kept moving fast to place his own men in national committee posts. The research director, Dr. William Prendergast, quit to make room for Goldwater's pre-convention research chief, Edward McCabe.

Democratic Convention Garb Gets Union Label

Dallas, Tex.—Dresses and jackets worn by staffers and ushers at the Democratic National Convention will carry the union label—by order of Pres. Johnson.

The president of the Dallas dress firm which got the order, Nardis, credited the union label of the Ladies' Garment Workers with bringing him the business. He said Johnson aides, who ordered the garments through the Neiman-Marcus store, made it clear that the President insisted on a union label in all costumes.

First shipments of the order of 1,000 dresses and matching jackets have already been delivered to Atlantic City where the convention opens Aug. 24.

Both the vests and the shift dresses are of white cotton striped with blue and red. They have a large patch pocket of blue, embroidered with the LBJ initials.

Lowest in More Than 4 Years:

Major Idle Areas Drop to 35 in July

By Robert B. Cooney

The number of major job centers with substantial unemployment fell to 35 in July—the lowest level in more than four years, the Labor Dept. reported in its monthly survey of the nation's 150 major job areas.

While the list of major areas suffering "substantial unemployment"—6 percent or more unemployed—was reduced by a net of two from June's total of 37, the report said, 11 areas showed lower unemployment, with prospects of continuing improvement over the next few months."

On the list of those with substantial unemployment, three areas were removed and one was added.

San Jose, Calif., was added to the 6 percent to 8.9 percent jobless grouping as a result of recent cutbacks in aerospace activities, the report said.

'Moderate' Areas

Buffalo, N. Y., Hamilton-Middletown, O., and Erie, Pa., were reclassified into the "moderate unemployment" category, with 3 to 6 percent unemployed.

For Erie, it was the first time in seven years that the area had been off the substantial unemployment list. The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Employment Security attributed the improvement to increased activity in railroad equipment manufacturing and growth in state and local government employment. The government work is in schools and public works, the report noted.

Buffalo's job gains came in nonelectrical machinery, food processing, services and other non-manufacturing activities, the report said.

In Hamilton-Middletown, the job gains were tied to increased activity at major steel plants, it added.

Six of the 11 areas showing improvement in economic conditions dropped into the 1.5 percent to 3 percent joblessness category. These were Atlanta, Ga., Peoria, Ill., Kalamazoo, Mich., and Columbus, Dayton and Steubenville-Weirton, O.

The decline in unemployment in these areas was attributed to long-term uptrends in durables manufacturing and seasonal gains in non-factory activities, the report said. This pushed to 25 the number of areas with "low unemployment," the highest such total since January 1960, the Labor Dept. noted.

Two areas among the 11 showing improvement—Scranton, Pa., and Wheeling, W. Va.—were reclassified from the 9 percent to 12 percent jobless category into the 6 percent to 8.9 percent grouping. Both showed uptrends in durables manufacturing.

The July report put the job picture—in terms of surveys of major areas—about where it was in 1960. There were 31 areas with substantial unemployment in December 1959-January 1960, a total which moved up to 35 in April-May 1960, when these surveys were issued on a bimonthly basis. A recession shot the total up to a record high of 101 out of 150 areas with 6 percent or more jobless in February-March and April 1961.

Very gradual improvement brought the total down to 39 by January 1964; it stuck at about that figure until June and July.

The smaller areas of substantial unemployment fell by two to 147 in July, 27 below July 1963, the report also said.

has represented. Anderson served under the late Pres. Kennedy as chairman of an advisory commission working out plans for the National Service Corps (domestic peace corps) that became part of the just-passed anti-poverty bill.

Easy for Gore

Sen. Albert Gore won easily in the Democratic primary for a third six-year term. He will face Howard Baker, Jr., whose father served for years as a Republican member of the House, in the November election.

In the Utah primaries, Democratic Sen. Frank Moss was renominated without opposition for a second term and Republicans gave a narrow victory to Ernest L. Wilkinson, a retired college president, over Rep. Sherman P. Lloyd in a contest pitting two conservatives against each other.

Lloyd had the backing of Americans for Constitutional Action in his House race two years ago and has a conservative voting record. Wilkinson, until recently president of Brigham Young College, is a member of the National Right-to-Work Committee.

GOP voters nominated Mitchell Melich, Salt Lake City lawyer and businessman, for governor over D. James Cannon. Democrats chose Calvin L. Rampton, also of Salt Lake City, over Ernest H. Dean, member of the legislature. The GOP primary vote totaled about 120,000; Democrats turned out about 92,000.

In Alaska, Rep. Ralph J. Rivers was given Democratic renomination for a third term and Republicans nominated, as they did two years ago, Lowell Thomas, Jr., son of the radio-television news-and-travelogue reporter. Democrats ran far ahead of the GOP in the vote turnout.

Insurance Union Wins at United

Baltimore—The Insurance Workers have been chosen in a key election to represent agents of the United Insurance Co. of America at eight district offices here and one in Annapolis.

The vote, in a National Labor Relations Board election, was 103-50 in favor of IWIU. It was the first such tally since United acquired the Quaker City Life Insurance Co., whose agents had been represented by the union for collective bargaining purposes. Involved are more than 3,500 agents in 47 states and the District of Columbia.

Formerly, no United office had bargaining relations with the IWIU. The NLRB ordered the election on petition of the union because the number of United agents was larger than the number of Quaker City agents. Other elections will be petitioned for later, the IWIU said.

In a stipulation preceding the election, United management reserved the right to appeal the results on the ground that its agents are independent contractors and not subject to the labor law as employes. The union rejects that claim.

'Common Sense' Reading Asked:

Supreme Court Urged to Reject Narrow L-G Dues Vote Ruling

The AFL-CIO has asked the Supreme Court to give a "common sense" reading to the Landrum-Griffin Act and overturn a lower court decision invalidating a dues increase voted by the 1963 convention of the Musicians.

Most international unions—and the AFL-CIO itself—use a convention rollcall system similar to that of the Musicians, with the voting strength of delegates based on the number of members they represent.

Two lower courts, although conceding that such voting methods are thoroughly democratic, found the procedure a technical violation of a Landrum-Griffin Act requirement that a dues increase be approved by "a majority vote of the delegates."

This, the courts held, means that each delegate is entitled to only one vote, whether he represents a local of 50 or 10,000 members.

If this decision were permitted to stand, AFL-CIO attorneys contended in a "friend of the court" brief, it would "wreak havoc upon established union procedures without promoting any known congressional purpose."

In a broader area, the AFL-CIO said, the Supreme Court's ruling in the Musicians' case will "provide guidance" to lower courts on whether the Landrum-Griffin Act should be interpreted in a "narrow and artificial" context or be given "a sensible and realistic reading that will assure every individual union man his proper membership rights without interfering with the practices and usages freely adopted by his organization."

Dues Increase Reenacted

Although the Musicians re-enacted the contested $6-a-year dues increase at the union's 1964 convention, AFM attorneys are pressing the appeal to the Supreme Court as a matter of principle and because of its potential impact on other unions.

The AFL-CIO's brief pointed out that the alternative to a system of weighted voting for many unions would be "a convention so large that it is both overly cumbersome and overly expensive."

In the case of the Musicians, a convention of 14,000 delegates would be needed if proportional representation of locals were to be achieved through increasing the number of delegates instead of a weighted voting system.

Federation attorneys cited congressional testimony by Pres. George Meany during consideration of the Landrum-Griffin Act and modifications made in the dues section of the bill in line with his suggestions. The record shows, they said, there was never the "slightest suggestion" in the legislative history of the bill that the "relatively non-controversial" dues provision was intended to outlaw "accepted and concedely democratic trade union practice."

The phrase "majority vote" used in the Landrum-Griffin Act obviously can be interpreted to refer to a majority of the delegates' voting strength, the AFL-CIO brief said, and "common sense" would prefer that interpretation to a "narrow, niggling" reading of the law.

ON DUTY AROUND THE CLOCK are pickets from Plate & Paper Handlers Local 10 and Pressmen's Local 13 at the Detroit Free Press and the Detroit News. Some 3,000 additional employes, members of other unions, have been locked out as a result of the dispute.

Auto Bargaining Inches, GM Yields Minor Point

Detroit—Auto negotiations inched toward an Aug. 31 contract deadline here with only one minor union proposal accepted by any of the industry's Big 3—a paragraph providing that any General Motors worker may get a leave of absence for educational purposes after one year of work.

In talks with representatives of GM, Ford Motor and Chrysler Corp., negotiators for the Auto Workers were quoting chapter and verse in pinpointing the union's claim that Big 3 contracts perpetuate a double standard of benefits favoring top executives, stockholders and white collar workers.

The claim is detailed in a report to 345,000 UAW members and their families from Dir. Leonard Woodcock, of the union's GM Dept. The report, called "Bargaining in GM," cites a "slick booklet" which GM publishes at contract time to "tell how far hourly-rated workers have come" since the first UAW contract in 1947 but, said Woodcock, it doesn't tell the whole story.

The report cited these comparisons:

- The GM worker who earned $3,009 in 1947 and was still on the payroll at the end of 1963 would have earned $86,311. The GM stockholder who had stock producing $3,009 in dividends in 1947 would, 17 years later, have received $192,074 in dividends plus $423,704 in increased stock value or a total of $615,778.
- Workers have made progress since 1947 but less than the corporation. GM's net worth rose from $1.57 billion in 1947 to $7.1 billion through 1963—an average increase of about 10 percent a year for 16 years.
- The chief executive officer of GM received $390,125 in 1947 or $187.56 an hour. By 1963 this had risen to $356.20 an hour.
- In 1963 the 56 top GM executives received a total of $16.5 million in salaries and bonuses—more than the combined salaries of 606 top government officials including the President of the United States.
- GM pays 28.2 cents an hour toward pensions of salaried workers, 7.66 cents an hour for hourly workers.
- The average GM worker on pension in 1963 received $260 a month. The GM board chairman would receive $5,870 a month if he retired now.

Woodcock cited these other examples of a double standard: GM pays the full cost of life insurance for the salaried worker, part of the cost for the hourly worker; GM pays the full cost of sickness and accident benefits for the salaried worker but only part of the cost for "blue collar" workers.

"GM workers are not looking for a fight, but for simple justice," said the union. "We want no more. We will accept no less."

Work Stoppages Up In First Half of '64

Work stoppages in the first half of 1964 were nearly 30 percent higher than last year's postwar low but there was no change in the number of manhours lost, according to preliminary estimates by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

A total of 1,725 stoppages involving 637,000 workers began during the first six months, the report showed, compared with 1,690 stoppages affecting 495,000 workers in the same period last year. Lost man-days amounted to 8.2 million each year. In 1963 several long stoppages were in effect during the first six months of 1963, including the New York newspaper strike and longshoremen's walkouts on the Atlantic and Gulf Coasts.

USWA Wins Contest At Hughes Tool Co.

Houston—The Steelworkers have been certified by the National Labor Relations Board as exclusive collective bargaining representative for 2,100 workers at the Hughes Tool Co. here, replacing two ousted locals of the unaffiliated Independent Metal Workers Union. Hughes Tool workers voted 986-917 for the Steelworkers after certification of the unaffiliated union had been withdrawn by the NLRB on July 2 for race discrimination practices. Certification of the USWA followed when no objections were filed within five days of the NLRB election.

The unaffiliated union had replaced the USWA as bargaining agent in 1946 and won election contests in 1950, 1959 and 1961. When a member of the "independent" filed a charge that white officers of one local had refused to process a grievance for him, a Negro member of the racially separate colored local, the NLRB decertified the IMWU.

The USWA had been bargaining agent at Hughes from 1942 to 1946. After the election, USWA District Dir. Martin Burns said the AFL-CIO and its Industrial Union Dept. had cooperated in the campaign for votes and the Machinists distributed handbills urging Hughes Tool workers to vote for the USWA.

The latter union will proceed to negotiate a new contract with plant management, Burns said.

$100 Daily Minimum Won in Pay TV Films

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Actors Guild has signed an 18-month contract providing minimum rates of $100 per day and $350 weekly for actors used by Subscription Television, Inc., in producing motion pictures on STV's pay television stations in San Francisco and the Santa Monica-Los Angeles area.

The agreement calls for a minimum fee of $150 per program. Still to be negotiated is a formula for additional compensation for continued use and re-use of films, to be based on specified periods of use and an increase in the number of subscribers to STV's service.

GOP 'Labor Plank' Is Goldwater Record

Havre, Mont.—In a dramatic long-distance phone call from the floor of the House, Rep. Arnold Olsen (D) of Montana's western 1st Congressional District warned the Montana AFL-CIO convention of the "hidden Republican labor plank."

Olsen's call was piped into the convention hall over a special circuit arranged the night before by State AFL-CIO Pres. Joe Crosswhite and Exec. Sec. Jim Umber when Olsen informed them that the key rollcall votes on Pres. Johnson's "war on poverty" program would keep him in Washington.

'Not in Platform'

Olsen told some 200 applauding delegates that the "hidden labor plank is not in the platform adopted in San Francisco, but in the record of legislation introduced in Congress by Sen. Barry Goldwater."

Olsen listed two such measures: Senate Bill 87, "which would enact a national phony 'right-to-work' law, and you would have to get legislation passed in the state to set it aside"; Senate Bill 287, which would put unions under provisions of anti-trust legislation and end companywide or industry-wide bargaining.

Politics took up a good share of the three-day convention as candidates for virtually every statewide office from both parties appeared to seek the support of the Montana labor body.

Delegates heard incumbent GOP Gov. Tim Babcock say "right-to-work" was "not needed since passage of Landrum-Griffin" and announce solemnly that working people "don't need recognition to get fair treatment" as he defended the company union at the trucking firm he owns.

Democrat Would Veto 'Work'

Democratic gubernatorial candidate Roland Renne pledged to oppose "right-to-work" and to veto it if passed. He went on to praise the AFL-CIO exposure of political extremists and noted they "have no place in American life, whether they be Klansmen with their shotguns in the night or Birchers with their irresponsible mouths in the day."

Policy resolutions adopted included the most far-reaching civil rights position ever taken by Montana labor. Noting that "even one instance of discrimination is intolerable in a democracy," the resolution instructed officers of the state body to seek passage of a state civil rights statute in 1965 similar to a tough bill passed in 1961 in Idaho.

Other resolutions set a policy of opposition to the three conservative-sponsored "disunity amendments" to the U.S. Constitution, backed recent U.S. Supreme Court reapportionment decisions and called for action to reapportion the Montana Legislature in 1965 in line with those decisions.

The delegates established a $1,000 annual scholarship for a full-time Montana union leader at the Harvard University Trade Union Program, urged adoption of state legislation similar to the "truth-in-lending" bill sponsored by Sen. Paul Douglas (D.-Ill.), and called for construction of several new multi-purpose dams as being badly needed in the wake of recent disastrous Montana floods.

Topping the list of guest speakers was Undersec. of Labor John F. Henning, who ripped into Goldwater's anti-labor record. He suggested that if Goldwater and his backers can be taken literally in their public positions, the implication of forced labor camps to solve unemployment problems would not be inconsistent.

Reynolds Named In Dock Dispute

New York—Assistant Labor Sec. James J. Reynolds has been named by Pres. Johnson to replace Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) on the three-man board appointed to mediate a contract dispute between the Longshoremen and employer members of the New York Shipping Association.

Morse's withdrawal because of Senate business was announced by Reynolds as the board convened here for its first meeting with the disputants, who said they would cooperate with Reynolds and the other board members, arbiter Theodore W. Kheel and Prof. James J. Healy of the Harvard Graduate School of Business.

Early this month the union and management groups asked the President to name the same three-member panel that helped settle the 1962 dock strike, and he did. Major issues in deadlocked negotiations include the size of work gangs and protection against job losses due to automation.

The current agreement expires Sept. 30.

Goldwater on Labor

THE PUBLIC STATEMENTS and writings of Republican Presidential Candidate Barry Goldwater confirm beyond any reasonable doubt his basic opposition to the things the labor movement stands for. His position on labor is clear beyond misunderstanding: he is firmly opposed to a strong free trade union movement and has actively sought to weaken and destroy it.

Goldwater's views were cogently summarized by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at a recent press conference in a single sentence. Of Goldwater he said: "I think he feels the country would be better off if we didn't have trade unions."

This is the Goldwater record:

On trade unions: "There is no question but that trade unions have been scoring bulls-eyes for 30 years taking away freedom which belongs to you and me and our children."

On collective bargaining: [It is] "a weakening of individual personality and self-reliance."

On "right-to-work": "I strongly favor enactment of state right-to-work laws which forbid contracts that make union membership a condition of employment." He introduced a national "right-to-work" bill and said that passage "was vital before the union movement in this country can clear itself of the evils that have been disclosed and to protect itself and its members from a recurrence of them in the future."

On unions and the anti-trust laws: "Unions should come under the anti-trust statutes . . ." and "I certainly do not feel that the public interest—a popular phrase with the New Frontier—is served by the possession of monopolistic power and I am convinced that it must be limited."

On Taft-Hartley: ". . . most of us in politics have long known . . . that the people of the United States like the Taft-Hartley Act; that the laboring man likes the protection of the Taft-Hartley Act, though, of course, the labor leaders dislike it."

On Landrum-Griffin: "The bill, as now developed by this body, in terms of its effect on the evil conditions it professes to cure, is like a fleabite to a bull elephant."

On industrywide bargaining: "The evil to be eliminated is the power of unions to enforce industrywide bargaining."

On labor in politics: "Unions should therefore be forbidden to engage in any kind of political activity . . . Union members are the new second-class citizens in America. This is a new serfdom, where a citizen is required to surrender a portion of his freedom of political choice to a union politician or be discharged from his job on the grounds of failure to pay his dues."

Goldwater's statements and comments on the labor movement are supported completely by his voting record in the U.S. Senate.

SINCE HE ENTERED THE SENATE in 1953 he has voted consistently against the programs and policies of organized labor. On 53 rollcall votes tabulated by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education Goldwater has voted against the labor position 53 times. He has not cast a single vote in his entire career in the Senate for a labor-supported bill or a labor-backed position.

A recent article raised the question of "what would Barry Goldwater in the White House mean to the American labor movement . . ." The answer, on the basis of the record, can only be "disaster."

The GOP Kid

Racists, Rightists Raise Cry:

States' Rights Issue Twisted To Thwart National Purpose

The following is excerpted from an article by Alexander Uhl, entitled "National Purpose and States' Rights," appearing in the August issue of the American Federationist:

AS THE UNITED STATES approaches the crucial elections of this November, it finds itself in the middle of a "states' rights" debate that can have a profound influence on the history of the nation.

Segregationists, both North and South—notably in the South—use the states' rights argument to strike back at the 1954 school decision of the U.S. Supreme Court. Gov. George Wallace of Alabama used the argument in his invasion of primaries in Indiana, Wisconsin and Maryland as an anti-Johnson presidential candidate.

The Republican presidential candidate—Sen. Barry Goldwater—is a states' rights advocate. Despite last-minute hedging, he has used states' rights as one of his main arguments against federal "encroachment" in the field of civil rights and the whole gamut of modern federal action.

The U. S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers repeatedly have turned to states' rights arguments in their efforts to reduce federal spending, to undercut the federal income tax, to weaken organized labor through harsh state laws wherever and whenever federal law protects and strengthens labor rather than harasses it.

And, on the far right, the Birchites and the "hate" groups use states' rights slogans to bolster their financial arguments against federal power and against the philosophy of national action in the fields of social justice, education and welfare.

Pres. Johnson, surely an example of individualism, felt compelled to answer these charges recently in an address at Swarthmore College.

"Does government subvert our freedom through the social security system which guards our people against destitution when they are too old to work?" he asked. "Does government undermine our freedom by bringing electricity to the farm, by controlling floods or by ending bank failures? Is freedom lessened by efforts to abate pollution in our streams, by efforts to gain knowledge of the causes of heart disease and cancer or by efforts to strengthen competition and the free market? Is freedom really diminished by banning the sale of harmful drugs, by providing school lunches for our children, by preserving our wilderness areas or by improving the safety of our airways? Is freedom betrayed when in 1964 we redeem in full the pledge made a century ago by the Emancipation Proclamation?"

"The truth is," said the President, "far from crushing the individual, government at its best liberates him from the enslaving forces of his environment. For, as Thomas Jefferson said, 'the care of human life and happiness is the first and only legitimate object of good government.'"

Goldwater strode to national notoriety as the implacable enemy of "Big Government," as the man who would sell the Tennessee Valley Authority down the river to private power companies, as the staunch adherent of state and local freedom from federal control. Yet Goldwater is one of the sponsors and an ardent supporter of a billion-dollar federal water program that would enrich immensely his own parched state.

THERE IS also a "far-out" states' rights position that has attracted Birchites and similar right-wing groups that seek to hamstring the federal government because of their bitter opposition to the progressive income tax, social security and similar social and economic measures enacted on the federal level.

There are great areas where the national purpose must be expressed through the national power. These are areas that affect all American citizens, rich or poor, black or white, no matter what part of the country they come from. These are national defense, the protection of the civil rights of all citizens whether they live in Florida or in Maine, equal educational opportunities, the preservation of national health, of social security on a national level, of hospital aid for the aged, of national road systems and national development of great natural resources.

There are great areas of state responsibility, too. The carrying out of national purpose instead of the thwarting of it, the development of state transportation systems, of schools and colleges and universities, of social welfare, of all the supplementary services that can best be performed on the local level.

The Constitution provides deliberately for such cooperation and interweaving of state and national life. It is only through a wise and judicious mixture of the two that the design of the Constitution can be carried to reality.

Morgan Says:

Goldwater 'Total Victory' Pitch May Prove Decisive Backlash

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is exerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

BOTH AMATEUR and professional campaign-watchers are inclined to agree at this point that the ugly curl of the white backlash is a factor, if not the main factor, working to the advantage of the presidential candidacy of Sen. Barry Goldwater. The sentiment arrayed against the Negro's climb toward first-class citizenship ranges all the way from sincere anxiety expressed by individuals to the active and even organized hatred propagated by bigoted extremist groups.

Morgan

The great unknown of this 1964 campaign is the question of how widely and how deeply these racial fears and prejudices will cut through the electorate. Many Republicans and Democrats alike are worried over the prospect of a country torn and bleeding from wounds inflicted in blind passion. The NAACP and other responsible civil rights groups took a long, thoughtful step in the right direction when they proposed a moratorium on mass demonstrations until after the election.

Sen. Goldwater himself struck an encouraging note when he disavowed the support of the Ku Klux Klan. Now if he can just bring himself to discourage the empathy that has been cultivated between various levels of his campaign headquarters and other elements of the hydrophobic fringe of the radical right there will be reason to hope that the long barnstormings ahead can concentrate more on vital issues than visceral reactions.

But even while the white backlash remains an unknown and unwanted quantity of trouble, countervailing backlashes have appeared, and several observers believe they add up to what might be called the front-lash of Pres. Johnson's continued advantage in the public opinion polls.

There is, for example, a black backlash. Two million registered Negro voters in the South will count for more than peanuts at the polling places in November. Few people may remember it but 58 percent of the Negro wards in Atlanta voted for Richard Nixon in 1960. An impressive number of Negroes in Baltimore are registered Republicans who were loyal to their ticket four years ago.

Lyndon Johnson is going to suffer serious welts from the white backlash in the South and elsewhere but there surely will be no Negro stampede anywhere to Barry Goldwater.

Then there is the backlash of moderate Republicans—officeholders, officeseekers and the supporters of their middle-of-the-road progressivism. These people echo opposition to the choice Goldwater offers them on the grounds it is not true Taftian conservatism but at its very best the "ism" of anachronism, a "back to" rather than a forward look.

FINALLY THERE is what could be the most significant backlash of all, the backlash against the image of a "shooter-from-the-hipper" in international affairs which countless citizens have formed of the man from Arizona. The shadowy profile of this anxiety is already beginning to take shape in the national polls but one provincial measure may reflect it even more strikingly.

According to a poll completed after the Republican convention by three newspapers of the John P. Harris group, Johnson is stronger in Kansas, of all places, than any Democratic President in history.

The Hutchinson News, Salina Journal and Garden City Telegram took a straw vote in the 1st Congressional District, 58 counties comprising roughly the western three-fifths of the state. Ballots were marked by 5,500 citizens, 1 percent of the district's 550,000 population. The north half of the district is considered one of the most conservative in the nation. Nevertheless, LBJ polled 53 percent of the vote to 27 percent for Goldwater and 20 percent undecided. The senator carried only three of the 58 counties, tied in another.

Indicating the President's vote did not come from a disproportionate number of Democrats, the same voters went 50 percent for Republican Rep. Bob Dole to 24 percent for his Democratic opponent, Bill Bork, a political newcomer, with 26 percent undecided.

Conceding sharp surprise at the outcome, the Hutchinson News concluded editorially that "Barry is, indeed, in trouble in Kansas." Why? Though it was not spelled out in the returns, one probability is that the 1st District, reflecting the traditional unwarlike posture of the American heartland, was worried lest the human but oversimplified Goldwater demands for "total victory" become a large if not a total obstacle to peace. Such concern, unquieted, could apply to the Republican candidate in November the whiplash of defeat.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

ON THE ISSUE OF POLITICAL "EXTREMISM," both Sen. Goldwater and Rep. William E. Miller, the Republican nominees, managed to find occasion to renounce support of the Ku Klux Klan after their ticket had already been endorsed by Klan leaders in a couple of southern states. And the senator from Arizona did some "paraphrasing" of his convention speech on extremism-moderation that made things sound entirely different. It seems fair to comment that he doesn't yet understand—or does not agree with—the pressure brought by such GOP leaders as Governors Scranton and Rockefeller. Senators Case, Kuchel, Javits and Scott, in regard to the John Birch Society.

In the Hershey, Pa., Republican "unity" meeting, the senator specifically repudiated "character assassins, vigilantes, Communists and any group such as the Ku Klux Klan that seeks to impose its views through terror or threat of violence." Asked whether the repudiation included the Birch Society, he said in a later news conference. "No, because they're not on the subversive list."

This is an exercise in evasion. None of the large-state Republican leaders who fought Sen. Goldwater's platform at San Francisco, who supported amendments to spell out renunciation of John Birch Society support, suggested that the group was "subversive" in the sense of fomenting revolution or violence.

There is a spelled-out program for the Birch group of political takeover by party infiltration, of working in secret to spring a surprise at the appropriate moment to seize control of a party organization. And there is a spelled-out Birch Society doctrine that the graduated federal income tax, the Supreme Court's desegregation decisions, the basic labor and social reforms of the Roosevelt-Truman era, make up a bundle to be rooted out.

THE UNDENIABLE FACT is that the John Birch Society and crypto-Birchers have established a substantial beachhead in the California Republican Party. They have established beachheads in the Mountain States, in the Midwest, in the South.

There was a claim by an acknowledged Birch Society leader, former Republican Rep. Edgar H. Hiestand of California, that more than 100 delegates and alternates to the recent GOP convention were Birchers. It would be in Hiestand's organizational interest to exaggerate, of course, but it would by no means be astounding if "more than 100" were members or sympathizers.

Sen. Goldwater said at the "unity" meeting that Republicans should not allow themselves "to become unduly sensitive to glib and easy labels coined by Democrats." It was not "Democrats," but the Republican governors of New York, Pennsylvania and Michigan who pushed for a GOP platform renunciation of "extremist" groups.

Goldwater's forces rode roughshod over these GOP leaders, and the senator himself climaxed the occasion by his defiant acceptance speech: "Extremism in the defense of liberty is no vice. Moderation in the pursuit of justice is no virtue."

THE SENATOR has now "paraphrased" these words in totally different words. He meant merely that "wholehearted devotion to liberty is unassailable" and that "half-hearted devotion to justice is indefensible," he told former Vice Pres. Nixon in a contrived exchange of letters. This is nonsense; the gulf between such expressions and the words he spoke at San Francisco, in the context of the convention, is as broad as all the oceans.

The apprehension of Governors Rockefeller, Scranton and Romney, of Senators Case, Kuchel, Javits and Scott, is that a political right-wing conservatism is finding a home in the Republican Party. Not "subversion" but the kind of political extremism that has cropped up previously in American life, as in the day of the Know-Nothings, an extremism that disparages the patriotism as well as the opinions of others.

Remarked Sen. Case recently, his friends would not find it "credible" if in the light of his known views he should now suddenly pretend that he can passionately support the GOP national ticket.

Washington Reports:

Education Aid Program Hailed For Assistance to Needy Youth

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE Education Act is "one of the greatest pieces of legislation since 1862 when Abraham Lincoln signed the Land Grant College Act," Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) declared in an interview on the 1964 version of the NDEA bill on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

Morse coupled the importance of the NDEA with two other measures signed by Pres. Johnson last year, the bill to aid higher education and the vocational education measure, as historically important legislation.

Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.), on the same program, pointed out that the U.S. began the NDEA program in 1958 after the Russian launching of the Sputnik satellite aroused the nation to its lag in science education. The bill, as passed by the Senate this year, covers education aid also in mathematics, foreign languages, history, civics, geography and remedial reading.

Prouty said that teaching remedial reading is considered an important addition to the program since many school drop-outs occur because students with "a normal or perhaps superior intelligence drop out because of a defect (especially in reading) that isn't recognized early enough, and they find it difficult to keep up with their classmates."

Morse asserted that the program will not cost the nation anything:

"IT IS GOING to mean the difference between the lifetime earning of a college graduate of $475,000 to $490,000 in comparison with the lifetime earning of a student who doesn't get a college education in the neighborhood of $290,000, about $200,000 difference. You take the taxes that will be paid on the extra $200,000 and you see this bill doesn't cost a cent."

Both senators pointed out that the legislation enables young persons who might not otherwise be able to afford college to get such an education.

The loans, as in the Senate bill, would run from $135 million next year to $195 million in 1968. Under the NDEA program, more than 680,000 college students have been aided so far. According to the Office of Education, 90 percent of these students reported they could not have begun or continued their college studies without the aid.

Prouty pointed out that the loans are made through the colleges, which put up one-ninth of the amount.

HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS of young people who otherwise couldn't afford a college education have benefited from the National Defense Education Act and additional hundreds of thousands will be aided by a 1964 Senate-passed extended act, Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), left, and Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.) asserted on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

Key Rollcall in House on Poverty Bill

The anti-poverty bill had its closest call in the House on Aug. 7, when Rep. Howard W. Smith (D-Va.) proposed an amendment which would have killed the bill. Smith's amendment, to strike the enacting clause, was defeated on a 225-197 rollcall. Against the amendment and for the bill on this key vote were 206 Democrats and 19 Republicans. Voting to kill the bill were 156 Republicans and 41 Democrats.

On labor's scoreboard, a vote against the Smith amendment was a right vote (R), while a vote for the amendment was wrong; (W). Other symbols: A—absent; PR—paired right; —PW—paired wrong; NV—not voting. Numerals denote districts; AL—at large.

Labor's Economic Review Says:

Bargaining on Issues Eases Impact of New Technology

Collective bargaining has helped ease the impact of technological change for millions of Americans, but it must be supplemented by government programs to create new jobs for a growing labor force, an AFL-CIO analysis points out.

The Labor's Economic Review feature in the August issue of the American Federationist, AFL-CIO magazine, terms automation "a serious human problem with potentially explosive consequences," but stresses that it is not insoluble.

"In thousands of agreements covering millions of workers, unions and employers have adopted measures which give workers a share in the gains of increasing productivity, cushion the impact of layoffs and, in some cases, even eliminate entirely layoffs due to technological change," the analysis notes.

It cites contract provisions prohibiting technological displacement except through attrition, offering early retirement benefits to older workers, setting up retraining programs, and reducing the workyear through extended vacations as well as a direct reduction in hours.

As a result, the article points out, "the jobs of hundreds of thousands of workers have been preserved, their incomes sustained in whole or at least in part and their opportunities for other employment expanded because a union was on the scene when technological change threatened to ride roughshod over those whose services were no longer needed."

The analysis notes, however, that "the problem of creating enough jobs for a growing and more productive labor force is not a problem which can be solved at the plant or company level. It is a national problem, requiring national action to supplement the private decisions."

This "enormous problem" also presents "an unparalleled opportunity," the AFL-CIO points out. The increased expenditures for public services needed to put the unemployed to work can also provide housing, schools, streets, sewers, improved water supplies, child care and recreation facilities.

As an added dividend:

"The construction of needed schools and libraries would create hundreds of thousands of jobs, including many located in the very areas in which the unemployed reside and many requiring only the limited skills which most of the unemployed presently possess.

Benefits Spelled Out

"Better facilities, improved teaching facilities and adequate financial assistance would lure many out of the labor market and back to school. And additional training and education would make further inroads on unemployment by providing workers with skills to match the job requirements of an automated economy."

A reduction in the workweek and an increase in the minimum wage are other major steps urged in the article. One further action was strongly proposed—establishment of overall economic goals, including estimates of how much spending and investment will be needed to achieve full employment in the year ahead.

"Such projections should be made by the President's Council of Economic Advisers," the article asserts. "The council should also recommend the kinds of government policies necessary to achieve and sustain full employment in the light of its estimates. These estimates and recommendations could then be discussed at annual conferences attended by leaders of the major groups in the economy.

"In this way, a basis could be provided for an intelligent national discussion of economic developments and the need for future changes in government economic policies."

RECENTLY NAMED union members of the National Labor-Management panel are shown with Dir. William E. Simkin (left) of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. They are Exec. Dir. Jack Conway of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and Pres. H. S. Hank Brown of the Texas AFL-CIO. The panel advises the FMCS on the handling of labor disputes, and is composed of six representatives each from labor and management.

Hospital Care Labeled No. 1 Problem of Aged

that the House-passed bill, which provides a 5 percent increase in benefits, fails to meet the "most critical need—hospital care for the aged."

He said he would favor dropping the House-passed increase in cash benefits and using the scheduled step-up in payroll taxes to finance a hospitalization program instead.

Ribicoff used even stronger language in commenting on the House bill, saying it would "use up the precious resources of social security" to increase cash payments by "a piddling amount."

Cruikshank rested labor's case for social security medical care on these basic points:

- "We say that many millions of elderly citizens, living on earned retirement, are each year reduced to penury by catastrophic medical costs.
- "We assert that private insurance programs, even when they have the best of intentions, cannot prevent this disaster.
- "We insist that charity—public or private—is an unacceptable remedy for independent, self-respecting Americans."

When Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) questioned the practical possibility of an attempt to push a hospital care provision through Congress before adjournment, Biemiller responded that he has seen the Senate "move with amazing speed" on occasions.

The AFL-CIO statement sharply criticized the "slogans and shibboleths" used by opponents of social security hospital care.

Referring to the American Medical Association's charge that such a program is "socialized medicine," the AFL-CIO retorted:

"The truth, of course, is exactly opposite. Cover the hospital bill through a federal insurance program, and the patient will have the kind of 'freedom of choice' he doesn't have now."

Likewise, insurance companies would be helped, not hurt, by a social security hospital program.

"The effect of our proposal," the AFL-CIO said, "would be to take the private companies out of an area they cannot possibly handle, and open up to them a vast—and vastly profitable—area of supplementary insurance."

Cruikshank praised a provision in the House-passed social security bill which would include tips as a part of basic wages for social security tax purposes.

"Tipped workers are obliged to pay income tax on tips," he pointed out. "It is obviously a matter of simple justice that money taxed as income should also be part of a worker's wage base in calculating his benefits under the social security system. Anything else would be—and has been—an unjustifiable double standard."

A spokesman for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce urged the Senate to reject the hospital insurance plan because, he said, it is "not needed."

Labor Film Series Scriptman Dies

Boyd T. Wolff, who wrote most of the scripts for the AFL-CIO "Americans at Work" film series, died in Mount Alto Hospital in Washington after a long illness.

A 1930 graduate of Dartmouth College, he was at different times a free lance writer and an employe of several government and private agencies, and at the time of his death was a script writer of documentary films for the Agriculture Dept.

Job Protection Advised For 150,000 on Rails

Union shopcraft employes on 147 U.S. railroads are entitled to better protection against the job-destroying effects of automation and technology, a special emergency board has reported to Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson.

The board, named by the President last March to make recommendations in a dispute between the railroads and six shopcraft unions representing some 150,000 workers, made 13 proposals for cushioning the impact of what it called a "most shattering" drop in rail jobs.

The parties have 30 days to negotiate an agreement based on the recommendations. After Labor Day the unions could strike or the employers could put work changes into effect.

Six Unions Affected

Involved are unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept.—Boilermakers, Railway Carmen, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Firemen & Oilers, and Sheet Metal Workers.

Emergency Board No. 160, which held a series of hearings on the dispute last spring, included Chairman Saul Wallen, Boston arbitrator; Arthur M. Ross of the University of California; and Jean McKelvey of Cornell University, the first woman member of an emergency board under the Railway Labor Act. It recommended that:

- Any employe adversely affected by work transfers, abandonment or consolidation of facilities or services, discontinuance of contracts or other job cuts caused by technological or operational changes should get the benefits of the Washington Job Protection Agreement of 1936—dismissal pay, fringe and relocation benefits and other measures.
- The general chairman of the affected union shall be given a 90-day notice containing a "full disclosure" of all facts and circumstances bearing on the discontinuance of a job for technological reasons.
- In any dispute over job changes, the burden of proof as to the cause of the change shall be on the employer, and unsettled grievances shall go to an expedited arbitration procedure.

Changes Restricted

The board also proposed a clause asserting that the railroad has a right to introduce technological and operational changes "except where such changes are clearly "barred" by existing rules or agreements.

It recommended that when an employe is transferred to another work location, his seniority shall be dovetailed with the seniority of other workers at the new location.

On contracting-out of work, the board proposed a procedure for arbitrating disputes and said the national interest "would be better served by maintaining the capacity of the railroad industry to keep its equipment in good working order and to expand its operations" as needed.

The board said that while technological change has affected all classes of railroad workers, the impact on shopcraft employment has been the "most shattering." Average employment dropped from 367,486 in 1945 to 149,151 in 1962—a reduction of 60 percent as against a drop of 57 percent for all non-operating employes and 37 percent for operating employes.

The unions blame much of the reduction to subcontracting of work formerly done by shopcraft employes and to improper assignment of work to supervisors.

The board recommendations were based on factors cited by the crafts in their notice to employers of Oct. 15, 1962. Since then the same parties have disagreed on contract terms for 1963. Members of the six crafts have, by overwhelming vote, authorized a strike if necessary in the 1963 bargaining situation also.

OCAW Reaches Corn Oil Pact

Chicago—An agreement calling for wage and fringe benefit improvements valued at 10.54 cents an hour for 4,500 employes of the Corn Products Refining Co. has been reached here by negotiators for the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

The agreement, if members approve, is for two years but may be reopened for further negotiations on wages at any time during the period, said OCAW Vice Pres. B. J. Schafer. It provides an immediate wage hike of 4 cents an hour, plus improvements in sick and accident pay, pensions, hospital and surgical insurance valued at 6.54 cents an hour.

The company makes oils, starches and food products from corn in plants at Argo and Pekin, Ill., North Kansas City, Mo., and Corpus Christi, Tex. Intl. Rep. Al Kukral of OCAW headed a committee of members elected from the plants.

Johnson Gets Bills:

Poverty, Food Stamp Programs Approved

The omnibus bill, the major new domestic measure advanced by Pres. Johnson, had passed the Senate easily, 61-34, despite a warning by Goldwater that the youth program would further "the erosion of the institution of the American family."

In the House, where the vote was expected to be hairsbreadth close, the President staked his personal prestige in the search for support—and won.

The closest vote was the 225-197 defeat of an amendment by Rep. Howard W. Smith (D-Va.) which would have killed the bill by striking out its enacting clause. (See rollcall on page 6.) A watered-down GOP substitute was rejected, 295-117, and the bill then passed by a comfortable 226-184 margin.

The legislative momentum of the anti-poverty victory carried to final enactment the food-stamp bill, which authorizes $375 million for a three-year expansion of the pilot program launched by Pres. Kennedy in 1961 by executive order. Kennedy started the program with a portion of customs revenue available under an almost-forgotten New Deal law allowing such funds to be used to distribute surplus farm commodities. Both Kennedy in 1963 and Johnson early this year asked Congress to authorize an expanded program but the legislation had an uphill battle in the House Agriculture Committee which, at one stage, voted to table the bill, apparently killing it.

It was revived as southerners sought northern Democratic support for farm legislation and it passed the House 229-189 last April over almost-solid Republican opposition. The Senate approved it June 30 by voice vote with minor amendments accepted by the House Aug. 11.

Sullivan Victory

Enactment marked the victorious end of a long crusade by Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.), who for years had advocated a revival of the New Deal food-stamp program. In 1959, a permissive food stamp provision was passed as part of a broad farm bill, but both Pres. Eisenhower and his Secretary of Agriculture, Ezra Taft Benson, refused to put it into effect and it expired in 1961.

Congressional leaders talked hopefully of possible adjournment by Aug. 22, before the Democratic convention, but there was no assurance the goal could be met.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the Senate still had not completed action on the House-passed foreign aid authorization bill—which must then be followed by the actual appropriations measure.

The Senate Finance Committee was winding up hearings on a House-passed 5 percent boost in social security benefits — which labor and Administration spokesmen have said should be amended to include a program of hospital insurance for the aged.

Still in the legislative pipeline are two major bills linked to the anti-poverty program—the billion-dollar Appalachia development program to give first aid to an ailing 11-state region and an extension and expansion of the financially-depleted area redevelopment program.

Both houses of Congress put partisanship aside to approve—416-0 in the House and 88-2 in the Senate—a resolution giving congressional approval to "all necessary measures" that the President may take "to repel any armed attack" against U.S. forces and "to prevent further aggression" in southeast Asia. The resolution was viewed as strengthening the President's hand in the Vietnam crisis.

Foreign Aid Cut

The foreign aid debate—even apart from the controversial rider offered by Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.) to postpone the effective date of court decisions on legislative reapportionment—brought a setback to the Administration as the Senate hacked $216.7 million from the authorization bill reported by its Foreign Relations Committee. This would bring the spending ceiling more than $66 million below the amount the House actually appropriated, with the possibility of further Senate cuts in the appropriation process.

The Senate turned down, 44-27, an amendment strongly supported by the AFL-CIO, its government employe affiliates and veterans' organizations to eliminate a section in the bill allowing the Agency for Intl. Development to fire employes without regard to civil service procedure and appeal rights.

Pensions for veterans, with related eligibility requirements for those 65 or over, were liberalized in a bill which passed the House, 388-0. It now goes to the Senate.

AFL-CIO Urges Defeat Of Redistricting Rider

it was "unthinkable that Congress should deem a suspension of constitutional rights to be in the public interest" and strongly protested Senate consideration of the proposal "without any [committee] hearings whatsoever."

At its recent meeting in Chicago, the AFL-CIO Executive Council called on Congress to "stand firm for the principle of one man, one vote" and to "reject all efforts to diminish or dilute the true processes of democracy in this country."

Blocking court-ordered reapportionment would enable rural-controlled legislatures to stay in power—and, if Congress approved a constitutional amendment, preserve their control by ratifying it.

Dirksen said he chose the foreign aid bill as the vehicle for his apportionment "rider" because it was a "must" measure which would be acted on before adjournment.

Mansfield, while agreeing to cosponsor the modified Dirksen amendment, told newsmen that he was "unhappy" with it.

The AFL-CIO telegram urged senators to reject the foreign aid rider and "exert every effort to assure adequate hearings on this highly important question."

"The most elementary considerations of due process," the telegram said, "require that interested citizens be granted an opportunity to present their views" at committee hearings.

In the House, a more drastic proposal which would strip federal courts of all jurisdiction over reapportionment was cleared by the Rules Committee, 10-4, although it had not been approved by the Judiciary Committee—an almost unprecedented step.

The Rules Committee cleared the bill, sponsored by Rep. William M. Tuck (D-Va.), even though Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler had said he might be willing to go along with the Dirksen-Mansfield proposal as an alternative.

ROLE OF MOBILE UNIT donated to the National Travelers Aid Association by the AFL-CIO in helping migrant farm workers in Southern New Jersey is shown in the new AFL-CIO documentary film, "When the Day's Work Is Done." The photo shows the unit, one of two the country's organized workers gave the NTAA, with Stanley Mopsik, who mans it, at left. The film will have its premiere over TV during the Labor Day weekend.

Labor's Mobile Gift Helps Migrants on Spot

The workers who tend the crops that make New Jersey the Garden State now have help available when the problems that beset the migrant farm laborer grow too heavy for them to handle.

It is supplied by the National Travelers Aid Association and goes to them on the wheels of a mobile unit, one of two presented to the association by the AFL-CIO for use in seeking out migrant workers and other travelers who need assistance. Its story is one of those related in the new documentary film, "When the Day's Work Is Done," which tells organized labor's story in the field of community services. The film, which was produced by Somerset Productions, Inc., will have its television premiere over the Labor Day weekend.

Many migrant workers simply do not know to whom— or where—to turn when they need the kind of help the NTAA can provide. So Stanley Mopsik, who mans the special unit, seeks them out on the farms and in their living quarters and tells them what he can do to assist.

In 1963 more than 20,000 migrant workers lived in New Jersey farm labor camps, many of them with their wives and children.

"People think a migrant is a migrant because he wants to be," said Mopsik. "But a migrant is a migrant because he has no choice. For him, it is either sink or swim. He is, in a sense, stateless—he often has no permanent residence. Though many migrants want to settle somewhere, circumstances usually prevent it. They've got to move on. They need help and we aim to give it to them."

Because he is readily available, Mopsik has been able to aid many migratory workers and their families—for instance, the mother of six children whose husband was committed to a mental hospital and for whom he found a job as a cook for other migrants. Or the mother with a retarded child; Mopsik convinced her he would benefit from special teaching and arranged for him to have it.

The AFL-CIO gave the two mobile units to the NTAA because it was convinced that the traveler with troubles is no longer found exclusively in cities, near welfare agencies, but instead may be on the road. The second mobile unit will be put into service soon on the highways outside Los Angeles.

Walter Davis To Direct COPE Area 2

Walter L. Davis of Cleveland, who directed the coordinating organization in Ohio labor's successful fight against a so-called "right-to-work" amendment proposed in 1958, has been appointed director of Area 2 of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

For the past six years Davis has been education director of Retail Store Employes Local 880 in Cleveland, and for 15 years previously had been associate editor of the Cleveland Citizen, the nation's oldest labor paper. He was a member of the Cleveland School Board from 1960 to 1964 and was its president in 1962.

The area in which he will direct COPE activities consists of Ohio, Pennsylvania, Maryland, West Virginia, New Jersey, Delaware and the District of Columbia. He succeeds Hugh J. Mullin of Pittsburgh, who retired after serving as director since 1955.

Kenin Is Named To Fair Committee

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has designated Vice Pres. Herman D. Kenin, president of the Musicians, to represent organized labor on the National Committee of the United States Pavilion at the New York World's Fair.

The committee is headed by Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson. It was formed to help expand the theme of the U.S. exhibit, "Challenge to Greatness," and is made up of men and women prominent in arts, business and public life.

Carey Assails Quota System As Atrocious

An end to the "atrociously discriminatory quota system" in immigration was urged by Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. in testimony before a House Judiciary subcommittee.

The AFL-CIO earlier testified for the bill and federation conventions have regularly called for elimination of nationality restrictions.

Carey, who is president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, termed discriminatory national origin quotas "evil" and said the present law "intrudes on the friendship between the American labor movement and the labor movements of other free nations".

He expressed "wholehearted support" for the Administration bill which would abolish the national origins quota system.

Welfare Plan Officials Join New Group

The National Foundation of Health, Welfare & Pension Plans, Inc., incorporated in February, has enrolled more than 500 members in its first five months, according to its backers.

By the time its first educational conference is held Sept. 13-16 in the Americana Hotel, New York, membership is expected to reach the 700 mark and registrants at the meeting to top 1,800 persons.

The foundation was formed by many members of the former National Conference of Health, Welfare & Pension Plans, a national non-profit educational association organized in 1954 to help educate labor and management trustees and administrators of jointly-negotiated welfare and pension plans.

It was set up by leaders of the conference after they had voted to dissolve as a direct result of an effort led by Pres. James R. Hoffa of the Teamsters to "take over" control of the organization during its last education meeting in Miami Beach, Fla., in November, according to NC News, the conference's official publication. Members of the conference at the time administered plans and trusts with more than $12 billion in resources.

Hoffa and his group attempted to block dissolution of the older body but were rebuffed in a series of court actions that ended when Judge Edward M. Curran in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia signed an order appointing Lee R. Polacheck, Elm Grove, Wis., as the receiver and directing him to dissolve it.

Polacheck was workshop director of the conference and is president of the successor foundation. Dir. Alexander Bookstaver of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Investment is a member of an advisory committee to the new group's board of trustees.

Meany Calls on Democrats For Support of Labor Goals

House Bars Court Rule On Districts

By David L. Perlman

A labor-opposed drive to curb the Supreme Court's power to enforce its one man, one vote mandate for apportionment of state legislatures steamrollered through the House but was held up—at least temporarily—by a group of determined liberals in the Senate.

The House voted, 218-175, to strip federal courts of all jurisdiction over apportionment of state legislatures. This would nullify the Supreme Court's June 16 ruling that members of both houses of a legislature must be elected from districts "substantially equal" in population. The court based its decision on the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection of the laws to all citizens.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany termed the attempt to block court-ordered reapportionment "unconscionable" in a telegram to congressional leaders.

Earlier, testifying before the Democratic Platform Committee, Meany gave this reply to a question on the reapportionment controversy:

"The AFL-CIO position is very simple. We are and we always have been in favor of one man, one vote. We are unalterably opposed to any interference with the courts."

The House-passed bill, sponsored by Rep. William M. Tuck (D-Va.) and brought to the floor in a power play engineered by Rules Committee Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.), was the most drastic of the court-curbing measures before Congress.

PLATFORM WRITERS for the Democrats, preparing to draft a declaration of principles and program for the party's national convention in Atlantic City, hear AFL-CIO Pres. Carl Albert (Okla.), committee chairman and Democratic floor leader in the House.

Delegates to Nominate Johnson:

'Battle-Ready' Mood Prevails At Democratic Convention

By Willard Shelton

Atlantic City—Thousands of Democrats gathered for the party's national convention opening here Aug. 24 with delegates prepared to nominate Pres. Johnson for a full four-year term on the record of the Kennedy-Johnson Administration and the President's own record since he succeeded to the White House last November.

There was no doubt of the mood as delegates gathered and as the Platform Committee met both here and in Washington to draft the party's declaration of principles and program.

It was a mood of eagerness to do battle with the Republican presidential nominee, Sen. Barry Goldwater, and to challenge the GOP candidate and platform on every level—foreign policy, presidential control of nuclear weapons, the build-up of U.S. military strength since 1961, the nation's remarkably sustained economic surge, and the legislative record of Congress, including the civil rights bill.

Johnson had not disclosed his recommended choice of a vice presidential running mate as the the AFL-CIO News went to press.

An internal struggle was in prospect in the Credentials Committee—and perhaps on the convention floor—between two sets of delegates from Mississippi, one named by the "regular Democratic state organization," the other by some tens of thousands of Mississippi citizens, largely Negroes, charging they have been barred from registration and voting rights and consequently from state party activities.

Chairman of the convention will be House Speaker John W. McCormack of Massachusetts, who will take over the gavel Aug. 25 after Sen. John O. Pastore of Rhode Island delivers the keynote address the preceding night.

The nomination of both Johnson and the vice presidential candidate is scheduled for the third day, Aug. 26, with Johnson and his running-mate making their acceptance speeches the following night.

The report of the Credentials Committee, headed by former Gov. David L. Lawrence of Pennsylvania, is scheduled for the convention's first day. The Platform Committee's report will be presented the second day by Chairman Carl Albert of Oklahoma, the House Democratic leader.

The President's address is expected to set the tone of his election campaign—a campaign that

Hits GOP On Failure To Respond

The AFL-CIO carried its platform recommendations to the Democratic Party's Resolutions Committee, just before the national convention's opening sessions in Atlantic City, with a declaration of "hope" the Democrats "will be more responsive" than the Republican convention proved last month in San Francisco.

The major interests of AFL-CIO members, Pres. George Meany told the committee, "are those which concern not just unions and union members, but all Americans."

Submitting a printed document including AFL-CIO proposals on a wide range of issues, Meany pointed out that it was the "same document" presented to the GOP convention in July.

"I regret to say we can find very little evidence of our efforts in the final Republican plaform as written," he said. "I further agree that we can find few specifics with respect to that party's policies anywhere in that platform."

In an oral statement Meany paid tribute to "progress made" in several vital areas during the Kennedy-Johnson Administration of the last four years. But he emphasized that two "indivisible" issues still "overshadow all the rest"—the security of the United States and its free world partners and the internal American need to move toward "universal abundance and unqualified social justice."

"The basic point remains valid,"

Major Senate Drive Builds to Save Social Security Hospital Insurance

The labor-supported push for a social security program of hospital insurance for the aged shifted to the Senate floor, where a major effort will be made to amend a House-passed bill raising social security cash benefits 5 percent.

Two proposals to write a medicare provision into the bill were turned down—as expected—in the conservative-dominated Senate Finance Committee.

The committee first defeated, 11-6, an amendment incorporating the long-pending King-Anderson bill. It then rejected a new option plan which would offer senior citizens a one-time choice between hospital and nursing home benefits plus $2-a-month more in cash, or a straight $7 cash increase.
